either carried before them, or affixed to the instrument of their punishment.' Whitby.

Thus Attalus the martyr was led round the amphitheatre with a tablet before him, inscribed, "This is Attalus the Christian." The same custom prevailed in crucifixions. Dio mentions a servant or slave who was carried to the cross, with a writing declaring the cause of his death.'

There were three inscriptions, or rather one, with slight variations, in three languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin. Matthew is supposed to have given the Hebrew, John the Greek, and Mark the Latin. Ed.
'It was written in Latin for the majesty of the Roman empire, in Greek for the information of the Hellenists who used that, as indeed most of the Roman provinces did. Hebrew was the vulgar language of the place.'

(28.) Transgressors.' The word more properly signifies malefactors, than transgressors.'

The innocent here bore the chastisement of the guilty, and procured their peace with God. We know why this was required. We know how, from the time when Adam sinned, and brought his own corruption and condemnation upon the whole race of his posterity, man became a debtor to God's justice. He is "the King of all the earth." Shall man rebel against his rightful Sovereign, and no punishment ensue?

Can God behold with the same eyes, righteousness and unrighteousness? No. We are assured that He "cannot look upon evil." What then remains? On one side, God offended—his will despised—his authority defied. On the other side, sinful, helpless, wretched man.
What, I say, remains, but "tribulation and anguish?" What, but "the terrors of the Lord?" "the blackness of darkness forever?"
"outer darkness where is weeping and gnashing of teeth?" Such must have been the end, if the Son had not consented to and in the stead of our guilty race, and said, "Lo, I am come to do my will, O God. I am content to do it." And then could God say, "Deliver them from going down into the pit, for I have found a ransom." He was a sufficient Ransom, who being without sin, could atone for man's guilt.
He was our Ransom, who taking our nature upon Him, could die for our death, suffer our penalty.'

compassion on those that are out of the way, and be tender of those that are suffering and dying. (Heb. 5: 1, 2.) poured vinegar instead of oil into his wounds; they talked to the grief of Him whom God had smitten; (Ps. 69: 26.) they mocked Him and said, He healed and helped others, but now it appears that he was not by his own power, for himself He cannot save. They challenge Him to come down from the cross. Let them but see that, and they would believe; whereas they would not believe, when He gave them a more convincing sign when He came up from the grave. These chief priests, one would think, might now have found other work to do: if they would not go to their duty in the temple, they might have been employed in an office not foreign to their profession; though they would not offer any comfort to Jesus, they might have given help to the thieves in their dying moments; (the monks and priests in popish countries are very officious about criminals broken upon the wheel; a death much like that of the cross;) but they did not think that their business.

(3.) Even they that were crucified with Him, reviled Him, (v. 32.) so wretchedly was the heart of one of them hardened even in the depth of misery, and at the door of eternity.

V. 33-41. Here we have an account of Christ's dying. His enemies abused Him, God honored Him, at his death.

I. There was a thick darkness over the whole land, (some think over the whole earth,) for three hours, from noon. Now the scripture was fulfilled, (Amos 8: 9.) I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and will darken the earth in the clear day; and (Jer. 15: 9.) Her sun is gone down while it is yet day. The Jews had often demanded of Christ a sign from heaven; now they had such a one as signified the blinding of their eyes. It was a sign of darkness that was coming upon the Jewish church and nation. They were doing their utmost to extinguish the Sun of righteousness, which was now setting, and the rising again of which they would never own; and what then might be expected among them but a worse than Egyptian darkness? This intimated to them, that the things which belonged to their peace were now hid from their eyes, and that the day of the Lord was at hand, which should be to them a day of darkness and gloominess, Joel 2: 1, 2. It was the power of darkness that they were now under, the works of darkness that they were now doing; and such as this should their doom justly be, who loved darkness rather than light.

II. Towards the close of this darkness, our Lord Jesus, in the agony of his soul, cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? v. 34. The darkness signified the cloud which the human soul of Christ was under, when He was making it an offering for sin. A martyr queen Mary's time, being fastened to the stake, to be burnt, put up this short prayer, Son of God, shine upon me; and immediately the sun shone out of a dark cloud, so full in his face, that He was forced to look another way, which was very comfortable to Him. But our Lord, on the contrary, was denied the light of the sun, when He was in his sufferings, to signify the withdrawing of the light of God's countenance. And this He complained of more than anything; He did not complain of his disciples' forsaking Him, but of his Father's, 1. Because this wounded his spirit; and that is a thing hard to bear; (Prov. 15: 14.) this brought the waters into his soul. Ps. 69: 1-3. 2. Because in this especially He was made sin for us; our iniquities had deserved indignation and wrath upon the soul, (Rom. 2: 7.) and therefore Christ, being made a Sacrifice, underwent as much of it as He was capable of; and it could not but bear hard indeed upon Him who had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and was always his delight. These symptoms of divine wrath, which Christ was under in his sufferings, were like that fire from heaven which had been sent sometimes in extraordinary cases, to consume the sacrifices; (as Lev. 9: 24. 2 Chron. 7: 1. 1 Kings 18: 38.) and it was always a token of God's acceptance. The fire that should have fallen upon the sinner, if God had not been pacified, fell upon the Sacrifice, as a token that He was so; therefore it now fell upon Christ, and extorted from Him this long and bitter cry. When Paul was to be offered, as a sacrifice for the service of saints, he could joy and rejoice; (Phil. 2: 17.) but it is another thing to be offered as a sacrifice for the sin of sinners. Now, at the sixth hour, and so to the ninth, the sun was darkened by an extraordinary eclipse; and if it be true, as some astronomers compute, that in the evening of this day on which Christ died, there was an eclipse of the moon, that was natural and expected, in which seven digits of the moon were darkened, and continued from five o'clock till seven, it is remarkable, and yet further significant of the darkness of the time that then was. When the sun shall be darkened, the moon also shall not give her light. [But see note.]

III. Christ's prayer was lanted by them that stood by, (v. 35, 36.) because He cried Eli, Eli, or, (as Mark has it, according to the Syriac dialect,) Eloi, Eloi, they said, He calls for Elias, though they knew very well that it signified, My God, my God. Thus did they represent Him as praying to saints, either because He had abandoned God, or God had abandoned Him; and hereby they would make Him more odious to the people. One of them filled a sponge with vinegar, and reached it up to Him upon a reed; 'Let Him cool his mouth with that, it (Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 27: 45.) 'The anger of God, as avenging our sins on our Surety, was attested by this horror of darkness. ... It is inquired by many, whether this is to be understood of the land of Judea, or of the whole earth. Tertullian seems to embrace the latter opinion, calling the failure of the sun the misfortune of the world, which they had recorded in the Roman archives. But I rather agree with those who understand it of Jerusalem, and all the neighboring country: for it would be more proper for the prodigy to be noted in the archives, if peculiar to Judea. ... While the sun enlightened the rest of the earth, and even at the noon-day, this one corner of the world, in which the horrible crime was perpetrating, was covered with the thickest darkness! ... This miracle may seem to have been opposed to one directly contrary; when darkness covered the Egyptians, while the sun shone on the Israelites in Goshen. At that time God intimated that destruction impended over the Egyptians, and that liberty was obtained for his people: but now on the contrary, He showed that, while miserable blindness was coming on the Jews, (with which they are punished even to the present time,) the heavenly light of the Gospel would arise on all other nations.' Beza.

SCOTT.

'The passover, at which time Christ was crucified, was at the full moon, when it is impossible for a natural eclipse of the sun to take place.'

Beza.—It has been supposed, that the vigor with which Jesus cried out just before He expired, being contrary to what is generally observed in such cases, (Note, Matt. 27: 50.) helped to convince the centurion, that He was 'the Son of God'; but the confidence, with which He owned and dressed God as his Father, and committed his soul into his hands, seems to have had still greater influence in producing this conviction.

DODDRIDGE.

(39.) 'This man was the Son of God.' Because the article wanting before each of the nouns, some would render the clause, 'A son of a god.' (See on Matt. 27: 40, 54.) For saying, 'I am the Son of God,' Jesus had been crucified; but the centurion says, 'Truly He was the Son of God.' In that sense, more clearly, in which Jesus had said that He was: and for saying it, He had been crucified!—His views doubtless were very indistinct on the subject; and so with those of the Jews, and even of the apostles. CH. P. X. I.

An angel appears to the women that Jesus is risen, 1-8. He appears to Mary Magdalene, 9-11; to two disciples going into the country, 12, 13; and to the eleven, whom He appoints for their unbelief, and commissions to preach the gospel to all the world, 14-18. He ascends into heaven, 19. The gospel is every where preached, and confirmed by miracles, 20.

AND when the sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him.

2 And very early in the morning, the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun.

3 And they said among themselves, 'Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?'

4 And when they looked, they saw that the stone was rolled away: for it was very great.

how to regard it; and the hearts of the priests were so influenced that they did not oppose it. We care not for his being adorned, provided He be not revived.

Joseph bought fine linen to wrap the body. In paying respects to Christ, it becomes us to be generous, and to serve Him with the best that can be got, not with that which can be got best.

He took down the body, mangled and macerated, and wrapped it in the linen. Our Lord hath commanded Himself to be delivered to us sacramentally in the ordinance of the supper, which we should receive in such a manner as may best express our love to Him, who loved us and died for us.

He laid it in a sepulchre of his own, in a private place. We sometimes find it spoken of, in the story of the kings of Judah, as a slur upon the memory of wicked kings, that they were not buried in the sepulchres of the kings; our Lord, though He did no evil, but much good, and to Him was given the throne of his father David, yet was buried in the graves of the common people, for it was not in this world, but in the other, that his rest was glorious. This sepulchre belonged to Joseph; Abraham, when he had no other possession in the land of Canaan, yet had a burying-place, but Christ had wanted for the kingdom of God, whose faith will condemn the unbelief of the rest. This man God raised up for this necessary service, when none of Christ's disciples could, or durst undertake it, having neither purse, nor interest, nor courage. Joseph went in boldly to Pilate; though he knew how much it would affront the chief priests, who had loaded Him with so much reproach, to see any honor done Him, yet he put on courage; perhaps at first he was a little afraid, but he determined to shew this respect to Jesus, lest the worst come to the worst.

It was a surprise to Pilate to hear that he was dead. Perhaps he expected that He would save himself, and come down from the cross. But He was already dead, though He seemed to have more than ordinary vigor. Every circumstance of Christ's dying was marvellous; from first to last his name was called Wonderful. Pilate doubted (so some understand it) whether He were yet dead or no, fearing lest he should be imposed upon, and the body taken down alive, and recovered, whereas the sentence was, as with us, to hang till the body be dead. He therefore called the centurion, his own officer, and asked him whether He had been any while dead, (v. 44.) whether it was so long since they perceived any sign of life in Him, that they might conclude He was past recall. The centurion could assure him of this, for he had particularly observed how He gave up the ghost, v. 39. There was a special providence in it, that Pilate should be so strict in this, that there might be no pretence to say that He was buried alive, and so to take away the truth of his resurrection; and so fully was this determined, that that objection was never started. Thus the truth of Christ gains confirmation, sometimes, even from his enemies.

Pilate gave Joseph leave to take down the body, and do what he pleased with it. It was a wonder the chief priests were not too quick for him, and had not first begged the body of Pilate, to drag it about the streets; but that remainder of their wrath did God restrain, and gave that invaluable prize to Joseph, who knew not so much as that. This sepulchre was hewn out of a rock, for Christ died to make the grave a refuge and shelter to the saints, and being hewn out of a rock, it is a strong refuge. Oh that thou wouldest hide me in the grave! Christ Himself is a hiding place to his people, that is, as the shadow of a great rock.

He rolled a stone to the door of the sepulchre, for so the manner of the Jews was to bury. When Daniel was put into the lions' den, a stone was laid to the mouth of it to keep him in, as here to the door of Christ's sepulchre, but neither of them could keep off the angels' visits to the prisoners.

Some of the women attended, and beheld where He was laid, that they might come after the sabbath to anoint the body, because they had not time to do it now. When Moses, the mediator and lawgiver of the Jewish church, was buried, care was taken that no man should know of his sepulchre, (Deut. 34: 6.) because the respects of the people towards his person were to die with him; but when our great Mediator and Lawgiver was buried, special notice was taken of his sepulchre, because He was to rise again; and the care taken of his body speaks the care which He himself will take concerning his body, the church; even when it seems to be dead, and as a valley full of dry bones, it shall be preserved in order to a resurrection; as shall also the dead bodies of the saints, with whose dust there was a covenant in force which shall not be forgotten. Our meditations on Christ's burial should lead us to think of our own, and should help to make the grave familiar to us, and so to make that bed easy, which we must shortly make in the darkness. Frequent thoughts of it would not only take off the dread and terror of it, but quicken us, since the graves are always ready for us, to get ready for the graves, Job 17: 1.

CHAP. XVI. v. 1-8. Never was there such a sabbath since the Sabbath was first instituted as this; during all this sabbath our Lord Jesus lay in the grave. It was to Him a sabbath of rest, but a silent sabbath; it was to his disciples a melancholy sabbath, spent in tears and fears. Never were the sabbath-services in the temple such an abomination to God, though they had been often so, as they were now, when the chief priests, who presided in them, had their hands full of the blood of Christ. Now this sabbath is over, and the first day of the week is the first day of a new world.

The women that had attended Christ, now came to his sepulchre; not superstitious, but pious. They set out very early in the morning; but either they had a long walk, or they met with some hindrance, so that it was sun-rising by the time they got to the sepulchre. They had bought sweet spices, and came not only to bedew the dead body with their tears, but to perfume

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 27-47. Careful meditation on the silence and meekness of Jesus, amidst his sufferings, and the varied contempt and cruelty of his enemies, must cause us to exclaim, 'Did Jesus thus suffer, and shall I, a wretched sinner repine? shall I indulge resentment, or utter reproaches and menaces, because of injuries?' With this object before us, we cannot think it too much to pour out tears for those sins, for which the Son of God shed his blood; or to pour out our prayers for those blessings, for which He poured out his soul unto death, and was numbered with malefactors; or to bear hardships for Him who bore the wrath of God for us. All we can suffer must be light, compared with his unknown agonies; yet how often are we weary and faint in our minds; instead of being thankful, that we are not in the pit of destruction, as we justly might have been! Did we more constantly contemplate these scenes, we should not only derive peace and comfort from the Savior's atoning blood; but we should also transcribe his character into our lives, and learn more and more to dread and hate all those evil dispositions, which marked the conduct of his persecutors:

and we should always find motives to live to the glory of Him who died for us and rose again.' We also ought to remember, that the hiding of God's face from us is in itself more dreadful than all that man can do unto us; that we may learn to cry to Him for help and comfort, when contemned by men. He will not forsake those who trust Him: death, now deprived of his sting, will soon terminate the believer's sorrows, as it did the Savior's; then the way into the holiest will be open to his soul, as it was before to his prayers, and He will be out of the reach of all enemies. His dying words and behavior may leave a salutary impression on the minds of those who observe them; his memory may perhaps be honored by those, who despised him when living; the grave will be a quiet and sacred repository to his body, till the joyful resurrection; and thus he will be made more than 'conqueror, through Him who loved him,' and 'washed him from his sins in his own blood.'—Lord, visit our souls with this salvation, and make us thankful for these inestimable gifts! (P. O. Matt. 27: 45-56.) SCOTT.

ners, so they do also in the consolation of saints. Be not affrighted, for 'Ye are faithful lovers of Jesus Christ, and therefore, instead of being confounded, ought to be comforted. Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified.' Note, The inquiries of believing souls after Christ have a particular regard to Him as crucified, (1 Cor. 2: 2) that they may know Him, and the fellowship of his sufferings. His being lifted up from the earth, is that which draws all men unto Him. Christ's cross is the ensign to which the Gentiles seek. Observe, He speaks of Jesus as one that was crucified; 'that scene is over, ye must not dwell so much upon the sad circumstances of his crucifixion, as not to believe the joyful news of his resurrection. He was it with their spices. Nicodemus had bought dry spices, myrrh, and aloes, to dry the wounds. John 19: 39. But these women did not think that enough; they bought spices, perhaps of another kind, some perfumed to anoint Him. Note, The respect which others have showed to Christ's name, should not hinder us from showing our respect to it.

They said among themselves, as they drew near the sepulchre, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre? For it was very great, more than they with their united strength could move. They should have thought of this before they came out, and then discretion would have bidden them not go, unless they had those to go with them, who could do it. And there was another difficulty, much greater than this, to be got over, which they knew nothing of, to wit, a guard of soldiers set to keep the sepulchre; who, had they come before they were frightened away, would have frightened them away. But their love to Christ carried them to the sepulchre: and by the time they came thither, both these difficulties were removed. the stone and the guard. They saw that the stone was rolled away, which amazed them. Note, They who are carried by a holy zeal to seek Christ, will find difficulties strangely vanish, and themselves helped over them beyond their expectation. Assurance was given them by an angel, that Jesus was risen, had taken leave of his sepulchre, and had left him there to tell those who came thither to inquire after Him.

They entered into the sepulchre, a little way, and saw that the body of Jesus was not where they left it. He who by his death undertook to pay our debt, in his resurrection took out our acquittance; for it was his discharge out of prison, by which it appeared that his satisfaction was accepted, and the matter in dispute determined, by an incontestible evidence that He was the Son of God.

They saw a young man sitting on the right side of the sepulchre. The angel appeared in the likeness of a young man; for angels, though created in the beginning, grow not old, but are always in the same perfection of beauty and strength; and so shall glorified saints be, when they are as the angels. This angel was sitting on the right hand as they went into the sepulchre, clothed with a long white garment, down to the feet, such as great men were arrayed with. The sight of him might justly have encouraged them, but they were affrighted. Thus many times that which should be matter of comfort to us, through our own misapprehensions proves a terror to us.

He silenced their fears by assuring them that there was cause for triumph, none for trembling; (v. 6.) He saith to them, Be not affrighted. Note, As angels rejoice in the conversion of sinners, crucified in weakness, yet raised in power, and therefore yet that seek Him, he not afraid of missing Him.' He was crucified, but He is glorified; and the shame of his sufferings is so far from lessening the glory of his exaltation, that that glory perfectly wipes away the reproach of his sufferings. And therefore after his entrance upon his glory, He never drew any veil over his sufferings. The angel here, that proclaims his resurrection, calls Him Jesus that was crucified. He himself owns, (Rev. 1: 18.) I am He that liveth, and was dead; and He appears in the midst of the praises of the heavenly hosts, as a Lamb that had been slain, Rev. 5: 6. 'It will therefore be good news to you, to hear that, instead of anointing Him dead, you may rejoice in Him living. He is risen, He is not here, not dead, but alive again; we cannot as yet show you Him, hereafter you will see Him; but you may here see the place where they laid Him, and you see He has hence, not stolen either by his enemies or by his friends, but risen.'

He orders them to give speedy notice of this to his disciples. Thus they were made the apostles of the apostles, which was a recompense of their affection and fidelity, attending Him on the cross, to the grave, and in the grave. They first came, and were first served; no other of the disciples durst come near his sepulchre, or inquire after Him; so little danger was there of their coming by night to steal Him away, that none came near Him but a few women, who were not able so much as to roll away the stone.

They must tell the disciples, that He is risen. It is a dismal time with them, their Master is dead, and their hopes and joys buried in his grave; they look upon their cause as sunk, and themselves ready to fall an easy prey into the hands of their enemies, so that there remains no more spirit in them. 'Go quickly to them, saith the angel, tell them that their Master is risen; this will put some life and spirits into them, and keep them from sinking into despair. Note, [1.] Christ is not ashamed to own his poor disciples, now that He is in his exalted state; his preference doth not make Him shy of them, for He took early care to have it notified to them. [2.] Christ is not extreme to mark what they do amiss, whose hearts are upright with Him. The disciples had very unkindly deserted Him, and yet He testified this concern for them. [3.] Seasonable comforts shall be sent to those that are lamenting after the Lord Jesus, and He will find a time to manifest Himself to them.

(2.) They must be sure to tell Peter. This is particularly taken notice of by this evangelist, who is supposed to have written by Peter's direction. If it were told the disciples, it would be told Peter, for, as a token of his repentance, he still associated with his disciples; yet he is particularly named; Tell Peter, for, [1.] It will be news more welcome to him than to any of them; for he is in sorrow for sin, and no tidings can be more welcome to penitents than the resurrection of Christ, because He arose for their justification. [2.] He will be afraid, lest the joy of this good news do not belong to him. Had the angel said only, Go tell his dis-

Verses 5-8.

(Notes, Luke 24: 1-12.) St. Luke mentions two angels, whom the women saw on this occasion, but Matthew and Mark take notice only of the one who spake to them, and whom they probably saw first.—The angel appeared like a man, in the vigor of youth, and clothed in a long white garment, the emblem of purity and innocence: but his appearance to the soldiers seems to have been far more majestic and awful; yet the women were affrighted, being aware that he was more than man.

(3.) This appears to have been a different angel, from that mentioned by Matthew. The latter sat in the porch of the tomb, and had assumed a terrible appearance to overawe the guard, (Matt. 28: 1.) but this appeared as a young man within the sepulchre, in the inner apartment. The two angels spoken of by John (chap. 20: 11.) appeared some time after these; but whether they were the same or different cannot be ascertained; neither can it be affirmed, that the angels which manifested themselves to the second party of women, recorded by Luke, were the same or different.

In the subsequent conduct of the women, their amazement and terror are noticed, and not their joy. The former first seized them; but the latter afterwards prevailed. The clause however may be rendered, 'for terror and ecstasy possessed them;' and the ecstasy may signify, the mingled affections of astonishment and joy, in the greatest excess. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 28: 1-8.)

(7.) Tell his disciples and Peter.] 'And was not Peter a disciple? Perhaps he scarcely dared consider himself as such, after his sad apostasy. He had denied all knowledge of his Lord: and would his Lord acknowledge him? Yes! He is "touched with our infirmities." He has pardoned the weakness of his repentant servant: He has still a commission to intrust him with, and will enable him to show, by a life of faithfulness, that the grace bestowed on him had not been bestowed in vain.'

Verses 9-11.

(Marg. Ref.—Note, John 20: 11-17.) It is here said, that Jesus had cast out of Mary Magdalene 'seven devils.' (Luke 8: 2.) This no doubt, refers to a real possession, from which she had mercifully been delivered, in the same manner as the man who had the legion; but whether this had been a visitation appointed her, for the sins of her former life, or not, is quite uncertain. (Note, 5: 2-13.) Indeed all that is generally taken for granted, of her previous bad character and profligate conduct, rests merely on the credit of tradition, which reports that she was 'the woman who was a sinner,' of whom St. Luke speaks (Notes, Luke 7: 36-50.) for there is no scriptural proof of it, though very much has frequently been built on it. Her surname of Mary

V. 9-13. We have here, a short account of two of Christ's appearances, and the little credit which the report of them gained with the disciples.

I He appeared to Mary Magdalene first, in the garden, of which we have a particular narrative, John 20: 14. It was she out of whom He had cast seven devils; much was forgiven her, and done for her, and she loved much; and this honor Christ did her, that she was the first that saw Him after his resurrection. The closer we cleave to Christ, the sooner we may expect to see Him, and the more to see of Him. She brings notice of what she had seen, not only to the eleven, but to the rest that followed Him, as they mourned and wept, v. 16. Now was the time of which Christ had told them, ciples, poor Peter would have been ready to sigh, and say, 'But I doubt I cannot look upon myself as one of them, for I disowned Him, and deserve to be disowned by Him;' to obviate that, 'Go to Peter by name, and tell him, he shall be as welcome as any of the rest to see Him in Galilee.' Note, A sight of Christ will be very welcome to a true penitent, and a true penitent shall be very welcome to a sight of Christ, for there is joy in heaven concerning him.

(3.) They must appoint them all, and Peter by name, to meet in Galilee, as He said unto you, Matt. 26: 32. In their journey down to Galilee they would have time to recollect themselves, and call to mind what He has often said to them there, that He should suffer and die and the third day be raised again; whereas, while they were at Jerusalem among strangers and enemies, they could not recover themselves from the fright they had been in, nor compose themselves to better tidings. Note, [1.] All the meetings between Christ and his disciples are of his own appointing. [2.] Christ never forgets his appointment, but will be sure to meet his people with the promised blessing in every place where He records his name. [3.] In all meetings between Christ and his disciples, He is the most forward. He goes before you.

The women went out quickly, and ran from the sepulchre, with all haste to the disciples, trembling, and amazed. We are enemies to our own comfort, in not considering and mixing faith with what Christ hath said to us; Christ had often told them, that the third day He would rise again; had they given that its due credit, they would have come to the sepulchre, expecting to have found Him risen, and would have received the news of it with a joyful assurance, and not with terror and amazement. But, being ordered to tell the disciples, because they were to tell it to all the world, they would not tell it to any one else, they showed not any thing of it to any man that they met by the way, for they were afraid it was too good to be true. Note, Our fears often hinder us from that service to Christ, and the souls of men, which, if faith and the joy of faith were strong, we might do.

that they should mourn and lament, John 16: 20. It was an evidence of their love to Christ, and the deep sense they had of their loss. But when their weeping had endured a night or two, comfort returned, as Christ had promised them; I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. Better news cannot be brought to disciples in tears, than to tell them of Christ's resurrection. We should study to be comforters to disciples that are mourners, by communicating to them our experiences, and what we have seen of Christ.

They could not credit the report she brought them. They heard that He was alive, and had been seen of her. The story was plausible, yet they believed not. They would not say that she made the story, or designed to deceive them; but they fear that she is imposed upon, and that it was but a fancy that she saw Him. Had they believed the frequent predictions of it from his own mouth, they would not have been now so incredulous.

II. He appeared to two of his disciples, as they went into the country, v. 12. This refers, no doubt, to that which is largely related, (Luke 24: 13.) of the two disciples going to Emmaus. He is here said to have appeared to them in another form, in another dress than what He usually wore, in the form of a traveller, as, in the garden, in such a dress, that Mary Magdalene took Him for the gardener; but that He had really his own countenance, appears by this, that their eyes were holden, that they should not know Him; and when that restraint on their eyes was taken off, immediately they knew Him, Luke 24: 16, 31.

These two witnesses gave in their testimony to Christ's resurrection; They went and told it to the residue, v. 13. Being satisfied themselves, they were desirous to give their brethren the satisfaction they had, that they might be comforted as they were.

This did not gain credit with all; Neither believed they them. They suspected that their eyes also deceived them. There was a wise providence in it, that the proofs of Christ's resurrection were given in gradually, and admitted cautiously, that the assurance with which the apostles preached this doctrine afterward, might be the more satisfying. We have the more reason to believe those who did themselves believe slowly: had they swallowed it presently, they might have been thought credulous, and their testimony the less to be regarded; but their disbelieving at first, shows that they did not believe it afterward but upon a full conviction.

V. 14-18. Here is, I. The conviction which Christ gave his apostles of his resurrection; (v. 14.) He ap-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11. When we deny ourselves, and incur trouble and expense, from love to Christ and zeal for his glory, we shall be accepted, even though unsuccessful.—Those whose hearts are right before God, may yet be greatly mistaken in their judgment, and they will be often disquieted, when they have abundant reason to rejoice. Indeed, those who believe, and seek Jesus who was crucified, and is risen, should not in any possible circumstances give way to disconsolate sorrow or gloomy fears. Evil men and apostate angels cannot hurt them: holy angels are their faithful friends, and delight to minister to their comfort, because they are the objects of the Lord's peculiar love and favor. Even after they have been overcome by temptation, and have acted inconsistently, yea, basely; yet when they are deeply penitent, the gracious Savior will mingle encouragement with their humiliation, lest they should be swallowed up of over-much sorrow; and a trembling Peter shall be especially mentioned, that he may not be tempted to despond. How slowly we admit the consolations, which the Word of God holds forth to us! how difficult to believe that the Lord will especially favor those, over whom Satan has heretofore domineered! Yet He sometimes employs such trophies of his victory over the powers of darkness, to bear tidings of his abundant grace to those who mourn and weep, that the very example of the messenger may evince the truth of the message, and prove that Jesus lives, and is able to save to the uttermost all them that come to God through Him. Scott.

lene, seems to relate to the place of her nativity, or abode: for the words translated Mary Magdalene, or 'Mary the Magdalene,' may very properly be rendered 'Mary of Magdala,' as 'Jesus the Nazarene' is commonly rendered 'Jesus of Nazareth.' Scott.

Verses 12, 13.

(Notes, Luke 24: 13-35.) Our Lord was pleased to change his habit on appearance on this occasion, that the disciples might not for a time know who He was.—[13.] Neither believed, &c.] That is, several of the disciples did not fully credit them; though others had been before convinced of Christ's resurrection. But in so extraordinary an event, and among a number of persons, we need not wonder, that some were more deeply impressed by what they heard than others. Hence one of the ancients says well, "their doubting is the confirmation of our faith: and the more difficulty they showed in believing Christ's resurrection, the greater reason have we to believe it." For the testimony of them, who believed not themselves, till after unquestionable conviction; is the more credible on that account. Whithy. Scott.

Verses 14-16.

(Notes, Matt. 28: 18. Luke 24: 36-49. John 20: 19-29. 21: 1-23.) If we understand this of our Lord's appearing to the apostles, on the evening of the day on which He arose, Thomas was not present; but they might be called the eleven, that being the whole remaining number, though one of them was absent; or some other appearance of our Lord to them might be intended.—Baptism is the outward sign of regeneration, and it is also that profession of faith in Christ which is required of all who embrace Christianity. (Notes, Matt. 28: 19, 20. Acts 2: 37-40. Rom. 10: 5-11. 1 Pet. 3: 21, 22.) But if men truly believe in Christ, profess openly faith in him, and partake of his sanctifying Spirit, they will doubtless be saved, even should they have no opportunity of being baptized with water, or should they fall into any mistake, about the external mode of administering that ordinance: and if men both believe and are baptized, it does not follow from the order of the words in the text, that the baptism is invalid, because it was previous to believing; for no sect of Christians re-baptize those who whether they could not go themselves, and live to send glad tidings up and down the world with all possible fidelity and care, not as an amusement, but as a message from God, and the means of making men happy. 'Tell as many as you can, and bid them tell others; it is of universal concern, and ought to have a universal welcome, because it gives a universal welcome.'

2. The summary of the Gospel they are to preach, is, 'Set before the world life and death, good and evil. Tell the children of men that they are in a state of misery and danger, condemned by their Prince, conquered and enslaved by their enemies.' This is supposed in their being saved, which they would not need to be if they were not lost. 'Tell them, (1.) That if they believe the Gospel, and give themselves to Christ; if they renounce the devil, the world, and the flesh, and be devoted to Christ as their Prophet, Priest and King, and to God in Christ as their God in covenant, and evidence by their adherence to this covenant their sincerity, they shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin; it shall not rule nor ruin them. He that is a true Christian, shall be saved through Christ.' Baptism was appointed to be the inaugurating rite, by which those that embrace Christ, owned Him; but it is here put rather for the thing signified than for the sign, for Simon Magus believed, and was baptized, yet was not saved, Acts 8:13. Believing with the heart, and confessing with the mouth the Lord Jesus, (Rom. 10:9.) seems to be much the same with this here. Or thus, We must assent to the gospel-truths, and consent to gospel-terms. (2.) If they receive not the record God gives concerning His Son, they cannot expect any other way of salvation, but have been baptized in their own way, because it afterwards appears that they were not true believers at the time, though it be hoped that they have since become so.

(16.) The words damned and damnation, are sometimes used in our translation, where the original words mean simply judge or judgment; which weakens its effect when it should be used. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34, v. 29.) In this place, however, eternal judgment is manifestly intended; and 'condemnation' will then be damnation, eternal damnation. (Notes, Matt. 25:41—46. 2 Theas. 1:5—10, v. 8, 9. Rev. 20:11—15.)

appeared to them as they sat at meat, which gave Him an opportunity to eat and drink with them, for their full satisfaction; see Acts 10:41. And still, when He appeared to them, He upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, for even at the general meeting in Galilee some doubted, as we find, Matt. 28:17. Note, The evidences of the truth of the Gospel are so full, that those who receive it not, may justly be upbraided with unbelief; and it is owing, not to any weakness or deficiency in the proofs, but to senselessness and stupidity. Though they had not till now seen Him themselves, they are justly blamed, because they believed not them who had seen Him after He was risen; and perhaps it was owing in part to the pride of their hearts, that they did not; for they thought, 'If indeed He were risen, to whom should He delight to do the honor of showing Himself, but to us?' And if He pass them by, and show Himself to others first, they cannot believe it is He. Thus many disbelieve the doctrine of Christ, because they think it below them to give credit to such as He has chosen to be the witnesses and publishers of it. It will not suffice for an excuse of our infidelity in the great day, to say, 'We did not see Him after He was risen;' for we ought to have believed the testimony of those who did see Him.

II. He gave them a commission to set up his kingdom by the preaching of his Gospel, the tidings of reconciliation to God through a Mediator. Observe,

1. To whom they were to preach the Gospel. Hitherto they had been sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and were forbidden to go into the way of the Gentiles, or into any city of the Samaritans; but now their commission is enlarged, and they are authorized to go into all parts of the habitable world, and preach the Gospel to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews; to every human creature that is capable of receiving it. 'Inform them concerning Christ, the history of his life, death, and resurrection; instruct them in the meaning and intention of these, and of the advantages which the children of men may have, hereby; and invite them, without exception, to come and share in them. This is Gospel, let this be preached in all places, to all persons.' These eleven men could not themselves preach it to all the world, much less to every creature; but they and the seventy, with those who should afterwards be added to them, must disperse, and wherever they went, carry the Gospel. They must send others to places most perish, they shall be damned, by the sentence of a despised Gospel, accord to that of a broken law.' And even this is Gospel, good news, that nothing else but unbelief shall damn men, which is a sin against the remedy. Dr. Whitby here observes, that they who hence infer, 'that the infant seed of believers are not capable of baptism, because they cannot believe, must hence also infer that they cannot be saved; faith being here more expressly required to salvation than to baptism. And that in the latter clause, baptism is omitted, because it is not simply the want of baptism, but the contemptuous neglect of it, which makes men guilty of damnation, otherwise infants might be damned for the mistakes or profaneness of their parents.'

3. They would be endowed with power for the confirmation of the doctrine they were to preach; (v. 17.) These signs shall follow them that believe. Not that all who believe shall be able to produce these signs, but as many as were employed in propagating the faith; for signs are intended for them that believe not; see 1 Cor. 14:22. It added much to the glory and evidence of the Gospel, that the preachers not only wrought miracles themselves, but conferred upon others a power to work miracles, which power followed some of them that believed, wherever they went to preach. They shall do wonders in Christ's name, in virtue of power derived from Him, by prayer. Some particular signs are mentioned; (1.) They shall cast out devils; this power was more common among Christians than any other, and lasted longer, as appears by the testimonies of early writers. (2.) They shall speak with new tongues, which they had never learned; and this was both a miracle, for confirming the truth of the Gospel, and a mean of spreading it among those that had not heard it. It saved the preachers vast labor in learning languages; and no doubt, they who by miracle were made masters of languages, were complete masters of all their native elegances, which were proper both to instruct and affect, and would very much recommend them and their preaching. (3.) They shall take up serpents. This was fulfilled in Paul, who was not hurt by the viper that fastened on his hand, which was acknowledged a great miracle by the barbarous people, Acts 28:5, 6. They shall be kept unhurt by that generation of vipers among whom they live, and by the malice of the old serpent. (4.) If they be compelled by persecutors to drink deadly poison, it shall not hurt them: of which very thing some instances are found in ecclesiastical history. (5.) They shall not only be preserved from hurt themselves, but they shall be enabled to do good to others; They shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover, as multitudes had done by their Master's healing touch. Many of the elders of the church had this power, as appears by Jam. 5:14. where, as an instituted sign of this miraculous healing, they are said to anoint the sick with oil, in the name of the Lord. With what assurance of success might they go about the executing of their commission, when they had such credentials!

V. 19, 20. Christ is now welcomed into the upper world. After the Lord had spoken what He had to say to his disciples, He went up into heaven, in a cloud; which we have a particular account of, (Acts 1:9.) and He had not only an admission, but an abundant entrance, into his kingdom: He was received up, in state, with loud acclamations of the heavenly hosts, and He sat on the right hand of God. Sitting is a 'Considering to what degrees of cursed refinement this art was brought, as well as how frequently execution was done, at that age, by giving poison to the condemned, such a promise will appear more important than the reader might at first apprehend.' Doddridge.

By these particulars, doubtless, the Savior conveys a general promise; pledging to his disciples, amidst the trials and dangers of their mission, the protection of that Almighty One, by whom 'the hairs of their heads were all numbered,' and without whom 'not a sparrow falleth to the ground.'

Ed. It is not said, that all who ever should believe, would be enabled to work miracles; or that none, except those who had saving faith, would perform them. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) but that 'these signs would follow them that believed,' that is, would be manifestly displayed among them.

V. 12--20. In whatever way the Lord is pleased to confirm his truth, our faith is apt to be weak; therefore, while He comforts his people, by 'manifesting Himself to them as He doth not to the world,' He often sees it needful to correct them for 'their hardness of heart,' in distrusting his faithful promises, as well as in not obeying his precepts. Yet He will 'heal their backslidings,' and 'love them freely,' and again employ them in his service.—The commission given by Christ to his ministers extends to 'every creature' throughout the world: so that wherever a human being is found, we are expressly commanded to propose to him the Gospel of Christ, whatever reception he may give it. Our instructions, likewise, as preachers of the Gospel, contain not only truths, promises, and precepts, but also most awful warnings: so that we as much preach the Gospel, when we declare, in the name of God, that 'he who believeth not shall be damned,' as that 'whosoever believeth' in Jesus, 'shall be saved.' However men may now despise, or dispute against, such solemn denunciations, or revile those who insist on them, they will doubtless be fulfilled in their most tremendous meaning, upon all who reject the Gospel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We indeed do not now profess to work miracles in confirmation of our instructions: but the Scriptures are proved to be of divine origin, and this will render all inexcusable who despise or neglect them. The effects also produced wherever the Gospel is faithfully preached and truly believed, in changing the tempers and characters of men, form a constant proof that the Gospel is 'the power of God unto salvation.' (Notes, Rom. 1: 13-16, v. 16. P. O. 16-21. 1 Cor. 1: 20-25.) and indeed, they, who truly believe in Christ, will be defended against the assaults of the serpent and his seed, and more than conquer them, and be preserved from the effects of those poisonous heresies, which he is continually propagating in the world. (P. O. Matt. 18: 11-20. Luke 24: 36-53.) Glorified Redeemer! send forth faithful ministers, every where, to preach the Gospel; work with them, and confirm thy word 'by signs following;' even by 'opening men's eyes, and by turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among all that are sanctified by faith in Thee.' Amen. SCOTT.

Verses 19, 20.

The addition of the word 'Amen,' may denote the evangelist's earnest desire, that the same powerful and gracious presence of Christ, and the same success, might still attend the preaching of the Gospel in every place. (Note, Matt. 28: 1, 20.) SCOTT.

'CONCLUSION. The Gospel of Mark, if not an abridgment of Matthew, contains a neat, perspicuous abridgment of the history of our Lord. As such, it is very satisfactory and well adapted to young persons, to bring them acquainted with the principal facts of the Gospel. It should not be used as a substitute for Matthew, but as corroborating evidence, and as containing many valuable hints for completing the history of our Lord.' DR. A. CLARKE.

NOTE.—It was long believed that the gospels were successively written as they are now placed, from the testimonies of Irenaeus, Origen, Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, &c. who so cite them. Hence Grotius, Mil. Weiststein, Thoinsson, &c. entertained no doubt of the priority of Mark's gospel to Luke's. But later critics question the validity of this assumption, Oecum. Busching, &c. And Griesbach, by an elaborate process, has furnished internal evidence of the priority of Luke's gospel; showing that Mark copied both Matthew and Luke; the whole of his gospel being contained in their gospels, with the exception of about four and twenty verses, presenting facts not recorded by either of his predecessors, but illustrative of the general subject.

1. In general it appears, that Mark rather adopted the language of Matthew, but the order of Luke in their joint sections, but neither implicitly.

2. He is usually more circumstantial and correct than they, in the relation of facts. Compare, for instance, their accounts of the death of John the Baptist with his, Mark 6:17-29; his masterly description of the storm, 4:36-41; his account of the fig-tree cursed, and temple purged, 11:12-26, in which he has judiciously separated these two transactions, as happening on two successive days, which Matthew had concisely blended together, on the day of our Lord's triumphal entrance. In the joint parable of the vineyard, he has critically corrected a verbal inaccuracy of Matthew, 21:23. "he dug a wine press," a vine vat, says Mark, 12:1. And the sentence against the rebellious tenants, which Matthew has put in the mouths of the chief priests and elders, (21:41.) is restored by Mark to Christ, (12:9.) while Luke gives their answer, perceiving the drift of the parable against themselves, 20:15.

In their joint accounts of Bartimeus, restored to sight, he follows Luke in preference to Matthew, who notices two blind men; while he follows the order of Matthew in preference to Luke, in representing the miracle as having been performed after our Lord left Jericho, in his way to Jerusalem, (Matt. 20:29, 30.) which Luke had represented as before his entrance into Jericho, (Luke 18:35. 19:1.) and yet Luke himself allows that Christ, at the time, was attended by a "multitude" (collected, as we may suppose, at Jericho,) Luke 18:36-39. Whereas Matthew and Mark both agree, that He came to Jericho, attended only by the twelve. Here, therefore, Mark has receded from Matthew, in one point, and corrected Luke in another, and noticed the leading blind man's name, omitted by both.

3. Indeed, to the accurate fidelity of this well-informed evangelist, we owe several important facts and illustrations omitted by his predecessors. Thus, he alone mentions wild beasts in the wilderness, 1:13. That additional circumstance in our Lord's first preaching, "the time is fulfilled," foretold by the prophets, 1:15. David's eating the shewbread in the days of Abiathar, 2:16. The emphatic surname, Boanerges, 3:17. Our Lord's anger and grief at the obduracy of the Jews, 3:5. The expression "He is beside Himself," (3:21.) the beautiful parable of the spontaneous growth of the seed, (4:26, 29.) the number of the swine, two thousand, (5:13.) Christ's expression, Talitha cumi, "Dame, arise," (5:41.) and Ephphatha, "Be opened," 7:34. The "green grass" characterizing the spring, (6:39.) noticed also by John. The distribution of the two fishes, (6:41.) likewise noticed by John. The first cock-crowing, during Peter's denial, 14:68. The addition of Salome to Matthew's party of women visiting the sepulchre, 16:2. The vision of the second angel there, 16:5. The women's silence respecting his message to Peter, 16:7, 8. Christ's appearance to Mary Magdalene first, (16:9.) and under another form to the disciples on the way to Emmaus, 16:12. The disbelief of the rest, and our Lord's censure, 16:13, 14. His commission to the apostles, 16:15-18. Their discharge of it, 16:20. All this is judiciously added to the conciser accounts of his predecessors, Matthew and Luke. Whereas had Luke followed Him, it is not credible that he would have omitted them all, since we see that John noticed those of Mark that coincided with his scheme, or came within the range of his gospel.

From the time the notion prevailed that Mark's gospel was merely an abridgment of Matthew's, as in the days of Augustine, (A. D. 385,) who calls Mark the "follower in the footsteps" and "abridger" of Matthew; it was natural to place his gospel next to Matthew's, with which it was supposed to have the closest connection. But the foregoing analysis abundantly proves, that Mark was not a servile copier, nor selected most judiciously, and sometimes enlarged, according to his plan, which was to give a succinct history of our Lord's ministry, commencing from John's preaching, (Mark 1: 1, 2.) to the ascension, (16:19.) and concluding with the preaching of the apostles every where (r. 20.) thus comprising, in a short compass, the substance of Matthew's, and of Luke's Gospel and Acts of the Apostles.

DR. HALLES

GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE,

WITH AN EXPOSITION AND PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

WE now enter on the labors of another evangelist, born, so Jerome, at Antioch, whose name, Luke, some take to be a contraction of Lucius. Some think him the only sacred writer not of the seed of Israel. He was a Jewish proselyte, and, as some conjecture, converted to Christianity by the ministry of Paul at Antioch, and, after his coming into Macedonia, (Acts 16: 10.) his constant companion. He had been a physician: hence Paul calls him Luke the beloved physician. (Col. 4: 14.) Whitby thinks it probable that he was one of the seventy disciples, and if so, he was an Israelite. Origen and Epiphanius say the same, and I see nothing to object to it, but some uncertain traditions of the ancients. He is supposed to have written this gospel while associated with Paul, and by his direction; and some think him the brother whom Paul speaks of, (2 Cor. 8: 18.) as if the meaning of it were, that he was celebrated in all the churches for writing this gospel, and that Paul means this when he speaks of his gospel. Rom. 2: 16. But there is no ground for that. Dr. Cave commends his style, and says he expresses himself in a vein of purer Greek than is to be found in the other writers of the holy story. He is more copious than the other evangelists, especially in what relates to the priestly office of Christ. When and where he wrote, is uncertain. Some think it was in Achaia, during his travels with Paul, seventeen (others say twenty-two) years after Christ's ascension; others, that it was at Rome, a little before he wrote the Acts of the Apostles, (Acts 28: 30. 2 Tim. 4: 11.) which would make it about twenty-seven years after the ascension, and about the fourth year of Nero. Jerome says he died when he was eighty-four years of age, and was never married. Some write that he suffered martyrdom; but if he did, where and when is uncertain. Nor, indeed, is there much more credit to be given to the Christian traditions concerning the writers of the New Testament, than to the Jewish concerning those of the Old. HENRY.

It is not certainly known of what country Luke originally was, or when he was converted to Christianity. He never once mentions himself, except as he uses the first person plural when writing several parts of Paul's history, and nothing is recorded of him, till we find him among the companions of that apostle; for Lucius of Cyrene seems to have been another person. (Acts 13: 1.) The more general tradition, however, is, that he was a Syrian; and having, as some report, practised physic at Rome, as a servant of some of the great men, it is thought, that, being rewarded with his liberty, he received a name from his patron, as was often the case, and then, returning to Antioch in Syria, became acquainted with Paul, embraced Christianity, was appointed to the ministry, and from that time attended the apostle in his travels. Indeed, it is certain he accompanied him in all his labors and sufferings during many years, probably till his martyrdom. (Acts 28: 7—10. Col. 4: 14. 2 Tim. 4: 11. Philom. 24.—Notes, Acts 16: 6—12, v. 10. 20: 1—6, 27: 1, 2.) Yet Paul never calls him 'his son,' as he does Timothy and Titus: it is therefore probable that he was converted before meeting the apostle at Antioch. Whether he was a Jew by birth, a proselyte, or a gentile, is also uncertain; though Paul's language seems to favor the latter opinion; for having spoken of several persons, as 'of the circumcision,' who had been his fellow-workers, and a comfort to him, he directly speaks in high terms of Epaphras and Luke; and as he could not mean to say that they had not been his fellow-workers, and a comfort to him, it seems to follow, that they were not of the circumcision. (Note, Col. 4: 9—14.) SCOTT. 'The most probable conjecture is that of Bolten, adopted by Kuinoel, that he was descended from gentile parents, and in his youth had embraced Judaism, from which he was converted to Christianity.' Horne, vol. 4. p. 260. ED. It is indeed a general opinion, that none of the sacred books of the New Testament were written by gentile converts, however eminent many of them were as preachers of the Gospel. But the Scripture lays down no rule of that kind. It is probable: the book of Job was written by Elihu, who was not of the nation of Israel; (Preface to Job); and certainly Nebuchadnezzar wrote the fourth chapter of Daniel.—Luke, besides his gospel, wrote also 'the Acts of the Apostles,' which conclude with a brief account of Paul's imprisonment at Rome. We may infer, therefore, with great probability, that he wrote his gospel before that event, and we may be sure that he had the apostle's sanction to what he did. His gospel, moreover, was certainly extant at an early period, and from the first received by the church as of divine authority: (Introduction to the New Testament.) and the early and unanimous reception of this, as well as of the Acts of the Apostles, as divinely inspired, and a part of the canon of Scripture, are alone sufficient to satisfy any reasonable person: and it is remarkable that, in recording our Lord's words when he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, Luke adds some particulars not expressly mentioned in the other gospels, which, taken with the extraordinary accomplishment of them during above seventeen hundred years, form an internal demonstration, that he wrote 'as he was moved by the Holy Ghost.' (Note, 21: 20—24.)—This gospel contains parables, discourses, miracles, and events, which had been omitted by the preceding evangelists; and several recorded by them are here passed over. The history begins with the circumstances preceding and attending the birth of John the Baptist, and that of Jesus Himself, and closes with a fuller account of what passed between our Lord's resurrection and ascension than Matthew or Mark had given.—Luke is supposed to have been a man of learning, previous to his being induced with spiritual gifts. His style is more pure and classical than that of the other evangelists; though not free from the Hebrew and Syriac idiom, which some make an objection to his being a gentile convert: yet it only proves that he had studied the Septuagint, and was conversant with Hellenists. The simplicity of his manner, however, is such, and such are his artlessness and power of fixing attention and exciting the affections, that many have thought him, as a writer, capable of standing the competition with the most celebrated historians of Greece itself. (Note, 7: 11—17.) SCOTT.

Scott remarks above, that Lucius of Cyrene appears to have been another person, and not the evangelist Luke; but Robinson, in Calmet, observes, that many have supposed him to be the same. Of this opinion, it may be mentioned too, was Taylor, the English editor of Calmet. He says, also, that every probability is against Luke's having been one of the seventy disciples. He, moreover, describes him as one who is proved by his writings, to have been of an uncommonly accurate and precise turn of mind, in confirmation and illustration of which, he cites and comments upon many passages of Luke's Gospel and of the Acts of the Apostles.

Respecting arrangement, 'it is allowed,' says Dr. A. Clarke, 'that there is considerable diversity in the order of time between Matthew and Luke; which is accounted for on the ground that Matthew relates his history according to a chronological order, while Luke relates his according to a classification of events.' Rosenmueller also is of the same opinion. Others, however, (as Taylor, above,) adopt Luke as the standard. Newcome, in the preface to his Harmony, says, that 'chronological order is not precisely observed by any of the evangelists: that John and Mark observe it most; and Matthew neglects it most.'

CHAP. I.

'We preface, and dedication to Theophilus, 1-4. An account of Zacharias and Elizabeth, 5-7. The angel Gabriel appears to Zacharias in the temple, and promises him a son in his old age, who will be of singular eminence and useful, 8-17. He is chastised for unbelief, by being struck dumb, 18-23. Elizabeth conceives, and hides herself, 24, 25. The angel appears to the virgin Mary; and assures her that she should become the mother of the Messiah, the King of Israel, by the power of the Holy Spirit, 26-33. Her humble faith and acquiescence, 34-35. She visits Elizabeth, and is visited by her; she prophesies, and praises God, 36-39. The birth, circumcision, and naming of John the Baptist, 37-40. Zacharias restored to the use of speech, prophetically praises God, 64-65. The manner in which John spent his youth, 80.

CHAP. I. v. 1-4. The narrative this evangelist gives (or rather God by him) of the life of Christ, begins earlier than either Matthew or Mark. We have reason to thank God for them all, as we have, for all the gifts and graces of Christ's ministers, which, in one make up what is wanting in another, and, together, make a harmony.

Complimentary prefaces and dedications are justly condemned by the wise and good; but not such as are useful and instructive; as this, in which Luke dedicates his gospel to his friend Theophilus, not as to his patron, to protect it, but as to his pupil, to learn it, and hold it fast. It is not certain who this Theophilus was; the name signifies a friend of God; some think it means any and every lover of God; Hammond quotes some of the ancients understanding it so; and then it teaches us, that those who are truly lovers of God, will heartily welcome the Gospel of Christ, the design and tendency of which are, to bring us to God. But it is rather to be understood of some particular person, probably a magistrate; because Luke gives him here the same title of respect which Paul gave Festus the governor, Acts 26: 25. Note, Religion does not destroy civility and good manners, but teaches us, according to the usages of our country, to give honor to whom honor is due.

1. Observe, why Luke wrote this gospel. It is certain he was moved by the Holy Ghost, not only to it, but in it; and in both as a reasonable creature, and not a machine; and he was made to consider,

1. That the things he wrote, were things most surely believed among all Christians; things which they ought therefore to be instructed in, and which ought to be transmitted to posterity, and, in order to that, committed to writing, which is the surest way of conveyance to the ages to come: not things of doubtful disputations, about which Christians may safely differ and hesitate; but things which are, and ought to be, most surely believed,—things which were performed, (so some,) which Christ and his apostles did, and did with such circumstances as gave a full assurance that they were really done, so that they have gained an established, lasting credit. Note, though it is not the foundation of our faith, yet it is a support to it, that the articles of our creed are things that have been long most surely believed. The doctrine of Christ is what thousands of the wisest and best of men have centured their souls upon, with the greatest assurance and satisfaction.

2. That a declaration of those things should be made in order; that the history of the life of Christ should be methodized. When things are put in order, we know the better where to find them for our own use, and how to keep them for the benefit of others.

3. That many not inspired had undertaken to publish narratives of the life of Christ; which, though well designed, and useful, were not so well prepared as might be, nor intended for perpetuity. Note, Others' labors in the Gospel, if faithful and honest, we ought to commend and encourage, and not to despise, though imperfect; yet they must not be reckoned to supersede ours, but rather to quicken them.

4. That the truth of the things he had to write, was confirmed by the concurring testimony of those who were competent and unexceptionable witnesses of them, v. 2. Note, (1.) The apostles were ministers of the word of Christ, who is the Word, (so some understand it,) or of the doctrine of Christ, 1 John 1: 1. They had not a Gospel to make as masters, but a Gospel to preach as ministers. (2.) They were eye-witnesses, and ear-witnesses. They themselves heard the doctrine, and saw the miracles of Christ; and therefore could not but speak, with the greatest assurance, the things they had seen and heard, Acts 4: 20. (3.) They were so from the beginning of Christ's ministry, (v. 2.) when He wrought his first miracle, John 2: 11. They accompanied with Him all the time that He went in and out among them, (Acts 1: 21.) so that they not only heard and saw all that which was sufficient to confirm their faith, but, if there had been any thing to shock it, had opportunity to discover it. (4.) The written Gospel, which we now have, exactly agrees with that which was first preached. (5.) He himself had a perfect understanding of what he wrote, from the first, v. 3. Some think He would here imply that those who had written before him, had not a perfect understanding of

NOTES.

CHAP. I. v. 1-4. Matthew and Mark could not be called 'many' and the former of them at least wrote from his personal knowledge, as well as under the guidance of the Holy Spirit; while the persons here mentioned had written from report. We must therefore understand the evangelist of some compilations, which have been lost very long since; for publishing and circulating authentic narratives would soon discredit spurious ones.

Most surely believed.] Most fully proved, or most certainly performed; for either the evidence by which they were attested, or the conviction which arose from the evidence of their having been accomplished, may be intended. Eye witnesses.] The apostles seem especially intended. Most expositors suppose the second verse to point out the manner, in which the evangelist had derived his information: yet it is directly connected with the first verse, and precedes the writer's first mention of himself. Luke evidently acquired his acquaintance with the Gospel, by information and testimony, and not as an eye-witness. This history he addressed to Theophilus, for his more full instruction in Christianity. Theophilus signifies, A lover of God: he appears to have been a person of rank and authority; for the title, 'Most excellent,' is the same in the original, which is elsewhere addressed to the Roman governors. (Marg. Ref. f.—Note, Acts 26: 24-29, v. 25.) The title was given to Theophilus with greater propriety. The word rendered 'instructed,' relates to the initiatory instruction in the first principles of Christianity, in which the converts were afterwards to be more fully taught and established. 'Luke thought not what was delivered by word of mouth only, even by the eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, sufficient to give Theophilus a knowledge of the certainty of these things, without writing the gospel. He held it not unlawful, or unfit, for a layman, or any Christian, to read the Scriptures; nor such a one insufficient, by thus reading, to understand the things in which he had been instructed.' Whitby. 'The very circumstance of the number of such narratives, at so early a period, is itself an evidence, that there was something in the first publication of the Christian doctrine, which excited the curiosity, and awakened the attention, of persons of all ranks and denominations; inasmuch, that every narrative, which proceeded to furnish me with additional information concerning so extraordinary a personage as Jesus, seems to have been read with avidity.' Campbell.

From the very first.] Sometimes rendered 'from above.' (John 3: 31. Jam. 1: 17. 3: 15, 17.) It is however often used in another sense. (John 3: 3, 7; Acts 28: 5. Gal. 4: 9.) No doubt, Luke wrote under the superintending inspiration of the Holy Spirit; yet this word cannot properly be adduced as a proof of it, nor does it at all imply, that he had his information 'from above,' without the intervention of any ordinary methods of information.

Scott.

(1.) 'Whereas many have undertaken to compose the history of those facts, which have been confirmed among us Christians with the fullest and most satisfactory evidence.'

Storr and Platt understand Luke here, to refer, undoubtedly, to interpolated copies of Matthew's gospel, which had become numerous before Luke wrote his gospel. See Bib. Theol. vol. 1, p. 142. — Ed.

In these histories a simple narrative of the facts is given; but no attempt is made, by argument, asseveration, or animated expression, to bias the understanding, or work upon the passions. The naked truth is left to its own native evidence. The writers betray no suspicion of its insufficiency. This method of theirs has more genuine dignity than the other, and if I mistake not, has been productive of more durable consequences than ever yet resulted from the arts of rhetoricians, and the enticing words of man's wisdom.

(2.) Word, 1. 'Some have conjectured that logos, the word, here signifies Christ, as in the beginning of St. John's gospel: perhaps it may; but I did not think it so evident, as to venture fixing it to that sense.'

DODDRIEGE.

Ministers of the word.] 'Those who took part in the affair, and bore a part in the things done; i. e. the relations, friends, and apostles of Christ, and the seventy disciples. So Beza, Hammond, Erasmus, Grotius, Rosenm., and Kuinoel.'

BLOOMFIELD.

It is impossible, on reflection, to hesitate a moment in affirming, that the historian here meant to acquaint us, that he had received his information from those who had attended Jesus, and been witnesses of every thing during his public ministration upon the earth, and who, after his ascension, had been intrusted by Him with the charge of propagating his doctrine throughout the world.

CAMPBELL.

(3.) To write unto thee in order.] 'It is chiefly on the authority of this clause that M. Le Clerc, and many other modern harmonizers have thought, (as Beza also did,) that all the other gospels are to be reduced to the order of Luke, wherever they differ from it: a conclusion which I apprehend to be an occasion of many errors, and particularly injurious to the character of Matthew; and the foundation of which is very precarious: since it is evident, this evangelist might, with great propriety, be said to have given an orderly account of the history of Christ, as the leading facts are in their due series, though some particulars are transposed.'

DODDRIEGE.

We cannot conclude from the words in order, that the order of time is better observed by this, than by any other evangelist.

CAMPBELL.

Theophilus.] 'The most probable opinion is that of Dr. Lardner, now generally adopted, viz that as Luke composed his gospel in Greece, Theophilus was a man of rank of the same country.'

the certainty of those things; to know not only what we believe, but why we believe it, that we may be able to give a reason of the hope that is in us.

v. 5—25. Matthew and Mark began the gospel with the baptism of John, and his ministry, which commenced about six months before our Savior's; Luke therefore, designing to give a more particular account than had been given of our Savior's conception and birth, determines to do so of John Baptist, who in both was his harbinger and forerunner. The evangelist determines thus, not only because it is commonly reckoned a satisfaction and entertainment to know something of the original extraction and early days of those who afterward prove great men, but because in the beginning of these were many things miraculous, and presages of what they afterward proved. In these verses, our inspired historian begins as early as the conception of John Baptist. Now observe here,

1. The account given of his parents; v. 5. They lived in the days of Herod the king, a foreigner, and a deputy for the Romans, who had lately made Judea a province of the empire. This is taken notice of, to show that the secpire was quite departed from Judah, and therefore that now was the time for Shiloh to come, according to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. 49: 10. The family of David now sunk, was to rise, and flourish again, in the Messiah. Note, None ought to despair of the reviving and flourishing of religion, even then when civil liberties are lost, Israel is enslaved, yet then comes the Glory of Israel.

Now the father of John Baptist was Zacharias, a priest, a son of Aaron. No families in the world were ever so honored of God as those of Aaron and David; with one was made the covenant of priesthood, with the other that of royalty; both had forfeited their honor, yet the Gospel again puts honor up on both in their latter days, on that of Aaron in John Baptist, on that of David in Christ, and then both were extinguished and lost. Christ's was of David's house, his forerunner of Aaron's, for his priestly agency and influence opened the way to his kingly authority and dignity. This Zacharias was of the course of Abia; when in David's time the family of Aaron was multiplied, he di-

(4.) Instructed. The word expresses, with great accuracy, the instructions given to those who were training up for admission to the Christian church: whose name of catechumens was, as it is well known, derived from hence, and applied without any particular regard to the age of the persons concerned. DODDRIDGE.

It appears that Theophilus had already received the first elements of the Christian doctrine, but had not as yet been completely grounded in them. Every man should labor to acquire the most correct knowledge and indubitable certainty of those doctrines, on which he stakes his eternal salvation. DR. A. CLARKE.

Verſes 5—7.

Zacharias was not, as some have imagined, high priest. Zacharias was chosen by lot to burn incense: the high priest did it by the right of succession, and in the holy of holies, into which Zacharias entered not. Zacharias was priest of the course of Abia; whereas the high priest was of no course at all. These several courses began on the sabbath-day, and continued to serve till the next sabbath-day. — Walt. — Notes. 2 Kings 11: 5—9. 1 Chr. 23: 2—6. 24: 10. Ezra 2: 36—39. BATHSHUA was thought a very heavy affliction by the Jews; yet Zacharias gave no countenance to the practice of polygamy or divorce, by taking another wife. (Notes, Gen. 16: 1—6.) The lat-tered them into twenty-four courses, for the more regular performance of their office, that it might never be either neglected for want of hands, or engrossed by a few. The eighth of those was that of Abia, (1 Chron. 24: 10.) who was descended from Eleazar, Aaron's eldest son: but Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that many of the families of the priests were lost in the captivity, so that after their return they took in those of other families, retaining the names of the heads of the respective courses. The wife of this Zacharias was of the daughters of Aaron too, and her name was Elisabeth, the very same name with Elisheba the wife of Aaron, Exod. 6: 23. The priests (Josephus saith) were very careful to marry within their own family, that they might maintain the dignity of the priesthood, and keep it without mixture.

Now that which is observed concerning Zacharias and Elisabeth is,

1. That they were a very religious couple, v. 5. They were so in his sight, whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth; they were sincerely and really so. They are righteous indeed, that are so before God, as Noah, Gen. 7: 1. They approved themselves to Him, and He was graciously pleased to accept them. It is a happy thing when those that are joined to each other in marriage, are both joined to the Lord: and it is especially requisite that the priests, the Lord's ministers, should with their yoke-fellows be righteous before God, that they may be examples to the flock, and rejoice their hearts. (1.) Their being righteous before God was evidenced by the course and tenor of their conversation; they showed it, not by their talk, but by their works; by the way they walked in, and the rule they walked by. (2.) They were of a piece with themselves; for their devotions and their conversations agreed. They walked not only in the ordinances of the Lord, which related to divine worship, but in the commandments of the Lord, which have reference to all the instances of a good conversation, and must be regarded. (3.) They were universal in their obedience; not that they never in any thing came short of their duty, but it was their constant care and endeavor to come up to it. (4.) Herein, though they were not sinless, yet they were blameless; nobody could charge them with any open, scandalous sin; they lived honestly and inoffensively, as ministers and their families are in a special manner concerned to do, that the ministry be not blamed in their blame.

2. That they had been long childless, v. 7. Children are a heritage of the Lord. They are valuable, desirable blessings; yet many there are in a married state, who are righteous before God, and, if they had children, would bring them up in his fear, who yet are not thus blessed, while the men of this world are full of children, (Ps. 17: 14.) and send forth their little ones like a flock, John 21: 11. Elisabeth was barren, and they began to despair of ever having children, for they were both now well stricken in years. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been long childless, as Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Samson, Samuel, and so here John Baptist—to make their birth the more remarkable, and the blessing of it the more valuable to their parents; and to show that when God keeps his people long waiting for mercy, of these, especially, was common at that time; yet the pious Jews generally disapproved it. (Notes, Matt. 23: 31, 32. 19: 3—12.)

The priests employed in sacred services at Jerusalem were present in the temple, not only by day, but also as watchers by night. They prepared not only the victims, but also the lamps and the wood, and did whatever handy work was to be done. ROSENEM.

9 According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord.

And then, if, as Dr. Lightfoot reckons, this course of Abia fell on the seventeenth day of the third month, the month Sivan, answering to part of May and part of June, it is worth observing, that the portions of the law and the prophets, which were read this day in the synagogues, were very agreeable to that which was doing in the temple; namely, the law of the Nazarites, (Num. 6;) and the conception of Samson, Judg. 13.

While Zacharias was burning incense in the temple, the whole multitude of the people were praying without, v. 10. Dr. Lightfoot says, the priests of that course that then served, were constantly in the temple, at the hour of prayer, and if it were the sabbath-day, those of that course also that had been in waiting the week before, and the Levites that served under the priests, and the men of the station, as the rabbins call them, who were the representatives of the people, in putting their hands upon the head of the sacrifices, and many besides, who, moved by devotion, left their employments, for that time, to be present at the service of God; and those would make up a great multitude, especially on sabbaths and feast-days: now these all addressed themselves to their devotions, (in mental prayer, for their voice was not he sometimes is pleased to recompense them for their patience, by doubling the worth of it when it comes.

II. The appearing of an angel to his father Zacharias, as he was ministering in the temple, v. 8, 11. Zacharias the prophet was the last of the Old Testament that was conversant with angels; and Zacharias the priest the first in the New Testament. Observe,

1. How Zacharias was employed in the service of God, v. 8. It was his week of waiting, and he was on duty. Though his family was not built up, yet he made conscience of doing the work of his own place and day. Though we have not desired mercies, yet we must keep close to enjoined services; and in our diligent and constant attendance on them, we may hope that mercy and comfort will come at last. Zacharias' lot was to burn incense morning and evening that week, as other services fell to other priests also by lot. The services were directed by lot, that some might not decline them, and others engross them; and that, the disposal of the lot being from the Lord, they might have the satisfaction of a divine call to the work. This was not the high priest's burning incense on the day of atonement, as some have fondly imagined, who have thought by that to find out the time of our Savior's birth, but the burning of the daily incense at the altar of incense, (v. 11.) which was in the temple, (v. 9.) not in the most holy place, into which the high priest entered. The Jews say that one and the same priest burned not incense twice in all his days, (there were such a multitude of them,) at least never more than one week. It is very probable that this was upon the sabbath-day, because that this was upon the sabbath-day, because there was a multitude of people attending, (v. 10.) which ordinarily was not on a week day; and thus God usually puts honor upon his own day. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7. Those things, which we are required 'most surely to believe,' are most abundantly proved to be of divine original; and if our faith were as strong, as the truths and promises are certain, we should continually rejoice in them... We should therefore endeavor to obtain a more exact knowledge of them; and also labor to bring our friends and neighbors to an established faith in them... (Note, Tit. 2: 9, 10.) This is peculiarly needful and becoming in those who sustain the office of ministers. Some alloy to our comfort must be expected in every situation; and this consideration should reconcile us to our own trials; as we probably should be no gainers, could we exchange condition with those whom we are most apt to envy. But those who 'grow in grace' as they advance in years, and who steadily attend to their proper employment, may hope for increasing peace and comfort in the eve of life. (Notes, Ps. 71: 17-24. 92: 13-15.) SCOTT.

(7.) 'Polygamy, as well as divorces, were, for the hardness of their hearts, tolerated among the Jews; but they seem both to have been, in this age at least, disapproved by persons of the best character. Compare Mat. 2: 14-16. and 1 Tim. 3: 2.' DODDRIDGE.

Verses 8-10.

Zacharias burning incense on the golden altar within the sanctuary, at the same time that a great number of people were collected without, in the courts of the temple, silently offering up their prayers and supplications, was an apt type of Christ's intercession in heaven, through which the prayers of believers, in every part of the outer court of the church on earth, ascend with acceptance before God. (Marg. Ref. r. s. - Notes, Ex. 30: 1-10. Rev. 8: 1-6.) SCOTT.

(8.) 'The course of Abia (v. 5) to which the service returned after an interval of one hundred and sixty-eight days, was the eighth in order, and on duty the fourth month of the Jewish year, answering to our July. Elisabeth conceived about the month of August, after Zacharias' return. John therefore would seem to have been born about the month of May, and Jesus (v. 36.) about September or October. Yet these things are uncertain.' ROSENEM.

(9.) His lot was to burn incense. 'Since the sacerdotal offices were various, it was agreed among the priests, that all should be assigned, or distributed, by lot. By the first lot, was designated he who should cleanse the outside of the altar. Secondly, thirteen were taken who should sacrifice the lamb, sprinkle the blood, trim the lamps, and burn and scatter the incense. Thirdly, he who should ascend the high altar, and lay upon it the member, of the victim. The most honorable heard,) when, by the tinkling of a bell, they had notice that the priest was gone in to burn incense.

Observe here, how the true Israel of God were always a praying people; and prayer is the great and principal service by which we honor God, obtain his blessing, and keep up our communion with Him. Even then, when ritual and ceremonial appointments were in full force, as this of burning incense, yet moral and spiritual duties were required to go along with them, and were principally looked at. David knew that when he was at a distance from the altar, his prayer might be heard without incense, Ps. 141: 2. But when he was compassing the altar, the incense could not be accepted without prayer, any more than the shell without the kernel. It is not enough to be where God is worshipped, if our hearts do not join in the worship, and go along with the minister, in all the parts of it. If he burn the incense ever so well, in the most pertinent, judicious, lively prayer, if we be not at the same time praying in concurrence with him, what will it avail us? All our prayers are acceptable and successful, only in virtue of the incense of Christ's intercession in the temple of God above. To this usage in the temple-service there seems to be an allusion, (Rev. 8: 1, 3, 4.) where we find there was silence in heaven, as there was in the temple, for half an hour, while the people were silently lifting up their hearts to God in prayer; and that there was an angel, the angel of the covenant, who offered up much incense with the prayers of all saints before the throne. We cannot expect an interest in Christ's intercession, if we do not pray, and pray with our spirits, and continue instant in prayer. Nor can we expect our best prayers to be accepted, and bring in an answer of peace, but through the mediation of Christ, who ever lives, making intercession.

2. How, when thus employed, he was honored with a special messenger sent to him from heaven, v. 11. Some observe, that we never read of an angel appearing in the temple, with a message from God, but here only, because there God had other ways of making known his mind, as the Urim and Thummim, and by a still small voice from between the cherubims; but the ark and the oracle were wanting in the second temple, and therefore when an express was to be sent, an angel was employed, and so the gospel, as the law, was given at first very much by the ministry of angels; the appearance of which we often read of in the Gospels and in the Acts; though the design both of the law and of the gospel, when brought to perfection, of all the functions was that of burning incense; an office which could only be discharged once.' WETSTEIN.

The temple. This word generally means the sanctuary; but includes the courts and outer buildings.

The temple. The sanctuary. The temple comprehended the whole edifice, with all its inclosures, piazzas, and other buildings; the sanctuary, only what was termed, by way of eminence, the house, consisting of the vestibule, the holy place or sanctuary, and the most holy. The altar of incense, on which the perfumes were burnt, was in the sanctuary: the people who were praying, without, were in the temple, but not in the sanctuary. CAMPBELL.

(10.) Praying without, at the time of incense. 'This was the foundation of that elegant figure, by which prayer is so often compared to incense; (see Ps. 141: 2. Mal. 1: 11. Rev. 8: 3, 4.) and perhaps, one reason of obtaining incense might be, to intimate the acceptableness of those pious prayers, which were to accompany it. And indeed burning fragrant perfumes was, and in the eastern nations still is, so important a part of the entertainment of illustrious families, that one might well expect it in the house of God. It is so plain that this was only an office of daily ministration, and that Zacharias was one of the ordinary priests, that one cannot but be surprised, that any one should ever conclude from this circumstance of the story, that Zacharias was Sagan, or assistant to the high priest, and was now performing his grand office on the day of atonement, and so on this foundation, should calculate the birth of John the Baptist, and of Christ, and all the other feasts which depend upon them: yet this is done in the calendars, both of the Roman and Greek church.' DODDRIDGE.

11 And there 'appeared unto him an angel of the Lord standing on the right side of the altar of incense.

12 And when Zacharias saw him, he was troubled, and fear fell upon him.

13 But the angel said unto him, 'Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John.'

14 And thou shalt have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth.

15 For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb.

salvation of the whole world; neral, 'The prayers thou now makest, and all thy prayers, are accepted of God, and come up for a memorial before Him; (as the angel said to Cornelius, when he visited him at prayer; (Acts 10: 30, 31.) and this shall be the sign that thou art accepted of God, Elisabeth shall bear thee a son.' Note, It is very comfortable to praying people, to know that their prayers are heard; and those mercies are doubly sweet, that are given in answer to prayer.

2. He shall have a son in his old age, by Elisabeth his wife, who had been long barren, that by his birth, which was next to miraculous, people might be was to settle another way of correspondence, more spiritual, between God and man. This angel stood on the right side of the altar of incense, the north side of it, saith Dr. Lightfoot, on Zacharias' right hand; compare Zech. 3: 1. Some think he appeared coming out of the most holy place, which led him to stand at the right side of the altar.

3. The impression this made on Zacharias, v. 12. Though righteous before God, and blameless in his conversation, yet he could not be without some apprehensions at the sight of one whose visage and surrounding lustre bespoke him more than human. Ever since the fall, man has been unable to bear the glory of such revelations, and his conscience afraid of evil tidings; even Daniel himself could not bear it, Dan. 10: 8. Hence God chooses to speak to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid.

III. The angel's message, v. 13. He began his message, as angels generally did, with, Fear not. Perhaps it had never been Zacharias' lot to burn incense before; and, being a very serious conscientious man, we may suppose him full of care to do it well, and perhaps when he saw the angel, he was afraid lest he came to rebuke him for some mistake or miscarriage; 'No,' saith the angel, 'fear not; I have no ill tidings. Fear not, but compose thyself, that thou mayst with a sedate and even spirit receive the message I have to deliver to thee.'

Let us see what that is.

1. His prayers are answered. Fear not, Zacharias, for thy prayer is heard. If he means his particular prayer for a son, it must be the prayer he had formerly made, when he was likely to have children; but we may suppose, as he and his wife had now done expecting that mercy, so they had done praying for it; like Moses, it sufficeth them, and they speak no more to God of that matter, Deut. 3: 26. God looks a great way back to the prayers he had made long since for and with his wife, as Isaac for and with his, Gen. 25: 21. Note, Prayers of faith are filed in heaven, and though not presently answered, are not forgotten. Prayers made when we were young and coming into the world, may be answered when we are old and going out of the world. But, if he means the prayer he was now offering with his incense, we may suppose it as according to the duty of his place, for the Israel of God, and the performance of the promises made to them concerning the Messiah, and the coming of his kingdom. Some of the Jewish writers themselves say that the priest, when he burnt incense, prayed for the and now that prayer shall be heard. Or, in general, 'The prayers thou now makest, and all thy prayers, are accepted of God, and come up for a memorial before Him; (as the angel said to Cornelius, when he visited him at prayer; (Acts 10: 30, 31.) and this shall be the sign that thou art accepted of God, Elisabeth shall bear thee a son.' Note, It is very comfortable to praying people, to know that their prayers are heard; and those mercies are doubly sweet, that are given in answer to prayer.

Verses 11-17.

(Marg. Ref. e.-Notes, Num. 6: 1-21. Judg. 13: 2-5, v. 4, 5.) Though 'conceived in sin,' like other men, yet a saving change would be wrought in his soul by the regenerating Spirit of God, even at or before his birth: which would appear in his eminent wisdom and piety from his earliest youth. (Marg. Ref. f. g.) In due time he would be brought forth as a zealous preacher and a successful reformer. (Note, Mat. 4: 6-6.) John went before Christ, as his forerunner, to prepare the people for him; yet the LORD THEIR GOD is the antecedent to the pronoun 'Him.' 'Shall he turn to the Lord their God; and he shall go before him, &c.' so that the angel's address was evidently calculated to induce the belief, that Christ was the Lord God of Israel; and must have been improper, and suited to mislead us, on any other supposition. (Marg. Ref. h.-o., Notes, 76-79. 3: 4-6. Is. 40: 3-5, Mat. 3: 1-4. John 1: 30-34. 3: 27-26, v. 28, 29.) Dr. Campbell renders the clause, 'he shall go before them,' without the least intimation in the notes of any different reading, or even conjectural alteration. 'John, in Hebrew, Johanan, which occurs nearly thirty times in the Old Testament, is derived from JEHOVAH and chen, and properly signifies the grace and favor of the LORD.' Doddridge. SCOTT.

(1.) There appeared an angel of the Lord. 'There had been neither prophecy nor angelic ministry vouchsafed to this people for about four hundred years.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Altar of incense. The altar was double; one outward, for ordinary purposes; the other, which was used for the burning of incense, inward.

(13) Thy prayer is heard. 'It is reasonable to conclude, that these words chiefly relate to his prayers for the deliverance of Israel by the Messiah, whose appearance was then expected by pious persons, conversant in the sacred writings; (Luke 2: 25, 38, 19: 11. 23: 51.) and the more earnestly desired just at this time, as they suffered so many grievous things, by the oppression of the Romans, and the tyranny of Herod, which, toward the close of his reign, grew more and more insupportable.' DODDRIDGE.

Thou shalt call, &c. See Henry's note on verse 62. ED.

(14) Thou shalt have joy. 'He will be joy and gladness to thee. A child of prayer and faith is likely to be a source of comfort to his parents. Were proper attention paid to this point, there would be fewer disobedient children in the world; and the number of broken-hearted parents would be lessened. But what can be expected from the majority of matrimonial connections begun without the fear of God, and carried on without his love?' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(15) Strong drink. 'The original word sikera comes from a Hebrew word meaning to inebriate. Any inebriating liquor, says Jerome, is called sikera, whether made of corn, apples, honey, dates, or any other fruits. One of the four prohibited liquors among the East Indian Moslimans, is called sikir; made by steeping fresh dates in water till they take effect in sweetening it: this liquor is abominable and unlawful. Helaya. Probably this is the very liquor referred to in the text. From this word comes our English term cider or sider.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

'All liquors, however weak, which had undergone fermentation, were understood to be prohibited both to the Nazarites and to the priests, during the week wherein they officiated in the temple.' CAMPBELL.

This son shall be the distinguished favorite of Heaven, and a distinguished blessing to the earth. The honor of having a son is nothing to the honor of having such a son.

He shall be great in the sight of the Lord; those are great indeed, that are so in God's sight, not those that are so in the eye of a vain and carnal world. God will set him before his face continually, employ him in his work, and send him on his errands; and that shall make him truly great and honorable. He shall be a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, and on that account as great as any that ever were born of women, Matt. 11: 11. He shall live retired from the world, and when he makes a public appearance, it will be very mean; but he shall be much, he shall be great, in the sight of the Lord.

He shall be a Nazarite, set apart to God from every thing that is polluting; in token of which he shall drink neither wine nor strong drink, or rather, neither old wine nor new; for most think that the word here translated strong drink, signifies some sort of wine; perhaps what we call made wines, or any thing that is intoxicating. He shall be, as Samson, (Judg. 13: 7.) and Samuel, (1 Sam. 1: 11.) a Nazarite for life. It is spoken of as a great instance of God's favor to his people, that he raised up of their sons for prophets, and their young men for Nazarites, (Amos 2: 11.) as if those that were designed for a little before Him, to give notice of his approach, and to prepare people to receive Him.

He shall go in the spirit and power of Elias. That is, First, He shall be such a man as Elias was, and do such works as Elias did; like him, wear a hairy garment and a leathern girdle, and live retired from the world; like him, preach repentance and reformation to a corrupt and degenerate age; like him, be bold and zealous in reproving sin, and witnessing against it even in the greatest; and be hated and persecuted for it by a Herod and his Herodias, as Elijah was by an Ahab and his Jezebel. He shall be carried on in his work, as Elijah was, by a divine spirit and power, which shall crown his ministry with wonderful success. As Elias went before the writing prophets of the Old Testament, and did, as it were, usher in that signal period of the Old Testament dispensation by a little writing of his own, (2 Chron. 21:12.) so John Baptist went before Christ and his apostles, and introduced the gospel-dispensation by preaching the substance of the gospel-doctrine and duty, Repent, with an eye to the kingdom of heaven. Secondly, He shall be that very person prophesied of by Malachi under the name of Elijah, (Mal. 4:5.) who should be sent before the coming of the day of the Lord. Behold! I send you a prophet, even Elias; not Elias the Tishbite, (as the LXX have corruptly read it, to favor the Jews' traditions,) but a prophet in the spirit and power of Elias, as the angel here expounds it.

He shall turn many of the children of Israel to the Lord their God, shall incline their hearts to receive the Messiah, by awakening them to a prophets, were trained up under the discipline of the Nazarites; Samuel and John Baptist were, which intimates that those that would be eminent servants of God, and employed in eminent services, must live a life of self-denial and mortification, be dead to the pleasure of sense, and keep their minds from every thing darkening and disturbing to them.

He shall be abundantly qualified for the eminent services to which he shall be called; He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb. Observe, [1.] Those that would be filled with the Holy Ghost, must be sober and temperate, and very moderate in the use of wine and strong drink; for that is it that fits him for this. Be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit, with which that is not consistent, Eph. 5:18. [2.] It is possible that infants may be wrought upon by the Holy Ghost, even from their mother's womb; for John Baptist even then was filled with the Holy Ghost, and it appeared very early that he was sanctified. God has promised to pour out his Spirit on the seed of believers, (Isa. 44:3.) and their first springing up in a dedication of themselves betimes to God is the fruit of it, v. 4, 5. Who then can forbid water, that they should not be baptized, who, for aught we know, (and we can say no more of the adult, witness Simon Magus,) have received the Holy Ghost as well as we, and have the seeds of grace sown in their hearts? Acts 10:47.

He shall be instrumental for the conversion of many souls to God, and the preparing of them to receive and entertain the Gospel of Christ, v. 16, 17.

He shall be sent to the children of Israel, the Jews, to whom the Messiah also was first sent, and not to the Gentiles; to the whole nation, not to the family of the priests only, with which, though he was himself of that family, we do not find he had any particular intimacy or influence.

He shall go before the Lord their God; that is, before the Messiah, whom they must expect not as a temporal prince, but as their Lord and their God, to rule and defend, and serve them in a spiritual way, by his influence on their hearts. Thomas knew this, when he said to Christ, my Lord and my God, better than Nathanael did, when he said, Rabbi, thou art the King of Israel. John shall go before Him, a little before his approach, and to prepare people to receive of sin and a desire of righteousness. Whatever has a tendency to turn us from iniquity, will turn us to Christ as our Lord and our God: for those who, through grace, are wrought upon to shake off the yoke of sin, will soon be persuaded to take on themselves the yoke of the Lord Jesus.

Hereby he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, that is, of the Jews to the Gentiles; which was begun to be done by John Baptist, who came for a witness, that all through him might believe, baptizing Roman soldiers as well as Jewish Pharisees; and assuring those who gloried in Abraham, that God would out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, (Matt. 3:9.) which would tend to cure their enmity to the Gentiles. Dr. Lightfoot observes, it is the constant usage of the prophets to speak of the church of the Gentiles as children to the Jewish church, Isa. 54:5, 6, 13, 60:4, 9. 62:5. 66:12. When the Jews, that embraced the faith of Christ, were brought to join in communion with the Gentiles, that did so too, then the heart of the fathers was turned to the children. And he shall turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, that is, he shall introduce the Gospel, by which the Gentiles, who are now disobedient, shall be turned, not so much to their fathers the Jews, but to the faith of Christ, here called the wisdom of the just, in communion with the believing Jews; or thus, He shall turn the hearts of the fathers with the children, that is, the hearts of old and young; shall be instrumental to bring some of every age to be religious, to work a great reformation in the Jewish nation, to bring them off from a ritual, traditional religion, which they had rested in, and to bring them up to substantial, serious godliness: the effect of which will be, that enmities will die, and discord cease; and they that are at variance, being united in his baptism, will be better reconciled one to another. This agrees with the account Josephus gives of him, Antiq. lib. 18, cap. 7. 'Thus he turned the hearts of fathers and children to God and one another, by turning the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. True religion is the wisdom of just men, in distinction from the wisdom of this world. It is both our wisdom and our duty to be religious. Those who have been unbelieving and disobedient, may be turned to the wisdom of the just; divine grace can conquer the greatest ignorance and prejudice. The great design of the Gospel is, to bring people home to God, and to bring them nearer to one another; and on this errand John Baptist is sent. In the mention twice made of his turning people, there seems to be an allusion to the name of Tishbite, given to Elijah, which, some think, has an appellative signification, and therefore render it Elijah the converter; one that was much employed, and very successful, in conversion-work.'

Hereby he shall make ready a people prepared for the Lord; shall dispose their minds to receive Him and prepare them for the comforts of his coming. Note, All that are to be devoted to the Lord and made happy in Him, must first be prepared and made ready for Him. We must be prepared by grace in this world for glory in the other; by the terrors of the law, for the comforts of the Gospel; by the spirit of bondage, for the Spirit of adoption. Nothing has a more direct tendency to prepare people for Christ, than the doctrine of repentance received and submitted to. When sin is thereby

(17.) Turn the hearts of the fathers, &c.] 'By a very expressive figure of speech, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the rest of the patriarchs, are represented here as having their hearts alienated from the Jews, their children, because of their unbelief and disobedience; but that the Baptist should so far succeed in converting them to the Lord their God, that these holy men should again look upon them with delight, and acknowledge them for their children. Some think by the word children the Gentiles are meant, and by the fathers the Jews.'

Doddridge says, here is a plain allusion to Mal. 4:6, and admits, as probable, the interpretation of L' Enfant and others, who render it, 'to reconcile fathers and children, supposing it may relate to domestic dissensions inseparable from the variety of religious sects then amongst the Jews.'

Ed. Disobedient.] 'Or unbelieving, the persons who would no longer credit the predictions of the prophets, relative to the manifestation of the Messiah. Unbelief and disobedience are so intimately connected, that the same word in the sacred writings often serves for both.'

20 And, behold, 'thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed,' because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season.

21 And the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple.

22 And when he came out, he could not speak unto them: and they perceived that he had seen a vision in the temple; for he beckoned unto them, and remained speechless.

23 And it came to pass, that as soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he departed to his own house.

24 And after those days his wife Elisabeth conceived, and hid herself five months, saying in the Persian court are described by this, that they saw the king's face, Esth. 1: 14. 'Though I am now talking with thee here, yet I stand in the presence of God. I know his eye is upon me, and I dare not say any more than I have warrant to say. But I declare I am sent to speak to thee, and to show thee these glad tidings, which thou oughtest to have received cheerfully.'

(2.) The angel stops his mouth indeed, by exerting his power; 'That thou mayst object no more, behold, thou shalt be dumb,' v. 20. If thou wilt have a sign for the support of thy faith, it shall be such a one as shall be also the punishment of thine unbelief; thou shalt not be able to speak till the day that these things shall be performed,' v. 20. The same word signifies both dumb and deaf; and it is plain that he lost his hearing as well as his speech, for his friends made signs to him, (v. 62,) as well as he to them, v. 22. Now, in striking him dumb, [L.] God dealt justly with him, because he had objected against God's word. Hence we may take occasion to admire the patience of God, and his forbearance towards us, that we, who have so often spoken to his dishonor, have not been struck dumb, as Zacharias was, and as we had been, if God had dealt with us according to our sins: [2.] God dealt with him very kindly, tenderly and graciously. For, First, Thus he prevented his speaking any more such distrustful, unbelieving words. If he have thought evil, and will not himself lay his hands upon his mouth, God will. It is better not to speak at all, than to speak wickedly. Secondly, Thus he confirmed his faith; and by his being disabled to speak, he is enabled to think the better. If by the rebukes we are under for our sin, we be brought to give more credit to the word of God, we have no reason to complain of them. Thirdly, Thus he was kept from divulging the vision, and boasting of it, which otherwise he would have been apt to do, whereas it was designed for the present to be lodged as a secret with him. Fourthly, This was a great mercy that God's words should be fulfilled in their season, notwithstanding his sinful distrust. The unbelief of man shall not make the promises of God of no effect; 'thou shalt not be forever dumb, but only till the day that these things shall be performed';

(30.) Thou shalt be dumb. Many, by giving way to the language of unbelief, have lost the language of praise and thanksgiving for months, if not years. Dr. A. CLARK.

Verdes 21-25.

The interview between the angel and Zacharias would not take up much time; but the mind of Zacharias must have been occupied and agitated by a variety of reflections and emotions; so that he continued in the temple, some time after the angel had left him, perhaps employed in devotion. (Notes, Num. 6: 23-26.) (Notes, Judg. 11: 34-40. Is. 41: 1.)

then thy lips shall be opened, that thy mouth may show forth God's praise.' Thus, though God chastens the iniquity of his people with the rod, yet his loving kindness he will not take away.

V. The return of Zacharias to the people and at length to his family, and the conception of this child of promise.

1. The people staid, expecting Zacharias to come out of the temple, because he was to pronounce the blessing upon them in the name of the Lord; and though he staid beyond the usual time, yet they did not, as is too common in Christian congregations, hurry away without the blessing, but waited for him, marvelling that he tarried so long, and afraid lest something was amiss, v. 21.

2. When he came out, he was speechless, v. 22. He was now to have dismissed the congregation with a blessing, but is dumb, and not able to do it; that the people may be minded to expect the Messiah, who can command the blessing, who blesseth indeed, and in whom all the nations of the earth are blessed. Aaron's priesthood is now shortly to be silenced and set aside, to make way for the bringing in of a better hope.

3. He made a shift to give them to understand that he had seen a vision, for he beckoned to them, and remained speechless, v. 22. This represents to us the weakness and deficiency of the Levitical priesthood, in comparison with Christ's priesthood, and the dispensation of the Gospel. The Old Testament speaks by signs, and gives but imperfect intimations; it beckons to us, but remains speechless; it is the Gospel that speaks to us articulately, and gives us clear view of what in the Old Testament was seen through a glass darkly.

4. He staid out the days of his ministration; for he could burn incense, though dumb and deaf. When we cannot perform the service of God so well as we would, yet, if we perform it as well as we can, God will accept of us in it.

5. He then returned to his family, and his wife, by virtue of the promise, conceived, (v. 23, 24.) and, being sensible of it, she hid herself five months, and did not go abroad as usual. (1.) Lest she should do herself any prejudice, or any hurt to the conception. (2.) Lest she should contract any ceremonial pollution which might intrench upon the Nazarieth of her child, remembering the command given to Samson's mother in a like case, Judg. 13: 14. And though five months are mentioned, because of what follows in the sixth month, yet we may suppose she in like manner took care of herself during the whole time of her pregnancy. (3.) Some think she hid herself in excess of modesty, ashamed it should be said that one of her age should be with child. Or, it was in token of her humility, that she might not seem to boast of the honor God had put upon her. (4.) She hid herself for devotion, that she might spend her time in prayer and praise. The saints are God's hidden ones; she gives this reason for her retirement, 'For thus hath the Lord dealt with me; not only thus graciously in giving me a child, but thus honorably in giving me such a child as is to be a Nazarete;' (for so her husband might by writing signify to her;) 'he hath taken away my reproach among men.' Fruitfulness among the Jews, because of the promises of the increase of their nation, and the rising of the Messiah among them, was thought to be so great a blessing, that it was a great reproach to be barren; and those who were so though ever so blameless, were concluded to be guilty of some great sin unknown, for which tration, is literally liturgy, which signifies properly any public service, whether civil or military. But, in the Scriptures, it is applied to the public offices of religion. First, that of the priests and Levites, under the Mosaic law: Secondly, that of Christian priests, under the Gospel dispensation, including every branch of the sacerdotal office. In the ecclesiastical writers, it is chiefly applied to the public offices of prayer, performed morning and evening. Hammond. (24.) hid herself five months. That she might have the full proof of the accomplishment of God's promise, before she appeared in public, or spoke of her mercies. Dr. A. CLARK.

25 Thus hath the Lord dealt with me, in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men.

[Practical Observations.]

26 ¶ And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, 27 To a virgin espoused to a man, whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary.

the title and character of the house of David, and knew her genealogy, which, as long as the promise of the Messiah was to be fulfilled, was worth keeping; though now, to trace one's genealogy, is of little importance.

3. She was a virgin, but espoused to Joseph, a man, who, though like her of low estate, was also of the same royal stock, of the house of David, Matt. 1:20. Christ's mother was a virgin, because He was not to be born by ordinary generation, but miraculously; which was necessary, that, though He must partake of the nature of man, He might not of the corruption they were so punished. Now Elisabeth triumphs, that she is vindicated; Thus hath the Lord dealt with me, beyond any thought or expectation of mine, in the days wherein he looked on me. Note, In God's gracious dealings with us, we ought to observe his gracious regards to us.

V. 26-33. We have here all it was fit we should know concerning the incarnation and conception of our blessed Savior, six months after the conception of John. The same angel Gabriel, that was employed in communicating with Zacharias, being employed here also; as the same work of redemption is here carried on which was then begun. As bad angels are not of the redeemed, so good angels are not redeemers; yet they are employed by the Redeemer as his messengers, and they go cheerfully, because they are his Father's servants, and his children's friends.

I. We have here an account of the mother of our Lord, of whom He was to be born, whom, though we are not to pray to, yet we ought to praise God for.

1. Her name was Mary, the same name with Miriam, sister of Moses and Aaron. It signifies exalted, and a great elevation it was to her indeed, to be thus favored above all the daughters of the house of David.

2. She was of royal descent from David, and though poor and low in the world, went under of that nature; but He was born of a virgin espoused, to put honor upon the married state, that that might not be brought into contempt, (which was an ordinance in innocency,) by the Redeemer's being born of a virgin.

4. She lived in Nazareth, a city of Galilee, a remote corner of the country, in no reputation for religion or learning, but bordering on the heathen, and therefore called Galilee of the Gentiles: Christ's having his relations there, intimates favor for the Gentile world. And Dr. Lightfoot observes, that Jonah was by birth a Galilean, and Elijah and Elisha very much conversant in Galilee, who were all famous prophets of the Gentiles. The angel was sent to her at Nazareth. Note, No distance or disadvantage of place shall be a prejudice to those whom God has favors in store for. The angel carries his message as cheerfully to Mary at Nazareth in Galilee, as to Zacharias in the temple at Jerusalem.

II. The angel's address to her, v. 28. We are not told what she was doing, when he came unto her; but he surprised her with this salutation, Hail, thou that art highly favored. This was intended to raise in her, 1. A value for herself; which though it is very rare that any need, yet in some, who, like Mary, pore only on their low estate, there is occasion for. 2. An expectation of great news, not from abroad, but from above. Heaven designs, no doubt, uncommon favors for one whom an angel visits with such respect. Hail thou—rejoice thou; it was the usual form of salutation, and expresses esteem and good will.

(1.) She is dignified; 'Thou art highly favored. God, in his choice of thee to be the mother of the Messiah, has put peculiar honor on thee above that of Eve, who was the mother

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8-25. While by faith we view our great High Priest ministering in the temple above; and are encouraged to join in our petitions with those all over the earth, who every hour are approaching the mercy-seat by this 'new and living Way.' (Note, Heb. 10:19-22,) let us think how terrifying would be the appearance of visitants from the world of spirits; that we may be thankful for the invisible ministry of angels, and that the Lord sends his messages to us by men like ourselves, whose 'terror cannot make us afraid.' (Notes, Job 4:12-16. 33:1-7. If faithful, we need fear no evil, but may expect glad tidings; and if our prayers be accepted, all blessings will in due time be communicated. Nor should delays be construed into denials, for our prayers may be abundantly answered after we are gone to heaven.—We ought not to be anxious about having children, for we know not whether they would be cause of 'joy and gladness,' or the contrary.... Yet it is a peculiar favor to have children, who shall be gratefully remembered for their piety and usefulness; though in seeking that ours may be such, we should carefully observe the difference between a great man in the world's esteem, and one who is 'great in the sight of the Lord.' The great ones of the earth are mean and obscure, in the judgment of God, compared with a poor prophet or minister, who makes it his employment and joy to bring sinners to repentance, and to call on men to believe in Christ, and prepare for his coming to judge the world. This kind of greatness we may desire for our children; and with that view, we should early devote them to God, and bring them up for Him. Nor should we forget, that early and constant temperance, and indifference about worldly pleasures, are proper indications of future eminence and usefulness; that the increase of true godliness tends to the termination of contention; and that nominal Christians in general need conversion, as much as the heathen; even as the Israelites by birth did of old.—Even real believers are not always alike strong in faith; but are apt, when they lose sight of the power, truth, and love of God, to dishonor Him by unbelief; and their mouths are stopped in silence and confusion, when otherwise they would have been praising God with the voice of joy and gratitude. It is good, however, even under divine chastisement, to go on with our work, as far as we are able: for thus our afflictions may be mitigated and sanctified, and returning mercies will be preparing for us. But when we are peculiarly favored, we should shun all ostentation; and every interposition of the Lord, to take away our reproach or trouble, should remind us to court retirement, in order to a due improvement of his mercies.

Verses 26-33.

(Notes, Matt. 1:18-25. Ex. 3:15, 20. 15:21.) It is remarkable that the name 'Elisabeth' was the same with Elisheba, the wife of Aaron, and that of 'Mary,' the same with that of Miriam his sister. (Marg. and Ref.) The Papists have unaccountably turned this salutation of the angel into an act of adoration; and the word for 'highly favored,' having been rendered in the Vulgate, 'full of grace,' they have thus addressed the virgin Mary with idolatrous worship, and very great numbers do so to this day. But there is no expression in this address, but that might properly be used by a superior to an inferior, in Mary's situation; and doubtless it was thus intended for a greater abatement of our carnality, than to suppose that the angel Gabriel came down from heaven, to worship a poor sinful mortal here on earth, as Mary well knew herself to be! Mary, however, was disquieted in her mind: she was not only alarmed at the angel's presence; but was greatly perplexed about the meaning and consequences of so uncommon an address. But the angel calmed her fears, and assured her, that she had 'found favor with God,' and would shortly conceive and bear a Son, whom she was directed to call Jesus. He would be great, above all who ever appeared on earth, being called, and acknowledged to be, the Son of the Highest; as being one in nature and perfection with the 'Lord God,' who would in due time exalt Him, in his mediatorial character, to the throne of David, his father as to his human nature; and on that throne He would reign 'over the house of Jacob,' and over the true Israel of God, not only for a few years, as David and his successors had done, but forever; so that 'of his kingdom there should be no end.' (Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, 2 Sam. 7:12-16. Ps. 2:4-9. 89:19-37. Is. 9:6, 7. See Neh. 11:3. But it is probable that the holy family moved to Galilee, for fear of exciting the jealousy of Herod, who had usurped that throne to which they had an indisputable right. (28) The angel came in &

of all living! The Vulgate translates it full of grace, and thence gathers, that she had more of the inherent graces of the Spirit than even any had; whereas it is certain it bespeaks only the singular favor done her, in preferring her to conceive and bear our blessed Lord; an honor, which, since He was to be the seed of the woman, some woman must have, not for personal merit, but purely for the sake of free grace, and she is pitched upon; even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.

(2.) She has the presence of God with her; 'The Lord is with thee, though poor and mean; and perhaps now forecasting how to get a livelihood, and maintain a family in the married state.' The angel with this word raised the faith of Gideon; (Judg. 6: 19) The Lord is with thee. Nothing is to be despised of, if we have God with us. This word might put her in mind of Immanuel, God with us; which a virgin shall conceive and bear: (Isa. 7: 14), and why not she?

(3.) She has the blessing of God upon her; Blessed art thou among women; not only accounted so, but really so; and thou mayst expect to be blessed.³ She explains it herself, (v. 43.) All generations shall call me blessed. Compare it with what Deborah saith of Jael, another that was the glory of her sex; (Judg. 5. 24.) Blessed shall she be above the women in the tent.

III. The consternation she was in, upon this address, p. 29. When she saw him, she was troubled at the sight of him, and much more at his sayings. Had she been a proud young woman, ambitions of distinction in the world, she would have been pleased and puffed up with it; but, instead of this, she is confounded at it, as not conscious to herself of any thing that either merited or promised such great things; and she cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be: Was it from heaven or of men? to amuse, or to ensnare her,—was it to hant her, or was there something substantial and weighty in it? But of all the thoughts she had, I believe she had not the least idea of its being ever intended or used for a prayer, as it is, and has been, for many ages, by the corrupt, degenerate, and anti-Christian ages of the church, and to be ten times repeated for the Lord's prayer once; so it is in the church of Rome. But her thoughtfulness on this occasion gives a very useful intimation to young people of her sex, when addresses are made to them, to consider and cast in their minds what manner of salutations they are, whence they come, and what their tendency is, that they may receive them accordingly, and may always sing on their guard.

IV. The message itself which the angel had to deliver to her. The angel paused for her reply; but, observing her perplexity increased, he went on, v. 30. 'Fear not, Mary, my only design is to assure thee that thou hast found favor with God more than thou thinkest of, as many think they are more favored of God than really they are.' Note, Those that have found favor with God, should not give way to disquieting, distrustful fears. Both God favor thee? Fear not, though the world frown on thee. Is He for thee? No matter who is against thee.

1. Though a virgin, she shall have the honor of being a mother: 'Thou shalt bring forth a son, and call his name Jesus,' v. 31. Eve, though she should have the honor to be the mother of all living, was to have this allay to that honor, that her desire should be to her husband, and he should rule over her, Gen. 3: 16. But Mary has the honor without the allay.

2. Though she lives in poverty and obscurity, yet she shall have the honor to be the mother of the Messiah; whose name shall be Jesus—a Savior, such a one as the world needs, rather than such a one as the Jews expect.

(1.) He will be very nearly allied to the upper world. He shall be great, truly, incontestably great, for He shall be called the Son of the Highest, the Son of God, who is the Highest; of the same nature, as the son is of the father; and very dear to Him, as the son is to the father. He shall be called, and not mis-called, the Son of the Highest, for He is Himself God over all, blessed forevermore; Rom. 9: 5. Note, Those who are the children of God, though but by adoption and regeneration, are truly great, and therefore are concerned to be very good, 1 John 3: 12.

(2.) He will be very highly preferred in the lower world; for, though born under the most disadvantageous circumstances, and appearing in the form of a servant, yet the Lord shall give unto Him the throne of his father David; (32.) to which, since the entail took place, neither by the Salique law, nor by the right of primogeniture, it was not impossible he might bring forth an heir, and therefore might the more easily believe it, and that, after the sceptre had been long departed from that ancient and honorable family, it should now at length return to it again, to remain in it, not by succession, but in the same hand to eternity. His people will not give him that throne, nor acknowledge his right to rule them; but the Lord God shall give him the right, and set him as his King upon the holy hill of Zion. He assures her, [1.] That his kingdom shall be spiritual; He shall reign over the house of Jacob, not Israel according to the flesh, for they neither came into his interests nor continued long a people; it must therefore be a spiritual kingdom, the house of Israel according to promise, that He must rule over, [2.] That it shall be eternal; He shall reign forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end; other crowns endure not to every generation, but Christ's doth, Prov. 27-24. The Gospel is the last dispensation: we are to look for no other.

V. The further information given her, upon her inquiry concerning the birth of this Prince

1. Her inquiry is just; 'How shall this be?' v. 34. She knew that the Messiah must be born of a virgin; and if she must be his mother, she desires to know how. This was not the language of her distrust, or any doubt of what the angel said, but of a desire to be further instructed.

2. The answer is satisfactory, v. 35. (1.) She shall conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost, whose proper work and office it is to sanctify. Doth she ask how this shall be? This is enough to help her over all her difficulty, that a divine power will undertake it, not the power

(28.) The angel came in. &c.] 'Some think that this was all a vision, and that there was no personal appearance of an angel. But when divine visions are given, they are announced as such in the sacred writings; nor can we with safety attribute any thing to a vision, where a divine communication is made; unless it be specified as such in the text.'

This? (18). The latter implies a doubt of the truth of the prediction; the former merely asks directing. Mary's question seems entirely the language of faith and humble admiration. She probes the angel's words, quire, what he can conclude ought to be possible from her epousia with Joseph, and thus she does not seem to be posing her question with Josaphat, as if she suspected that he was deceiving her. (Note Judg. 13: 8.) She seems to have understood it, as implying that she was to conceive miraculously; but she asked no sign for the confirmation of her faith, as Zacharias had done; and the angel in fact merely told her that she would conceive by the Holy Spirit descending upon her, by whose creative energy, and under whose special protection, the Infant would be formed in her womb. Thus the promised Seed would properly be 'made of a woman,' and be a partaker of human nature, without the pollution of sin, which is common to all others descended from fallen Adam. (Notes, Gen. 3: 14, 15. Joh. 1: 1-8, 4. Is. 7: 14. Jer. 31: 21, 22. Gal. 4: 4-7.) This child might therefore be called 'that holy thing,' or poly child and even in respect of his human nature, He should be acknowledged to be 'the Son of God,' as well as in his divine nature, and his mysterious Person, as 'God made manifest in the flesh.' The Man, Christ Jesus, being the Son of God, and the God, who was conceived by the operation of the Holy Spirit, is a full proof of the Deity of Christ, and His Father's conception in virginity was more evidently miraculous, than Eve's both in her old age; but nothing was, or could be, impossible to the power of God. (Note, Gen. 18: 13-15.) (Marr. Ref. a, h, d. a.) (34.) How can this be? 'Some would render this as if she would be resolved whether this birth were to be produced in a common or a miraculous manner. But I think it is more natural to suppose that she understood the former words as an intimation that the effect was immediately to take place, to which her present circumstances seemed, humanly speaking, an invincible objection.' 36 And behold, thy cousin Elisabeth, she hath also conceived a son in her old age; and this is the sixth month with her who was called barren.

of an angel, as in other works of wonder, but the power of the Holy Ghost.

(2.) She must ask no questions as to the way and manner how it shall be wrought; for the Holy Ghost, as the power of the Highest, shall overshadow her, as the cloud covered the tabernacle when the glory of God took possession of it to conceal it from those that would too curiously observe, and pry into the mystery of it. The formation of every babe in the womb, and the entrance of the spirit of life into it, is a mystery in nature; none knows the way of the spirit, nor how the bones are formed in the womb of her that is with child, Eccl. 11:5. We were made in secret, Ps. 139:15, 16. Much more was the formation of the child Jesus a mystery; without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh, 1 Tim. 3:16. It is a new thing created in the earth, (Jer. 31:22.) concerning which we must not covet to be wise above what is written.

(3.) The child shall be a holy thing, and therefore must not be conceived by ordinary generation, for he must not share in the common corruption and pollution of the human nature; he is spoken of emphatically, That Holy Thing, such as never was; called the Son of God, as the Son of the Father by eternal generation, as an indication of which, He shall now be formed by the Holy Ghost. His human nature was to be so produced, as was fit, and taken into union with the divine nature.

3. A further encouragement to her faith, in the situation of her cousin Elisabeth, v. 36. Here is an age of wonders beginning, and therefore be not surprised; here is one among thy own relations truly great, though not altogether so great as this; it is usual with God to advance in working wonders. Greater works than these shall he do. Elisabeth was, on the father's side, of the daughters of Aaron, (v. 5.) yet on the mother's side she might be of the house of David, for those two families often intermarried, as an earnest of the uniting of the royalty and the priesthood in the Messiah. This is the sixth month with her that was called barren. This intimates, as Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that all the instances in the Old Testament, of those having children that had been long barren, which was above nature, were designed to prepare the world for the belief of a virgin's bearing a son, which was against nature. Thus Abraham saw Christ's day in the birth of Isaac. The angel assures Mary of this, to encourage her faith, and concludes with that great truth, that with God nothing shall be impossible, v. 37. Abraham therefore staggered not at the promise, Rom. 4:20, 21. No word of God must be incredible to us, as long as no work of God is impossible to Him.

VI. Her acquiescence, v. 38. She owns herself, 1. A believing subject to the divine authority; 'Behold, the handmaid of the Lord. Lord, I am at thy disposal.' She objects not the danger of spoiling her marriage, and blemishing her reputation, but leaves the issue with God, and submits entirely to his will. 2. A believing expectant of the divine favor. She is not only content that it should be so, but humbly desires it; Be it unto me according to thy word. Such a favor, it was not for her to slight, or be indifferent to; and for what God has promised, He will be sought unto. Remember, and perform thy word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope. We must, as Mary here, guide our desires by the word of God, and ground our hopes upon it. Be it unto me according to thy word.

Hereupon, the angel departed from her; having completed the errand, he returned, to give account of it, and receive new instructions. Converse with angels was always a transient thing, and soon over; it will be constant and permanent in the future state. It is generally supposed that at this instant the virgin conceived, by the overshadowing power of the Holy Ghost; but of this, the Scripture being silent, we should not be inquisitive.

V. 39-56. We have here an interview between Elisabeth and Mary, occasioned probably by the intimation of the angel; v. 36. Sometimes it may prove a better service than we think, to bring good people together, for conference. Here is,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 26-38. Whilst we contemplate the peculiar honor conferred on the virgin-mother of our Lord, we should remember that angels rejoice over every sinner who repenteth, and deem every believer 'highly favored,' in whose heart 'Christ dwells by faith.' (Notes, 2:8-14. Eph. 1:3-9.) Happy indeed must they be, to whom the Lord is graciously reconciled, and with whom He is present by his sanctifying Spirit! They may be troubled and perplexed, and can scarcely raise their hopes so high, as to expect the blessings intended for them; but they may be assured that they have 'found favor with God,' as most nearly related to 'the Savior of the world.' (Notes, Matt. 12:46-50. 25:34-40. P. O. 31-40.) Let us then rejoice in his personal and mediatorial exaltation, not only 'over the house of Jacob,' but over 'angels, principalities, and powers in heavenly places,' as 'the Son of God' and 'the Son of David.' Let us seek to be, and to approve ourselves, the subjects of 'his kingdom of which there shall be no end;' and if we meet with sufferings, let us remember how Jesus suffered, before He entered into his glory. Relying on his promises, we should carefully and diligently keep his commandments, that we too may be 'the sons and daughters of the Lord almighty.' (Notes, 2 Cor. 6:14-18. v. 18. 7:1.)—In all our conflicts and temptations we should still remember, that 'with God nothing shall be impossible;' and when we read and hear his promises, we should turn them into prayers, saying, 'Behold the servant of the Lord, let it be unto me according to this thy word.'

ception could not have yet taken place; and she modestly inquires by what means the promise of the angel is to be fulfilled, in order to regulate her conduct accordingly.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

(35.) The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, &c. It was necessary to the scheme of redemption, by the Redeemer's offering Himself up as an expiatory sacrifice, that the manner of our Lord's conception should be such, that He should in no degree partake of the natural pollution of the fallen race for whose guilt He came to atone, nor be included in the general condemnation of Adam's progeny. In order to reverse the universal sentence passed upon mankind, and to purge their universal corruption, a Redeemer was to be found, pure of every stain of inbred and contracted guilt. And since every person, produced in the ordinary course of generation, could not but be of this contaminated race; the purity, requisite to the efficacy of the Redeemer's atonement, could it be necessary, that the manner of his conception should be supernatural. Thus the miraculous conception has a natural connection with the other articles of our faith. Without it, it could not have been true, as St. John asserts, that 'the Word was made flesh,' (John 1:14.) and the atonement of the Redeemer would have been inadequate and ineffectual.

Bp. HORSLEY.

Son of God.' The angel does not give the appellation Son of God to the divine nature of Christ, but to that holy person or thing, which was to be born of the virgin, by the energy of the Holy Spirit. The divine nature could not be born of the virgin, the human nature was born of her. The divine nature had no beginning; it was God manifest in the flesh, (1 Tim. 3:16.) It was that Word, which, being in the beginning (from eternity) with God, (John 1:2.) was afterward made flesh (became manifest in human nature) and tabernacled among us, John 1:14. Two natures must ever be distinguished in Christ: the human nature, in reference to which He is the Son of God, and inferior to Him, (Mark 13:32. John 5:19. 14:28.) and the divine nature, which was from eternity, and equal to God, John 1:1. 10:30. Rom. 9:5. Col. 1:16-18.)

(36.) Who was called barren. Probably by way of reproach, or to distinguish her from some other Elisabeth, also well known, who had been blest with children.

It shall be called. The phrase, to be called, seems to signify in the language of Scripture, not only that the thing shall really be what is called, but also that it shall be taken notice of in that view. Compare Is. 1:26. 9:6. 35:8. 47:1, 5. 56:7. 61:36. Matt. 5:9. 19:21. 13. Mark 11:17. 1 John 3:1.

DODDRIDGE.

Verbes 39-45.

(Marg. Ref. 1. Marg. Ref. h-k. Marg. Ref. 1.—Note, Matt 8:8. 9. Marg. Ref. m.—Note, Matt. 22:41-46. Note, Gen. 28:22, 23.) Mary was peculiarly happy, in that she had so readily and implicitly believed the divine message; by which means she had honored God, and had received her mercies unmingled with rebukes; for the promise would surely and exactly be accomplished. There was in this a reference to Zacharias's unbelief, and the painful rebuke under which he lay; but the subject was touched very gently, as it was proper from the mouth of Elisabeth. It is remarkable, that Mary, though young and inexperienced, so readily believed a far more difficult promise, than that about which Zacharias, an aged priest and an experienced believer, had hesitated. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o.—Note, 18-20.) It does not appear, that Elisabeth knew the circumstances of Mary's vision, or her faith in the divine message, except by the Spirit of prophecy; for it may be concluded from the narrative, that she thus addressed Mary, before she had time to inform her of these matters. The words of Elisabeth, and all the circumstances of her interview with Mary, must have had a powerful effect in establishing the faith, and enlarging the expectations, of the latter: and the favor and testimony of persons, so highly respected as Zacharias and Elisabeth, would rose in those days, and went 'into the hill-country with haste, into a city of Judah;

40 And entered into the house of Zacharias, and saluted Elisabeth.

41 And it came to pass, that when Elisabeth heard the salutation of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb: and Elisabeth was filled with the Holy Ghost.

42 And she spake out with a loud voice, and said, 'Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.

43 And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me?

44 For, lo, as soon as the voice of thy salutation sounded in mine ears, the babe leaped in my womb for joy.

45 And blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord.

I. Mary's visit to Elisabeth. Mary was the younger, and younger with child; if therefore they must come together, it was fit she should take the journey, and not insist on the preference which the greater dignity of her conception gave her, v. 39. She arose, in those days, at that time, (as it is commonly explained, Jer. 33:16. 50:4.) in a day or two after the angel had visited her, taking time first, as is supposed, for her devotion, or rather hastening away to her cousin's, where she would have more leisure, and better help, in the family of a priest. She went, with care, diligence, expedition; not as young people commonly go abroad and visit their friends, to divert herself, but to inform herself: she went to a city of Judah in the hill-country; probably Hebron, for that is said, (Josh. 21:10, 11.) to be in the hill-country of Judah, and to belong to the priests; thither Mary hastened, though it was a long journey, some scores of miles.

1. Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that she was to conceive our Savior there at Hebron, and perhaps had it intimated to her by the angel, and hastened thither on that account. He thinks it probable that Shiloh, of the tribe of Judah, and the seed of David, should be conceived in a city of Judah and of David, as He was to be born in Bethlehem, another city which belonged to them both. In Hebron the promise was given of Isaac, and circumcision instituted. Here (saith he) Abraham had his first land, and David his first crown: here lay interred, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah, and, as antiquity has held, Adam and Eve. He therefore thinks it suits singularly with the harmony God uses in his works, that the promise should begin to take place by the conception of the Messiah, among those patriarchs to whom it was given. I see no improbability in the conjecture, but add this for the support of it, that Elisabeth said, (v. 45.) There shall be a performance; as if it were not performed yet, but was to be performed there.

2. It is generally supposed that she went thither to confirm her faith, and rejoice with her cousin. She might hope also to be more retired from company, or to have more agreeable company there, than she could have in Nazareth. We may suppose she made no mention to her neighbors in Nazareth of the angel's message to her, and she knew no person with whom she could freely converse concerning it but her cousin Elisabeth, and therefore she hastened to her. Note, It is well for those that have a work of grace begun in their souls, and Christ forming there, to communicate experiences one to another; and they will find that, as in water, face answers to face, so doth the heart of man to man,—of Christian to Christian.

II. The meeting of Mary and Elisabeth. Mary entered the house of Zacharias; but he, being dumb and deaf, kept his chamber, and probably, saw no company; therefore she saluted Elisabeth, (v. 40.) and told her how she was come to make her a visit, and rejoice with her in her joy.

What now occurred was for the confirmation of their faith, and very extraordinary. Mary knew that Elisabeth was with child, but nothing had been told Elisabeth of her cousin Mary's being designed for the mother of the Messiah; and what knowledge she had of it, must have come by a revelation.

1. The babe leaped in her womb. Probably she had been several weeks quick, (for it was now her sixth month,) and had often felt the child stir; but this was an unusual motion, which alarmed her to expect something very extraordinary. It is the same word in the Greek, that is used by the LXX (Gen. 25:22.) for the struggling of Jacob and Esau in Rebecca's womb, and the mountains skipping, Ps. 114:4. The babe leaped as it were to give a signal to his mother that He was now at hand, whose forerunner he was to be, about six months in ministry, as in his birth; or, it was the effect of some strong impression made on the mother. Now began to be fulfilled what the angel said to his father, (v. 15.) that he should be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb; and perhaps he himself had some reference to this, (John 3:29.) The friend of the Bridegroom's voice, heard, though not by him, yet by his mother.

2. Elisabeth was herself filled with the Holy Ghost, or a Spirit of prophecy; by which, as well as by his particular suggestions, she was given to understand that the Messiah was at hand, in whom prophecy should revive, and by whom the Holy Ghost should be more plentifully poured out than ever, according to the expectations of those who waited for the consolation of Israel. The uncommon motion of the babe in her womb, was a token of the extraordinary emotion of her spirit under a divine impulse. Note, Those whom Christ graciously visits, may know it by their being filled with the Holy Ghost; for if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.

III. Elisabeth's uncommon welcome to Mary, as to one of whom the Messiah was to be born.

1. She congratulates her on her honor, which she acknowledges with the greatest assurance and satisfaction; speaking out with a loud voice in a transport of joy, and saying what she cared not who knew,—Blessed art thou among women, as said the angel; v. 28. She adds a rea-powerfully operate to prevent any injurious reflections on her character. (Note, Matt. 1:18, 19.)

(39.) City of Judah. 'Hebron, the city of the priests, (Josh. 21:14.) situated in the tribe of Judah, about forty miles south of Jerusalem, and upwards of seventy from Nazareth.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

'Josh. 11:21. 15:48, 54. These hills, running across the middle of Judah, from south to north, gave to the tract, along which they ran, the name of the hill country.'

'Hebron was the chief city of that part of Judah, as may be gathered from 2 Sam. 2.'

(45.) Blessed is she that believeth. 'Not doubting an oblique reference here to the unhappiness of Zacharias,' Doddridge notices the 'great decorum which the Spirit of God, as well as the rules of modesty and piety, taught Elisabeth to observe, when the faults of a husband were in question.'

Faith = here represented as the foundation of true happiness, because it receives the fulfilment of God's promises.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verses 46-55.

(Note, 1 Sam. 2:1-3.) From this song of Mary it is evident, that she confessed herself a sinner, who needed a Savior, and who could no otherwise rejoice in God, than as she was interested in his salvation through the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. p. q.—Notes, Is. 12:2: 15:17. Tit. 2:13. 3:4-7.) It is also supposed by many, that by 'God my Savior' she meant that divine Person who was about to receive his human nature from her. (See Matt. 1:20, 21.) She however added, that the Lord had graciously condescended to regard the low estate of his handmaiden, when it might have been expected that the Messiah would assume his human nature from one of more illustrious station, and more honored among men. (Marg. Ref. t.—Notes, Gen. 32:9-12. 2 Sam. 7:13, 19. 1 Cor. 1:26-31.) Indeed his mercy had always been extended towards those who feared Him, and his humble worshippers and servants, in every generation, and would be to the end of the world; and was only withheld from the proud, impenitent, and unbelieving. (Marg. Ref. s-y.—Notes, Ex. 34:5-7. Ps. 103:15-18.) He had often shown his power, in delivering his people and scattering his enemies, confounding them even in their most sagacious schemes. (Marg. Ref. z-c.—Notes, 1 Sam. 2:4-8. Job 5:8-16. 2 Cor. 10:1-6.) Thus He ruined Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, and Belshazzar, and exalted Joseph, David, and Daniel. (Note, Ex. 13:7-9.) He had also been used to satisfy the poor and hungry, whilst the rich were impoverished and reduced to deep distress; and this was an emblem of the methods of his grace. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Notes, 6:21-26. 13:9-14. Ps. 107:8, 9.) Thus He had, in former ages, helped his people Israel, and thus He was about to help them at that time, by fulfilling his promises concerning the Messiah.

This would be done 'in remembrance of his mercy,' and in accomplishment of his promises, especially to Abraham, with relation to that Seed in particular, 'in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed.' (Marg. Ref. f, g.—Notes, 6:16-75. Gen. 12:1-3. 22:15-18. 49:9, 10. Mic. 7:13-20. Heb. 8:13-15. 11:39, 40.) (48.) The low estate. (Acts 8:33. Phil. 3:21. Jam. 1:10. Gen. 16:11. 29:32. 31:42. 41:52. Ps. 136:23. Is. 53:8. Lam. 1:3, 7, 9. Sept.) The original Greek word here is uniformly used for a low and afflicted condition, and not for the grace of humility, or lowliness. And it is certain, that Mary did not mean to commend her own humility, but to show her low and impoverished condition, and that of David's family, when God so noticed her.

(46.) And Mary said. 'The Hebrews were accustomed to express their joy or affliction in irregular hymns without metre.'

'The song of Elisabeth is a counterpart of the song of Hannah, as related in 1 Sam. 2:1-10.'

This is allowed by many to be the first piece of poetry in the New Testament: but the address of the angel to Zacharias, (p. 13-17.) is delivered in the same way: so is that to Mary, (p. 30-33.) and so also is Elisabeth's answer to Mary, v. 42-45. All these portions are easily the blessedness of the faith of the saints. Those that have experienced the performance of God's promises themselves, should encourage others to hope that He will be as good as his word to them also; I will tell you what God has done for my soul.

IV. Mary's song of praise, on the occasion. Elisabeth's prophecy was an echo to Mary's salutation, and this song is yet a stronger echo to that prophecy, and shows her to be no less filled with the Holy Ghost than Elisabeth was. We may suppose Mary came in, fatigued with her journey; yet she forgets that, and is inspired with new life, and vigor, and joy, upon the confirmation she here meets with of her faith; and finding by this sudden inspiration and transport, that this was designed to be her errand hither, weary as she is, like Abraham's servant, she would neither eat nor drink till she had told her errand.

Some compare this song with that of her namesake Miriam, Moses' sister, upon the departure of Israel out of Egypt, and their triumphant passage through the Red sea; others think it better compared with the song of Hannah, on the birth of Samuel, which, like this, passes from a family-mercy to son also; for blessed is the fruit of thy womb; thence it was that she derived this excellent dignity. Elisabeth was the wife of a priest, and in years, yet she grudges not, that her kinswoman, who was many years younger than she, and every way her inferior, should have the honor of conceiving in her virginity, and being the mother of the Messiah, whereas the honor put on her was much less; she rejoices in it, and is well pleased, as her son was afterward, that she who cometh after her, is preferred before her, John 1:27. Note, While we cannot but own that we are more avored of God than we deserve, let us by no means envy, that others are more highly favored than we are.

2. She acknowledges her condescension, in making her this visit, v. 45. Observe, She calls Mary the mother of her Lord, (as David, in spirit, called the Messiah, Lord, his Lord,) for she knew He was to be Lord of all. She not only bids her welcome, but reckons the visit a great favor, which she thought herself unworthy of; Whence is this to me? It is in reality, and not in compliment, that she saith, 'This was a greater favor than I could have expected.' Note, Those that are filled with the Holy Ghost, have low thoughts of their own merits, and high thoughts of God's favors. Her son the Baptist spake to the same purport with this, when he said, Comest Thou to me? Matt. 3:14.

3. She acquaints her with the concurrence of the babe in her womb, v. 44. 'Thou certainly bringest some extraordinary tidings, some extraordinary blessing, with thee, for as soon as the voice of thy salvation sounded in my ears, not only my heart leaped for joy, but the babe in my womb did so too.' He leaped as it were for joy that the Messiah, whose harbinger he was to be, would Himself come so soon after him. This would serve very much to strengthen Mary's faith, and would be in part the accomplishment of what had been so often foretold, that there should be universal joy before the Lord, when He cometh, Ps. 98:9.

4. She commends and encourages her faith, v. 45. Believing souls are blessed souls, and will be found so at last; being related to Christ through faith, and having Him formed in the soul. They are blessed, who believe, for the word of God will never fail. Note, The inviolable certainty of the promise is the undoubted felicity of those that build upon it, and expect their all from it. The faithfulness of God a public and general one. This begins, like that, My heart rejoiceth in the Lord, 1 Sam. 2:1.

Observe here, with what reverence Mary speaks of God as the Lord; 'My soul doth magnify the Lord; I never saw Him so great as now I find him so good.' Note, Those, and those only, are advanced in mercy, who are thoroughly brought to think the more highly and honorably of God; whereas there are those whose prosperity and preferment make them say, What is the Almighty, that we should serve Him? The more honor God has any way put on us, the more honor we must study to give to Him; and then only we are accepted in magnifying the Lord, when our souls magnify Him, and all that is within us. Praising-work must be soul-work.

With what complacency she speaks of Him as her Savior; 'My spirit rejoiceth in God my Savior.' This seems to have reference to the Messiah, whom she was to be the mother of. She calls Him God her Savior, for the angel had told her that He should be the Son of the Highest, and that his name should be Jesus, a Savior; this she fastened on, with application to herself; He is God my Savior. Even the mother of our Lord had need of an interest in Him as her Savior, and would have been undone without it; and she glories more in that happiness, which she had in common with all believers, than in being his mother, which was an honor peculiar to herself; and this agrees with the preference Christ gave to obedient believers above his mother and brethren; see Matt. 12:50. Luke 11:27, 28. Note, Those that have Christ for their God and Savior, have great reason to rejoice—to rejoice in spirit, that is, rejoicing as Christ did, (Luke 10:21.) with spiritual joy.

Just causes are assigned for this joy and praise.

Her spirit rejoiced in the Lord, on her own account, (v. 48, 49,) because of the kind things He had done for her; He has regarded the low estate of his handmaiden; He has looked on her with pity, for so the word is commonly used. 'He has chosen me to this honor, notwithstanding my great meanness, poverty, and obscurity.' Nay, the expression seems to intimate, not only (to allude to that of Gideon, Judg. 6:15,) that her family was poor in Judah, but that she was the least in her father's house, as if she was unjustly neglected, and the outcast of the family and God put this honor on her, to balance abundantly that contempt. I like the rather suggest this, for we find something like it in the case of others; as Leah, and Hannah, Gen. 29:31. 1 Sam. 1:19. Whom men wrongfully depress and despise, God sometimes, especially if they have borne it patiently, doth prefer and advance; see Judg. 11:7. So in Mary's case. And if God regard her low estate, He not only thereby gives a specimen of his favor to the whole race of mankind, whom He remembers in their low estate, as the psalmist speaks, (Ps. 136:23.) but secures a lasting honor to her; (for such the honor is that God bestows, honor that fades not away;) 'From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed, shall think me a happy woman, and highly advanced.' All that embrace Christ and his Gospel will say, Blessed was the womb

(48.) He hath regarded, 'Looked favorably, &c. In the most tender and compassionate manner He has visited me in my humiliation, drawing the reasons of his conduct, not from any excellence in me, but from his own eternal kindness and love.' All generations shall call me blessed; 'This was the character by which alone she wished to be known, viz. The blessed or happy virgin. What dishonor do those do to this holy woman, who give her names and characters which her pure soul would abhor; and which properly belong to God her Savior! By her votaries she is addressed as Queen of heaven, Mother of God, &c. titles both absurd and blasphemous.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(50.) His mercy, &c. 'His abundant kindness manifests itself in acts of mercy to all those who fear or reverence his name; and this is continued from generation to generation, because He is abundant in goodness, and because He delighteth in mercy. This is a noble, becoming and just character of the God of the Christians; a Being who delights in the salvation and happiness of all his creatures, because his name is mercy, and his nature, love.'

He hath scattered the proud, &c. couraged to hope for mercy in Him, through His Mediator and Advocate; and in Him mercy is settled on all that fear God, from generation to generation, while the world stands. In Christ He keepeth mercy for thousands.

It has been a common observation, that God puts contempt on the haughty, and honor on the humble; and this He has done remarkably in the work of redemption. First, in the course of his providence, it is his usual method to cross the expectations of men. Proud men expect to carry all before them, and to have their way; but He scatters them in the imagination of their hearts, breaks their measures, and brings them down, by the very counsels with which they thought to advance and establish themselves; while, on the other hand, those of low degree, who thought of no other than of being ever low, are wonderfully exalted. The same holds likewise concerning riches; many, who were so poor, that they had not bread for themselves and families, have come, by some surprising providence in their favor, to be filled with good things; while, on the other hand, those who were rich, and thought no other than that their mountain stood strong, and they should never be moved, have been strangely impoverished, and sent away empty. Such was the observation Hannah made in her song, with application to the case of herself and her adversary, 1 Sam. 2: 4-7. Compare also Ps. 107: 33-41, Ps. 113: 7-9, and Eccl. 9: 11. Secondly, This doth especially appear in the methods of gospel-grace.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 39-56. Those who are experienced in the things of God will delight in each other's company, and value each other's pious counsels, cautions, and exhortations.—The influences of the Spirit of God effectually counteract emulation and ambition; and in proportion to his sacred illumination, we feel our own unworthiness, learn thankfulness for every favor, and rejoice in the gifts and graces bestowed on others. (Notes, Rom. 12: 3-16, 7, 10, 16, Phil. 2: 1-4.) Humble believers will appropriate to glory to themselves; but will take occasion, from congratulations and commendations, to 'magnify the Lord, and to rejoice in Him' as their 'God and Savior.' Notwithstanding every other distinction, they must have been never miserable without this salvation: their thankfulness will therefore always be connected with an humble sense of sinfulness, and of his mercy, who has looked down with pity (53.) The rich hath sent empty away. 'The original word strictly signifies, hath sent or turned them out of doors; and very beautifully represents God as the great Proprietor of all, and the greatest of men as his tenants at will, whom He can strip and turn out whenever He pleases.' DODDRIDGE.

The poor man comes through a sense of his want, to get his daily support, and God feeds him; the rich man comes through the lust of gain, to get more added to his abundance, and God sends him empty away—not only gives him nothing more, but often deprives him of that which he has, because he has not improved it to the honor of the Giver.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(54, 55.) In remembrance of his mercy. 'The beginning of the 55th verse should, I think, be included in a parenthesis. It makes an easier and stronger sense to suppose that this remembrance of his that bore Him, and the pains which He sucked, Luke 11: 27. Elisabeth had once and again called her blessed: 'But that is not all,' saith she, 'all generations of Gentiles as well as Jews shall call me so.' Her soul magnifies the Lord, because of the wonderful things He has done for her; (p. 49.) He that is mighty, has done to me great things. A great thing indeed, that a virgin should conceive. A great thing indeed, that Messiah should now at length be born. It is the power of the Highest that appears in this. She adds, and holy is his name; for so Hannah saith in her song, There is none holy as the Lord, which she explains in the next words, for there is none beside Thee, 1 Sam. 2: 2. God is a being by Himself, and he manifests Himself to be so, especially in the work of our redemption. He that is mighty, even He whose name is holy, has done to me great things. Glorious things may be expected from Him that is both mighty and holy; who can do ever a thing; and will do every thing well and for the best.

She rejoices in the Lord on the account of others. As the mother of the Messiah, Mary becomes now a kind of public person. Immediately, therefore she is endued with another spirit, and takes notice of God's various dealings with the children of men, (p. 50 &c.) as Hannah; (1 Sam. 2: 3,) in this she has especially an eye to the coming of the Redeemer, and God's manifesting Himself therein.

God has mercy for all that reverence his majesty, and duly regard his sovereignty and authority. But never did this appear so, as in his sending his Son into the world to save us; v. 50. His mercy is on them that fear Him; it has always been so; He has ever looked on them with an eye of peculiar favor, who have looked up to Him with an eye of filial fear. Those that fear God, as their Creator and Judge, are engaged to Him, through His Mediator and Advocate; and in Him mercy is settled on all that fear God, from generation to generation, while the world stands. In Christ He keepeth mercy for thousands.

It has been a common observation, that God puts contempt on the haughty, and honor on the humble; and this He has done remarkably in the work of redemption. First, in the course of his providence, it is his usual method to cross the expectations of men. Proud men expect to carry all before them, and to have their way; but He scatters them in the imagination of their hearts, breaks their measures, and brings them down, by the very counsels with which they thought to advance and establish themselves; while, on the other hand, those of low degree, who thought of no other than of being ever low, are wonderfully exalted. The same holds likewise concerning riches; many, who were so poor, that they had not bread for themselves and families, have come, by some surprising providence in their favor, to be filled with good things; while, on the other hand, those who were rich, and thought no other than that their mountain stood strong, and they should never be moved, have been strangely impoverished, and sent away empty. Such was the observation Hannah made in her song, with application to the case of herself and her adversary, 1 Sam. 2: 4-7. Compare also Ps. 107: 33-41, Ps. 113: 7-9, and Eccl. 9: 11. Secondly, This doth especially appear in the methods of gospel-grace.

1. In the spiritual honors it dispenses; as on publicans and sinners, to the rejection of proud Pharisees; Gentiles instead of Jews; (Rom. 9: 30, 31,) and especially the disciples instead of wise men after the flesh, the mighty, and the noble, to preach the Gospel and plant Christianity in the world, 1 Cor. 1: 26, 27. When the chief priests and elders were brought down, who had long lorded it over God's heritage, and hoped always to do so; and Christ's disciples, a company of poor despised fishermen, by the power they were clothed with, were made to sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; when the power of the four monarchies was broken, and the kingdom of the Messiah, that Stone cut out of the mountain without hands, made to fill the earth; then are the proud scattered, and those of low degree exalted.

2. In the spiritual riches it dispenses, v. 53. (1.) Those who see their need of Christ, and are importunately desirous of righteousness and life in Him, He fills with good things, with the best things, and they are abundantly satisfied with the blessings He gives. Those who are weary and heavy-laden, shall find rest with Christ, and those who thirst, are called to come to Him, and drink; for they only know how to value his gifts; to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet, manna is angel's food; and to the thirsty, fair water is honey out of the rock. (2.) Those of an opposite character, who, like Laodiceans, think they have need of nothing, are full of themselves and their own righteousness, those He sends empty away; they come full of self, and are sent away empty of Christ: He sends them to the gods whom they served, to their own righteousness and strength, which they trusted to.

It was expected the Messiah should be the Strength and Glory of his people Israel, and so He is in a peculiar manner; v. 54. He hath taken them by the hand, and helped them up that were fallen, and could not help themselves. Those that were sunk under the burdens of a broken covenant of innocence, are helped up by the blessings of a renewed covenant of grace. The sending of the Messiah was the greatest help that could be provided for his people Israel, and that which magnifies it is,

First, That it is in remembrance of his mercy; the mercifulness of his nature, the mercy He has in store for his servant Israel. While this blessing was deferred, his people, who waited for it, were often ready to ask, Has God forgotten to be gracious? But now He made it appear that He had not forgotten, but remembered, his mercy. He remembered his former mercy, and repeated that to them in spiritual blessings, which He had done formerly to them in temporal favors. He remembered the days of old, Where is He that brought them out of the sea on their low estate, and raised them to the hope of everlasting happiness. Indeed, God might have been expected to do great things against us; but He has greatly glorified even his holiness in extending mercy to all that fear Him, in every age and nation. Proud infidels and Pharisees, and presumptuous sinners of every description, will be 'scattered,' and disappointed, and cast down; but the broken-hearted sinner shall be exalted; and our gracious Lord will satisfy the desires of the poor in spirit, who long for spiritual blessings; whilst the rich and self-sufficient shall be 'sent empty away.' This is the true reason why so many frequent those ordinances in vain, from which others go away abundantly satisfied, and rejoicing in the goodness of the Lord. For He still helps his true Israel, not shall the believing seed of Abraham be ashamed forever.

mercy forever, refers to his everlasting mercies promised to the patriarchs. Compare Gen. 17: 19, Is. 55: 3, Rom. 11: 29. Yet 1 ac knowledge those blessings might be said to be promised to them at their seed forever, which were entailed on their remoter generations. Compare Gen. 12: 15, 18: 8 &c. DODDRIDGE.

'By mercy' is intended the covenant God made with Abraham, (Gen. 15: 18,) which covenant proceeded from God's eternal mercy, as in it salvation was promised to all the nations of the earth; (see Gen. 17: 19, and 22: 18,) and this promise was, in one form or other, given to all the fathers, v. 55. these here discovered, 1. A pious regard to God; they acknowledged that the Lord had magnified his mercy to her; so the word is. It was a mercy to have her reproach taken away, and her family built up, and the more, being a family of priests. Many things concurred to make the mercy great—she had been long barren, was now old, and, especially, the child should be great in the sight of the Lord. 2. A friendly regard to Elisabeth; when she rejoiced, they rejoiced with her. We ought to take pleasure in the prosperity of our neighbors and friends, and to be thankful to God for their comforts as for our own.

III. The dispute among them about naming him; v. 59. They that rejoiced in the birth of the child, came together on the eighth day, as God had appointed, to the circumcising of him. Note, The greatest comfort we can take in our children, is, in giving them up to God, and recognising their covenant relation to him. The baptism of our children should be more our joy than their birth.

Now it was the custom, when they circumcised their children, to name them, because, when Abram was circumcised, God gave him a new name, and called him Abraham; and it is not unfit that they should be left nameless till they are by name given up to God.

Probably, Zacharias returned thanks for God's goodness and faithfulness in the birth of his son, acknowledging the righteousness of the rebuke under which he had lain, and praising the mercy of God in restoring to him the use of his tongue. It is supposed that the prophetic hymn which follows was spoken at the same time; but this is not certain. Baptism, though no more necessary to salvation than circumcision was, is generally allowed to have been substituted for circumcision. Both are signs of the covenant—circumcision, of the putting away the impurity of the flesh; and baptism, of the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, producing the answer of a good conscience towards God. Confer 1 Pet. 3:21 with Tit. 3:5. Baptism should never be neglected; it is a sign and token of the spiritual grace.

Secondly, That it is in performance of his promise. It is a mercy not only designed, but declared; (v. 55.) what He spoke to our fathers, that the seed of the woman should break the head of the serpent; that God should dwell in the tents of Shem; and particularly to Abraham, that in his Seed all the families of the earth should be blessed, with the best of blessings, blessings that are forever, and to the seed that shall be forever; that is, his spiritual seed. Note, What God hath spoken to the fathers, he will make good to their seed, even their seed's seed forever.

Lastly, Mary's return to Nazareth, (v. 56.) after about three months, so long as to be fully satisfied that she was with child, and to be confirmed therein by her cousin Elisabeth. Some think this return, though here mentioned before Elisabeth's delivery, because the evangelist would finish the story of Mary, before he proceeded with that of Elisabeth, 'was yet not till after, and that Mary staid to be with her in that season,' and have her own faith confirmed by the full accomplishment of the promise of God concerning Elisabeth. But most prefer the order of the story as it lies, because Mary still affected retirement, and therefore would not be there, when the birth of this child of promise would draw a great deal of company to the house. Those in whose hearts Christ is formed, take more delight than they used to do, in sitting alone and keeping silence.

V. 57-66. In these verses we have, I. The birth of John Baptist, v. 57. Promised mercies are to be expected when the full time for them is come, and not before.

II. The great joy of all the relations of the family, on this extraordinary occasion; v. 58. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that Hebron was inhabited by priests of the family of Aaron, and that those were the cousins here spoken of; but the fields and villages about, by the children of Judah, and that those were the neighbors. Now

Now some proposed that he should be called Zacharias; we have not any instance in Scripture, that the child should bear the father's name; but perhaps it was of late come into use among the Jews, as it is with us, and they intended hereby to do honor to the father, who was not likely to have another child.

The mother opposed it, and would have him called John; having learned, either by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, (as is most probable,) or by information in writing from her husband that God appointed this to be his name, v. 60. See on verse 13.

The relations objected, (v. 61.) that there was none of his kindred, called by that name; therefore say they, 'if he may not have his father's name, yet let him have the name of some of his kindred, who will take it as a piece of respect to have such a child of wonders as this named from them.' Note, As those that have friends must show themselves friendly, so those that have relations, must be obliging to them in all the usual regards that are paid to kindred.

They appealed to the father, for it was his office to name the child, v. 62. They made signs to him, by which it appears that he was deaf as well as dumb; whereupon he made signs to them to give him a table-book, such as they then used, and with the pencil wrote,—His name is John, v. 63. Not, 'It shall be so,' or, 'I would have it so,' but, 'It is so.' The matter is determined already; the angel had given him that name. Observe, When Zacharias could not speak, he wrote. When ministers have their mouths stopped, that they cannot preach, yet they may be doing good as long as they have not their hands tied, that they cannot write. Many of the martyrs in prison wrote letters to their friends, which were of great use; blessed Paul himself did so. Zacharias' pitching upon the same name that Elisabeth had chosen, was a great surprise to the company; They marvelled all; for they knew not that, though he reason of his deafness and dumbness they could not converse together, yet they were both guided by one and the same Spirit; or, perhaps they marvelled that he wrote so distinctly and legibly, which (the stroke he was under, being somewhat like that of a palsy) he had not done before.

He thereupon recovered the use of his speech, v. 64. The time prefixed for his being silenced, was, till the day that these things should be fulfilled, (v. 20.) not all the things going before concerning John's ministry, but those which relate to his birth and name; (v. 13.) that time was now expired, whereupon the restraint was taken off, and God gave him the opening of the mouth again, as he did to Ezekiel, ch. 3:27. Dr. Lightfoot compares the case to that of Moses, Exod. 4:24, 26. Moses, for distrust, is in danger of his life, as Zacharias, for the same fault, is struck dumb; but, on the circumcising of his child, and recovery of his faith, there, as here, the danger is removed. Unbelief closed

Previous to the introduction of circumcision, the name of the child was probably given immediately after its birth.

The giving the child its name was an incidental circumstance which custom had added; and in administering the Christian ordinance, care should be taken, that it may plainly appear we only speak to the child by the name which hath been already given it.

The acknowledgement of infant baptism as of divine origin and authority, and the privilege and duty of believing parents in relation to it, seem here clearly implied.

(61.) None of thy kindred. [As the Jewish tribes and families were kept sacredly distinct, it appears the very names of the ancestors were continued among their descendants, partly through reverence for them, and partly to avoid confusion in the genealogical tables, which, for the sake of distinguishing the inheritances, were carefully preserved in each of the families. It seems to be on this account that the neighbors and relatives objected to a name, which had not before existed in any branch of the family.]

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Laftau (in his Manners of the Savages of America) says, among the Hurons and Troquois (probably Hurons and Troquois,) they always retain in every family, a certain number of names, of the ancestors of the family, both of men and women. These names are quite peculiar to them, and it is presumed to be generally known, that they belong to such or such a family. Now, in every family, it is the custom, as it were, to revive, to call back to life those members of it who have made themselves famous. They, therefore, look out, at the same time, the names of those whom they revere, and give them to such of their descendants as are to represent them. The Jews have, in the same manner, certain names in every family, which they took care to preserve.

ROSENK.

63 And he asked for a writing-table, and wrote, saying, His name is John. And they marvelled all.

64 And his mouth was opened immediately, and his tongue loosed, and he spake, and praised God.

65 And fear came on all that dwelt round about them: and all these sayings were noised abroad throughout all the hill-country of Judea.

66 And all they that heard them laid them up in their hearts, saying, What manner of child shall this be! And the hand of the Lord was with him.

[Practical Observations.]
67 ¶ And his father Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied, saying,

68 Blessed be the

his mouth, and now believing opens it again; he believes, therefore he speaks. David lay under guilt from the conception of his child till a few days after its birth; then the Lord takes away his sin; upon his repentance, he shall not die, so here he shall be no longer dumb: his mouth was opened, and he spake, and praised God. Note, When God opens our lips, our mouths must show forth his praise; as good be without our speech as not use it in praising God; for then our tongue is most our glory, when it is employed for God's glory.

These things were told all the country over, to the great amazement of all that heard them, v. 65, 66. The sentiments of the people are not to be slighted, but taken notice of. These sayings were discoursed of, and made common talk all about the hill-country of Judea; it was pity but a narrative of them had been drawn up, and published in the world, immediately.—Most people who heard of them, were put into consternation by them: Fear came on all them that dwelt round about them. If we have not a good hope, as we ought to have, built on the Gospel, we may expect that the tidings of it will fill us with fear. They believed and trembled, whereas they should have believed and triumphed.—It raised the expectations of people concerning this child, and obliged them to have their eye on him, to see what he would come to. They laid up these presages in their hearts, foreseeing they should hereafter have occasion to recollect them. Note, What we hear, that may be of use to us, we should treasure up, that we may be able to bring forth, for the benefit of others, things new and old, and when things come to perfection, may be able to look back on the presages thereof, and to say, 'It was what we might expect.' They said within themselves, and said among themselves, 'What manner of child shall this be? What will be the fruit when these are the buds, or rather, when the root is out of such a dry ground?' Note, When children are born into the world, it is very uncertain what they will prove; yet sometimes there have been early indications of something great, as in the birth of Moses, Samson, Samuel, and here of John. And probably there were some living at the time when John began his public ministry, who could, and did, remember these things, and relate them to others, which contributed as much as any thing to the great flocking there was after him.

Lastly, It is said, The hand of the Lord was with him; that is, he was taken under the especial protection of the Almighty, from his birth, as one designed for something great and considerable. It appeared also that the Spirit was at work very early on his soul. As soon as he began to speak or go, you might perceive something in him very extraordinary. Note, God has ways of operating on children in their infancy, which we cannot account for. God never made a soul but He knew how to sanctify it.

V. 67—80. We have here Zacharias' song of praise to God when his mouth was opened; in it he is said to prophesy, (v. 67,) and so he did in the strictest sense, for he foretold things to come concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, to which all the prophets bear witness. Observe,

I. How he was qualified for this; He was filled with the Holy Ghost; that is, he was divinely inspired. God not only forgave him his unbelief and distrust, (which was signified by his discharge from the punishment of it), but as a specimen of the abounding of grace toward believers, he filled him with the Holy Ghost, and put this honor on him, to employ him for his honor.

II. What the matter of his song was. He said nothing of the private concerns of his own family, the rolling away of their reproach, and the honor conferred on them, by the birth of this child, though, no doubt, he found a time to give thanks to God for this, with his family; but in this song he is wholly taken up with the kingdom of the Messiah, and the public blessings to be introduced by it. He could have little pleasure in this fruitfulness of his vine, and the hopefulness of his olive-plant, if herein he had not foreseen the good of Jerusalem, peace upon Israel, and blessings on both out of Zion, Ps. 128: 3, 5, 6. The Old-Testament prophecies are often expressed in praises and new songs, so is this beginning of New-Testament prophecy; Blessed is the Lord God of Israel. The God of the whole earth shall be called; yet Zacharias, speaking of the work of redemption, called Him the Lord God of Israel, because to Israel the prophecies, promises, and types of the redemption had hitherto been given, and to them the first proffers and proposals of it were now to be made. Israel, as a chosen people, was a type of the elect of God out of all neighbors, and wait the event of his dispensations with attentive expectation; and when our children grow up healthy, and improve in the exercise of their faculties, we should ascribe it to the good hand of the Lord upon them, and take occasion to entreat Him to give them also his heavenly grace and wisdom.

(63.) Writing-table.] 'The boys in Barbary are taught to write upon a smooth thin board, slightly daubed over with whitening, which may be rubbed off or renewed at pleasure. Such probably (for the Jewish children used the same) was this writing-table.' SHAW.
A thin board made out of the pine tree, smeared over with wax, was used among the ancients; and to this the Anglo-Saxon version seems to refer, as it translates, a teaz board or cloath.

Verses 67—75.

When Zacharias had recovered the gift of speech, he was also filled with the Holy Spirit, and uttered the following prophecy, concerning the kingdom and salvation of the Messiah. (Note, 46—55.) He began with blessing and praising 'the Lord God of Israel,' especially, for again visiting his people in mercy, after having for a long time left them without inspired prophets; and having begun that work of redemption, which had so long been predicted and expected, in the birth of him, who was to be the forerunner of the Messiah; which was a certain proof that He Himself would shortly appear. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) So that, speaking of the Savior as already come, according to the language frequently used by the prophets, he declared that God had 'raised up an Horn of salvation for his people.' (Marg. Ref. a.—Notes, 1 Sam. 2: 10. 2 Sam. 22: 2, 3. Ps. 132: 17.) The horn, which is the ornament, and weapon of protection and annoyance of every enemy, in many animals, is an apt emblem of the divine Savior; 'the glory of his people,' their Defender against every assailant, who makes them 'in all things more than conquerors.' This salvation God had 'raised up in the house of his servant David,' even Jesus, the Son of the virgin Mary. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Ps. 89: 1—4, 19—37. Is. 7: 14. 9: 6, 7. It. . Jer. 23: 5, 6.) His birth, character, and salvation would accomplish the predictions of the holy prophets, from the beginning of the world: all of whom, in one way or other, gave intimations of the promised Messiah; and assured the people of God, that by Him they should be 'saved from their enemies,' and protected against all those wicked men and apostate spirits, who hated them and sought their destruction. So that the coming of this Savior was intended to 'perform' the mercy, which God had been bestowing on their ancestors for ages past; and to accomplish the gracious and faithful covenant, which He had entered into with believers under all preceding dispensations, from the first promise made to fallen Adam; and which He had ratified to Abraham by a solemn oath, in behalf of himself and all his spiritual seed; the blessings of which were also shadowed forth under external signs and advantages, secured to his natural posterity. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 24: 25—31. 44—49, v. 44—46. Gen. 22: 16—18. 2 Sam. 23: 5. Is. 55: 1—3. John 5: 45—47. Acts 10: 36—43. Heb. 6: 13—30. 1 Pet. 1: 10—12. Rev. 19: 9, 10.) This promise, covenant, and oath, engaged, to all believers, deliverance from the power of Satan, sin, the world, death, and every enemy, as well as redemption from the curse of the holy law and the righteous vengeance of God; that, being safe under his protection, and partakers of his mercy and grace, they might worship and serve Him, as under his immediate eye, 'without fear' of being destroyed by their foes, or cast off by Him, 'in all righteousness and holiness' (during the remainder of their lives in this world; and so at length inherit eternal felicity in heaven. (Marg. Ref. i, k.)

(77—79.) Bishop Jebb considers this hymn of Zacharias as a dramatic ode in the form of dialogue; and, in confirmation of his opinion, he remarks that Zacharias must have been familiar with this character of composition, both as a pious and literary Jew, much conversant with the devotional and lyric poetry of his country, and also as an officiating priest, accustomed to bear his part in the choral service of the temple.

HOBBS.

Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people, 69 And hath raised up an Horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David;

70 As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began;

71 That we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us;

72 To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant

73 The oath which he sware to our father Abraham,

74 That he would grant unto us, that we, being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, might serve him without fear, 75 In holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life.

76 And thou, child,

77 Inasmuch as thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, thou shalt say in the name of the Lord thy God, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.
78 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

79 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

80 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

81 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

82 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

83 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

84 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

85 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

86 And thou shalt be called a prophet of the Lord, saying, My heart is comforted by thy words, O Lord.

nations, whom God had a particular eye to, in sending the Savior; and therefore He is therein called the Lord God of Israel.

Now Zacharias here blesses God,
1. For the work of salvation that was to be wrought out by the Messiah himself, v. 68—75. This it is that fills him, when he is filled with the Holy Ghost, and it is this which all are full of, who have the Spirit of Christ.

(1.) In sending the Messiah, God has made a gracious visit to his people, whom for many ages He had seemed to neglect, and to be estranged from; He hath visited them as a friend, to take cognizance of their case. God is said to have visited his people in bondage, when He delivered them, (Exod. 3: 16, 4: 34.) and in famine, when He gave them bread, Ruth 1: 6. He had often sent to them by his prophets, and had still kept up a correspondence with them; but now He Himself made them a visit.

(2.) He has wrought out redemption for them. This was his errand into the world, to redeem those that were sold under sin; even God's own people, his Israel, need to be redeemed, and are undone if they be not. Christ redeems them by price out of the hands of God's justice, and by power out of the hands of Satan's tyranny, as Israel out of Egypt.

(3.) He has fulfilled the covenant of royalty made with the most famous Old-Testament prince, that is, David. Glorious things had been said of his family; (Ps. 89: 19, 20, 24, 29.) but it had been long in a manner cast off and abhorred, Ps. 89: 38. Now here it is gloried in, that, according to the promise, the horn of David should again be made to bud, (Ps. 132: 17.) v. 69. David is called God's servant, not only as a good man, but as a king that ruled for God; and he was an instrument of the salvation of Israel; so Christ is the Author of eternal redemption, to those only that obey Him. There is in Christ, and in Him only, salvation for us, and it is a horn of salvation. It is an honorable salvation, it is raised up above all other salvations, none of which are to be compared with it; in it the glory both of the Redeemer and of the redeemed are advanced, and their horn exalted with honor. It is a plentiful salvation; a horn of plenty, a salvation in which we are blessed with spiritual blessings, in heavenly things, abundantly. It is a powerful salvation; the strength of the beast is in his horn; He has raised up such a salvation, as shall pull down our spiritual enemies, and protect us from them.

In the chariots of this salvation the Redeemer shall go forth, and go on, conquering and to conquer.

(4.) He has fulfilled all the precious promises made to the church by the mouth of his holy prophets, v. 70. His doctrine of salvation by the Messiah is confirmed by an appeal to the prophets, and the greatness and importance of that salvation thereby evidenced and magnified; it is the same that they spake of, which therefore ought to be expected and welcomed; it is what they inquired and searched diligently after, (1 Pet. 1: 10, 11.) which therefore ought not to be slighted, or thought meanly of. God is now doing that which He has long ago spoken of; and therefore be silent, O all flesh, before Him, and attend to Him. See, [1.] How sacred the prophecies of this salvation were: the prophets who delivered them, were holy prophets who durst not deceive; and who aimed at promoting holiness among men; and it was the holy God Himself that spake by them. [2.] How ancient they were: ever since the world began. God having promised, when the world began, that the Seed of the woman should break the serpent's head, that promise, was echoed to when Adam called his wife's name Eve—Life, for the sake of that Seed of hers; when Eve called her first son Cain, saying, I have gotten a man from the Lord, and another son Seth, settled; when Noah was called, rest, and foretold that God should dwell in the tents of Shem. And it was not long after the new world began in Noah, that the promise was made to Abraham, that in his Seed the nations of the earth should be blessed. [3.] What a wonderful harmony and concert we perceive among them; God spake the same thing by them all, and therefore it is said to be, not by the mouths, but by the mouth, of the prophets, for they all speak of Christ as it were with one mouth.

Now what was this salvation which was prophesied of? First, it is a rescue—a salvation from our enemies; (v. 71.) it is a salvation from sin and the dominion of Satan over us; both by corruptions within and temptations without. The carnal Jews expected to be delivered from the Roman yoke, but intimation was betimes given that it should be a redemption of another nature. He shall save his people from their sins, Matt. 1: 21.

Secondly, It is a restoration to the favor of God, v. 72. The Redeemer shall not only break the serpent's head, but re-instate us in the mercy of God, and re-establish us in his covenant; He shall bring us, as it were, into a paradise again, which was signified by the promises made to the patriarchs, and the holy covenant made with them, the oath which He sware to our father Abraham, v. 73. What was promised to the fathers, and is performed to us, is mercy, pure mercy; nothing in it is owing to our merit; we deserve wrath and the curse, but God designed us grace and life: of his own good pleasure He loved us, because He would love us. God here had an eye to his covenant, his holy covenant, that covenant with Abraham; I will be a God to thee and thy seed. This, his seed had forfeited by their transgressions; this, He seemed to have forgotten in the calamities brought on them, but He will now remember it—will make it appear that He remembers it, for on that are grounded all his returns of mercy; (Lev. 26: 42.) Then will I remember my covenant.

Thirdly, It is a qualification for, and an encouragement to, the service of God. Thus the oath He sware to our father Abraham was, that He would give us power and grace to serve Him, in a manner acceptable to Him, and comfortable to ourselves, v. 74, 75. Here seems to be an allusion to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, which was in pursuance of his covenant with Abraham, (Exod. 3: 6—8.) and this was the design of his bringing them out of Egypt, that they might serve God, Exod. 3: 12. Note, The great design of gospel-grace is, not to discharge us from, but to engage us to, and encourage us in, the service of God. Christianity is to be looked (68.) God of Israel. It may be asked, why the Almighty is called God of Israel only, when He is God not only of the Israelites, but (I all men, as being the Creator of all)? To which it may be answered, that He was the God of all men, whether they would or not: but of the Jews only by free will and knowledge. EUTHYMUS.

(69.) And hath raised up a horn of salvation. It is likely allusion is here made to the horns of the altar; and as the altar was a place of refuge and safety, and those who laid hold on its horns were considered to be under the protection of the Lord; so, according to the expression of Zacharias, Jesus Christ is a new altar, to which whose flesh shall find refuge.

House of his servant. Or, in the family; so the original word ne; rendered house, is often used in the sacred Writings. In v. 32, the angel states that Mary was of the family of David; and Zacharias, who, from the nature of his office, must have been well acquainted with the public genealogical tables, attests the same thing. This is a matter of considerable importance; because it shows the truth of all the prophetic declarations, which uniformly state that the Messiah should come from the family, and sit on the throne of David.

of the most high God,' who was appointed to 'go before the face of the Lord,' even of Christ, 'to prepare his ways' (Marg. Ref. 1-n. Notes, 11-17. Matt. 11:7-15.) The grand object of his preparatory ministry would be, to give the 'knowledge of salvation,' by the sure testimony and faithful promise of God, 'to all people,' through the full remission of all sins to every one who believed in Christ; and by this assurance to call men to repent, and accept of this inestimable blessing, that they might have the experience of it in their own souls, and know themselves to be partakers of it. (Note, 1 John 5:9-13.) All these benedictions would come to them 'through the tender mercy,' or bowels of compassion, of Israel's God; who, pitying the misery of perishing sinners, had caused this Day-spring from heaven to visit them, ushering in the appearance of 'the Sun of righteousness,' and the evangelical dispensation. (Marg. Ref. 0-q. Notes, Is. 60:1-3. Mal. 2:2, 3. 2 Pet. 1:19. Rev. 22:16, 17.) Thus, light would be afforded to sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, whose ignorance, guilt, and misery resembled the darkness of a dungeon, in which condemned criminals are confined; and whose dreary situation was like the dark shade of death and hell. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 4:12-17. Acts 26:16-18.) Then would their minds be enlightened, and their path marked out; they would see their danger and their refuge; they would be inspired with hope and encouragement; they would be directed into the way of peace with God, with their consciences, and with each other; and would learn to walk in those holy and happy paths, which lead to everlasting peace and felicity, and are an earnest of them. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, Is. 59:3-8. Rom. 3:9-18. 5:1, 2.) This was evidently a very remarkable prophecy, describing the nature, privileges, and effects of the salvation of the Gospel; and foretelling the success of Christianity both among the Jews and Gentiles. Probably, it was much circulated, and attended to, among Zacharias's friends, and the pious remnant of the nation.

(77.) By the remission of sins.] 'Remission of sins is the doctrine in which the Christian religion justly glorieth, as that most necessary and fundamental point in which every other religion fails. The heathen here confesses himself to be in the dark. The blood of bulls and goats cannot wash away the sins of the Jew; and his oblations, since the law came which he was intended to prefigure, are preposterous and impious. The doctrine of salvation by the remission of sins, through faith in a Redeemer, was, from the beginning, the sum and substance of true religion, which subsisted in promise, prophecy, and figure, till John preached their accomplishment in the person of Jesus.'

ed upon, as intended to make us truly religious. We are therefore delivered from the iron yoke of sin, that our necks may be put under the sweet and easy yoke of the Lord Jesus. The very bonds which He has loosed, bind us faster to Him, Ps. 116:16. Thus we are enabled, 1. To serve God without fear. We are put into a state of holy safety, that we might serve God with holy security and serenity of mind, as those that are quiet from the fears of evil. God must be served with a filial fear—a reverent, obedient, an awakening, a quickening fear, but not with a slavish fear, like that of the slothful servant,—not with a fear that has torment in it; not with the fear of a legal spirit, a spirit of bondage, but with the boldness of an evangelical spirit, a spirit of adoption. 2. To serve Him in holiness and righteousness, which includes the whole duty of man. It is both the intention and tendency of the Gospel, to renew in us that image of God, in which man was at first made, which consisted in righteousness and true holiness, Eph. 4:24. Christ redeemed us, that we might serve God, not in the legal services of sacrifice and offerings, but in the spiritual services of holiness and righteousness, Ps. 50:14. 3. To serve Him, before Him, in the duties of his immediate worship, wherein we present ourselves before the Lord, to serve Him as those that have an eye always on Him, and see his eye always on us, upon our inward man; that is serving Him before Him. 4. To serve Him all the days of our life. The design of the Gospel is to engage us to constancy and perseverance in the service of God, by showing us how much depends on it, that we do not draw back; and by showing us how Christ loved us to the end, and thereby engaged us to love Him to the end.

2. He blessed God for the work of preparation for this salvation, which was to be done by John Baptist, v. 76. ceased, but in John it revived, as it had done in Samuel, who was born of an aged mother, as John was, after a long cessation. John's business was,

(1.) To prepare people for the salvation, by preaching repentance and reformation as great Gospel duties; Thou shalt go before the face of the Lord, and but a little before Him, to prepare his ways, to call his people to make room for Him, and get ready for his entertainment. Let every thing that may obstruct his progress, or embarrass it, or hinder people from coming to Him, be taken away; see Isa. 40:3, 4. Let valleys be filled, and hills be brought low.

(2.) To give people a general idea of the salvation, that they might know, not only what to do, but what to expect; for the doctrine he preached was, that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. There are two things in which you must know that this salvation consists.

[1.] The forgiveness of what we have done amiss; it is salvation by the remission of sins those sins which stand in the way of the salvation, and by which we are all become liable to ruin and condemnation, v. 77. John Baptist gave people to understand that, though their case was sad, by reason of sin, it was not desperate, for pardon might be obtained through the tender mercy of our God; the bowels of mercy, so the word is; there was nothing in us but a piteous case to recommend us to the divine compassion.

[2.] Direction to do better, for the time to come. The gospel-salvation not only encourages us to hope for pardon, but gives us instruction, by which we may order our steps aright. In it the day-spring hath visited us from on high; (v. 78.) and this also is owing to the tender mercy of our God. Christ is the Morning Light, the rising Sun, Mal. 4:2. The Gospel brings light with it, John 3:19—leaves us not to wander in the darkness of pagan ignorance, or in the moonlight of the Old-Testament types or figures, but in it the day dawns; in John Baptist it began to break, but increased

4:2. and Is. 60:1-3, and possibly to Jer. 23:5. and Zech. 3:8. It is well known the original Hebrew word in these passages signifies that part of the heavens where the light begins to rise. Compare Rev. 7:2. The dawning of the day seems therefore a very literal version, and I apprehend it more beautifully describes the state of things just at this interval, than if the sun had been represented as actually risen.

DODDRIE. 'The day-break seems to arise from on high, especially to any who are situated in a valley or dell, as the valley of the shadow of death.'

(79.) Shadow of death.] 'Such phrases describe, with peculiar propriety, the ignorant and miserable state of the Gentile world, and perhaps the former part of the verse may refer to them; but as Christ's preaching to the Jews in Galilee, (for it was only to the Jews He applied Matt. 15:24. 10:5, 6. and Rom. 15:8,) is said (Matt. 4:14-16.) to be an accomplishment of Is. 9:1, 2, to which Zacharias here probably refers, I am unwilling to fix it to the Gentiles. The sad character and circumstances of the Jews at this time too well suit the representation here made.'

Verse 80. As John grew in stature, his understanding and judgment matured; and he gave indications not only of superior natural abilities, and energy of mind, but also of strong faith, vigorous holy affections, great fortitude and resolution in the cause of God, a superiority to grovelling desires and pursuits, and a victory over the fear and love of the world. Thus did he ripen for usefulness; but whether his parents died whilst he was young, or whether they were specially directed by God in this matter, he seems neither to have received an education from the Jewish scribes, nor attended on any sacerdotal services at the temple, but to have lived privately in the most retired and unfrequented part of the country, being given up to meditation, devotion, and mortification, till the time when he openly appeared among the people as the Messiah's forerunner. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 57-66.)

In the deserts.] 'Led thither by divine dispensation and direction to prepare, in solitude, for his public manifestation to Israel.'

DODDRIE. 'The Great Desert, called the Wilderness or Desert of Judea, (Ps. 63. title.) commencing from Tekoa in the tribe of Judah, (then termed the wilderness of Tekoa, 2 Chron. 20:20.) and extending through Arabia Petraea to the Persian gulf.' HORNE. 'Till the time of his age, before which time the law did not permit a man to enter into the public ministry. Num. 4:3. See also ch. 3:23. Such a retirement naturally prevented any such intimacy with Christ, in their childhood or youth, as might possibly have occasioned some suspicion as to the impartiality of the testimony which John afterwards bore Him. Compare John 1:31.'

CHAP. II.

Joseph and Mary go to Bethlehem, to enrolled there, according to the decree of Augustus, that all Jews should be enrolled in their own cities. Joseph and Mary, and Jesus, are enrolled in the register of the city of Bethlehem. The shepherds, finding it to be the angel had said, report these transactions, and glorify God, 15-20. Jesus is circumcised, 21; and presented at the temple, with the accustomed sacrifice of the poor, for the purifying of Mary, 22-24. Simeon's prophecy concerning Him, 25-35; and that of Anna, 36-38. He returns to Nazareth, and is subject to his parents, 51, 52.

AND it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from ^a Cæsar Augustus, that ^b all the world should be ^c taxed.

^a From the account called Anno Domini, the fourth year, 31. Acts 11:28, 25:11, 21. Phil. 4:22.
^b Matt. 24:14. Mark 14:9. 16:15. Rom. 1:8.
^c Or, enrolled.

1. Of his eminence as to the inward man: The child grew in the capacities of his mind, much more than other children; so that he wased strong in spirit, had a strong judgment and strong resolution. Reason and conscience (both which are the candle of the Lord) were so strong in him, that he had the inferior faculties of appetite and passion early in complete subjection. By this it appeared that he was beset with the Holy Ghost; for those that are strong in the Lord, are strong in spirit.

2. Of his obscurity as to the outward man: He was in the deserts; not that he lived a hermit; we have reason to think he went up to Jerusalem at the feasts, and frequented the synagogues on the Sabbath day; but his constant residence was in some of those scattered houses that were in the wilderness of Zuph or Maon, which we read of in the story of David. There he spent most of his time, in contemplation and devotion, and had not his education in the schools, or at the feet of the rabbins. Note, Many a one is qualified for great usefulness, who yet is buried alive; and many are long so buried who are designed, and are thereby in the fitting, for so much greater usefulness at last; as John Baptist, who was in the desert only till the day of his showing to Israel, when he was in the thirtieth year of his age. Note, There is a time fixed for the showing of those favors to Israel, which are reserved; apace, ^a one more and more to the perfect day. We have ^b as much reason to welcome the gospel, enjoy it, as those have to welcome the who had long waited for it. First, The ^c discovering; it shows us what before we were utterly ignorant of, (p. 79.) it is to give light to them that sit in darkness, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. The day-spring visited this dark world, to lighten the Gentiles, Acts 26: 18. Secondly, It is renewing; it brings light to them that sit in the shadow of death, as condemned prisoners in the dungeon, to bring them the tidings of a pardon, at least of a reprieve, and opportunity of procuring a pardon; it proclaims the opening of the prison, (Isa. 61: 1.) brings the light of life. How pleasant is that light! Thirdly, It is directing; it is to guide our feet in the way of peace, into that way which will bring us to peace at last. It is not only a light to our eyes, but a light to our feet; (Ps. 119: 105.) it guides us into the way of making our peace with God, of keeping up a comfortable communion; that way of peace, which as sinners we have wandered from, and have not known, (Rom. 3: 17.) nor could ever have known of ourselves.

In the last verse, we have a short account of the younger years of John Baptist. Though the son of a priest, he did not, like Samuel, go up, when a child, to minister before the Lord, for he was to prepare the way for a better priesthood. But we are here told, the vision of them is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and shall not lie.

CHAP. II. v. 1-7. In this chapter we have an account of the birth and infancy of our Lord Jesus; having had notice of his conception, and of the birth and infancy of his forerunner in the former chapter.

Here we have an account of the time, place, and circumstances of the birth of Christ.

I. The time. Several things may be gathered out of these verses, which intimate that it was the proper time.

He was born in the days of Augustus Cæsar, when the Roman empire, the fourth monarchy, was in its height, extended itself further than ever before or since, including Parthia one way, and Britain another way; so that it was then called, the empire of the whole earth; as it is here called all the world, (p. 1.) there being scarcely any part of the civilized world, but what was dependent on it. Now this was the time when the Messiah was to be born, according to Daniel's prophecy, (Dan. 2: 44.) In the days of these kings, the kings of the fourth monarchy, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed.

He was born when Judea was become a province of the empire, and tributary to it; as appears evidently by this, that, when all the Roman empire was taxed, the Jews were taxed among the rest. Jerusalem was taken by Pompey the Roman general, about sixty years before this, who granted the government of the church to Hyrcanus, but not the government of the state; by degrees it was more and more reduced, till now at length it was quite subdued; for Judea was ruled by Cyrenius, the Roman governor of Syria; (p. 2.) the Roman writers call him Sulpicius Quirinus. Now just at this juncture, the Messiah was to be born, for so was dying Jacob's prophecy, That Shiloh should come when the sceptre was departed from Judah, and the lawgiver from between his feet, Gen. 49: 10. This was the first taxing that was made in Judea, the first badge of their servitude; therefore now Shiloh must come, to set up his kingdom.

There is another circumstance as to the time, implied in this general enrolment of all the subjects of the empire, which is, that there was now universal peace in the empire. The tem

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 67-80. What multiplied praises, in heaven and earth, did the Saviour's advent occasion! Shall not we also unite in blessing the Lord God of Israel, who hath thus visited and redeemed his people? We are as deeply concerned in the raising up of this Horn of Salvation, and in the redemption which He made for sinners with his blood, as the Jews of old were. Predictions fulfilled in Christ, confirm the truth to us, as well as to them. Even John the Baptist's ministry calls on us to repent, and welcome our incarnate Prince and Savior; and 'through the tender mercy of our God, this Day-spring from on high hath visited' us, that, being set at liberty from bondage, as well as from condemnation, 'we may serve God without fear,' under the influence of the Spirit of adoption, 'in holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of our future lives.' Is this then the salvation we desire? Do we experience its power in our hearts and consciences? Do we use the light of the Gospel 'to guide us into the ways of peace' and purity? If so, we may be thankful and joyful, and expect complete victory over Satan, sin, and death, and an abundant entrance into heavenly felicity. Let us then repent, and mortify every sin; let us pray that the light which shines around us, may shine into our hearts, and appear in our lives; and, if it be the will of the Lord that we should live in obscurity, let us the more diligently seek to grow 'strong in the grace of Jesus Christ,' and let those who are preparing for public usefulness, here retired and mortified to the world; employing their time in useful studies, attended by searching the Scriptures, by meditation, and devotion, till the Lord shall open their way to some proper service for the benefit of his people, and the enlargement, purity and peace of his kingdom.

SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. v. 1. It had been predicted many ages before, that the Messiah should be born at Bethlehem; (Notes, Mic. 5: 2. Matt. 2: 3-6.) yet the mother of Jesus resided at Nazareth, sixty or seventy miles from that city; and she continued there till far advanced in her pregnancy. Nor was she directed to Bethlehem; indeed that would have appeared too much the effect of design. But Augustus Cæsar, the Roman emperor, in pursuance of his own purposes, issued an edict, that an account should be taken of the number and degree of all the subjects in his extensive empire; (marce) commonly called, 'all the world,' or the whole habitable earth; (Marg. Ref. b) or as some interpreters suppose, only the whole land of Israel, then governed by king Herod, and soon after divided into several distinct provinces—though this gives a very restricted interpretation of the word translated 'all the world,' of which no indisputable instances have been produced. 'Such an account used to be taken of the citizens of Rome every fifth year, for which they had officers on purpose, called censors. Their business was to take an account, and make a register, of all the Roman citizens, their wives and children, with the age, qualities, trades, offices, and estates, real and personal, of all of them. Augustus first extended this to the provinces—Three times, during his reign, he caused the like description to be made. The second is the description, which Luke refers to. The decree concerning it was issued out three years before that in which Christ was born. No payment of any tax was made, (as this survey) till the twelfth year after; till then Herod, and after him Archelaus, his son, reigning in Judea. But when Archelaus was deposed, and Judea put under the command and government of a Roman procurator, then first were taxes paid the Romans for that country. If it be asked, for what reason then was this survey or description of Judea made, if no taxes were then to be paid upon it? The answer is, he was then at work on the composition of a book, containing such a survey and description of the whole Roman empire, as that which our Doomsday-book doth for England. In order whereto, his decree for this survey was made to extend to the depending kingdoms, as well as the provinces of the empire, that he might have a full account of both, for the thorough completing of the work. However, taxes were by the people of the provinces only paid to the Romans, and those of the dependent kingdoms to their own proper princes; the people paid their taxes to their princes, and the princes paid their tribute to the Roman emperors. Prideaux.—It is plain from this account, that the sceptre was at least departing from Judah, when Christ was born. (Gen. 49: 10.)

want of rulers, Isa. 49:7. Many suppose that, being born during the time of the taxing, He was enrolled as well as Joseph and Mary, that it might appear how He made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant;—instead of having kings tributaries to Him, when He came into the world, He was Himself a tributary.

III. The circumstances. Those were very mean, and under all possible marks of contempt. He was indeed a First-born Son; but it was poor honor to be the first-born of such a poor woman as Mary was, who had no inheritance to which He might be entitled as First-born, but what was in nativity.

1. He was under some abasements, in common with other children; being wrapped in swaddling clothes, as they are when new-born. He that makes darkness a swaddling band for the sea, was Himself wrapped in swaddling bands, Job 38: 9. The everlasting Father became a child of with the family of David, concerning which, it is probable, the emperor gave particular orders, it having been the royal family, and still talked of as designed to be so, that he might know its number and strength. Divers ends of Providence were served by this.

1. Mary, great with child, was hereby brought to Bethlehem, to be delivered there, according to the prediction; whereas she had designed to lie in at Nazareth. See how man purposes and God disposes; and how Providence orders all things for the fulfilling of the Scripture, and makes use of the projects men have for the serving their own purposes, quite beyond their intention, to serve his.

2. Hereby Jesus Christ was proved to be of the seed of David; for what brings his mother to Bethlehem now, but because she was of the stock and lineage of David? This was a material thing to be proved, and required such an authentic proof as this. Justin Martyr and Tertullian, two of the most early advocates for the Christian religion, appeal to these rolls or records of the Roman empire, for the proof of Christ's being born of the house of David.

3. Hereby it appeared that He was made under the law; for He became a subject of the Roman empire as soon as He was born, a ser-time, and men said of Him, whose out-gone were of old from everlasting, We know this man whence He is, John 7: 27. The Ancient of days became an Infant of a span long.

2. He was under some abasements peculiar to Himself.

He was born at an inn. This was to intimate, that He came into the world but to sojourn here for a while, as in an inn, and to tell us to do likewise. An inn receives all comers, and so does Christ. He hangs out the banner of love for his sign, and whoever comes to Him, He will in no wise cast out; only, unlike other inns, He welcomes those that come without money and without price. All is on free cost.

He was born in a stable; so some think the word signifies, which we translate a manger, a place for cattle to stand to be fed in; because there was no room in the inn, and for want of conveniences, nay, for want of necessities, He was laid in the manger, instead of a cradle. The word which we render swaddling clothes, some derive from a word that signifies to 'rend, or tear, and thence infer that his very swaddles were ragged and torn. His being born in a stable and laid in a manger, was an instance, 1. Of the poverty of his parents'. Had they been rich, room would have been made for them but, being poor, they must shift as they could. 2. Of the corruption and degeneracy of men in that age; that a woman in reputation for virtue and honor, should be used so barbarously. If there had been any common humanity among them, they would not have turned a woman in travail into a stable. 3. It was an instance of the humiliation of our Lord Jesus. We were become by sin like an out-cast infant helpless and forlorn; and such a one Christ was. Thus He would answer the type of Moses, the great prophet and lawgiver of the Old Testament, who was in his infancy cast out in an ark of bulrushes, as Christ in a manger.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1-7. The omniscient God foresees and permits the innumerable volitions of free agents, and overrules them for the accomplishment of his own righteous purposes: thus He performs his prophecies and confirms his truth, even by wicked men, and by events which seem to us most casual. But who would have expected, that 'the Lord of glory,' when He became a Child, would have been lodged in a stable, or laid in a manger? Yet this was but a faint shadow of 'his grace, who though He were rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be made rich.' (John 13: 1-5. 2 Cor. 8: 6-9, v. 9. Phil. 2: 5-8. Heb. 2: 10-13.) He well knew what deference would be paid, even by his ministers and disciples, to wealth and rank, and what an improper distinction would be made between the rich and the poor, even in religious societies and places of worship. (Jam. 2: 1-4.) Too much of these evils is every where to be seen; and they must have been much more predominant, had our Lord appeared on earth attended with outward splendor and magnificence. But his condition, from his birth in a stable to his death on the cross, was suited to expose the vanity of outward distinctions, and to ennoble and dignify poverty, and all its mean attendants. When we by faith view the incarnate Son of God lying in a manger, we cannot but feel a check given to our vanity and ambition, our coveting and envying; our souls must in some degree grow more weaned from the world; we cannot, with this object before our eyes, 'seek great things; for ourselves or our children, or disdain the poor believer; we cannot flatter the rich or honorable, or refuse respect to those who are the most apt representatives of our poor and suffering Redeemer; and we should be more effectually delivered from such errors in judgment and practice, did we more fully 'ponder these things in our hearts.'—Nor let us forget to copy the meekness and patience of Mary, who willingly endured fatigue, contempt and neglect, contentedly lodged in a stable, and there met the pains of child-birth, without complaining of the unkindness of the citizens of Bethlehem. If any persons, when performing the tender duties of the parental character, should be ready to complain, that their beloved offspring are not provided for as they could wish; let them think of Mary, wrapping her holy Babe in swaddling-clothes, and laying Him in the manger: this will silence the rising murmur, or change it into admiring praise. And, whilst we contrast her conduct with that of those, who at that time shut their doors against the most excellent and honored persons who ever visited the city, that they might entertain the sons and daughters of pride and affluence, let us learn to 'use hospitality without grudging,' especially to poor believers; and, instead of feasting the rich with ostentatious expense, let us entertain Christ in the person of his poor disciples. Thus we shall approve ourselves 'followers of God, as dear children,' and insure a gracious recompense at the 'resurrection of the just.' (See 14: 12-14. P. O. 12: 24.)

(5) To be taxed.] 'To enrol himself, &c. Cyrenius, whom Tacitus calls "an active soldier and a rigid commissioner," was well qualified for an employment so odious to Herod—to whom Augustus had written that he would no longer treat him "as a friend, but as a subject," and to his subjects. By the very policy of Roman jurisprudence, to prevent insurrections and to expedite the business, all were required to repair to their own cities. Even in Italy, the consular edict commanded the Latin citizens "not to be enrolled at Rome, but all in their own cities," and this precaution was still more necessary in the turbulent provinces, like Judea and Galilee; and the decree was pre-emptory, and admitted of no delay. Joseph, therefore, was obliged to go with Mary, notwithstanding her advanced state of pregnancy, to his family town. Thus did "the fierceness of man," or the anger of Augustus towards Herod; "turn to the praise of God," and to the fulfilment of prophecy.'

(7) Swaddling clothes.] 'This binding in swaddling clothes was studiously acquired to by the ancients, lest the tender frame of the infant might acquire, through weakness, or an accidental wrench, any distortion. The practice of confining the limbs of infants was not peculiar to the ancients, but was in use in England, till the last century.'

Stable, manger.] 'A grotto or cave must to them that live in tents be the most convenient stable they could have. There is nothing thus improbable in the tradition, that our Lord, who was confessedly born in a stable, was born in a grotto in or very near the city of Bethlehem. Natural or artificial grottoes are very common in the eastern countries, particularly in Judea, and are often used for their cattle. Pococke observes, "there were three uses for grottoes: for they served either for sepulchres, cisterns, or as retreats for herds; and their cattle in bad weather, and especially in the winter nights." HANMER.

The place was not properly a stable, in our sense of the word, a house only for cattle, but was intended for supplying travellers, as to this day they are supplied in the East, with both stable and lodging under the same roof.'

CAMPBELL.

The traveller frequently observes similar grottoes put to similar uses, along the shores of the Mediterranean, formed with but little assistance from art; as, especially, in the porous and cavernous tufa rocks in the vicinity of Syracuse—where the beasts are sometimes fed from a rude manger, hollowed in the side of the cavern, either expressly for that purpose, or as a tomb for one of the ancient inhabitants of that populous city.

Ps.

8 ¶ And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping flocks by night.

9 And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid.

10 And the angel said unto them, "Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

11 For unto you is born this day in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ, the Lord.

Christ would hereby put a contempt on all worldly glory, and teach us to slight it. Since his own received Him not, let us not think it strange if they receive us not.

V. 8—20. The meanest circumstances of Christ's humiliation were all along attended with some discoveries of his glory; for even when He humbled Himself, God did in some measure exalt Him, and give Him earnestness of his future exaltation. When we saw Him wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger, we were tempted to say, 'Surely, this cannot be the Son of God.' But see his birth attended, as it is here, with a choir of angels, and we shall say, 'Surely, it can be no other than the Son of God, concerning whom it was said, when He was brought into the world, Let all the angels of God worship Him,' Heb. 1: 6.

We had in Matthew an account of the appearance of a star pointing out his birth to the wise men, who were Gentiles; here we are told of the notice given of it by an angel to the shepherds, who were Jews; to each God chose to speak in the language they were most conversant with. 1. See here the shepherds' employment; they were in the fields adjoining Bethlehem, keeping watch over their flocks, v. 8. To these, not to the chief priests or the elders, was the angel sent. They were like Jacob, plain men, dwelling in tents, not like Esau, cunning hunters. The patriarchs were shepherds, Moses and David particularly were called from keeping the sheep, to rule God's people; and by this instance God would show, that He had still a favor for those of that innocent employment. Tidings were brought to Moses of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, when he was keeping sheep, and to these shepherds, who, it is probable, were devout, pious men, the tidings were brought of a greater salvation. Observe, 1. They were not sleeping in their beds, when this news was brought them, but broad awake: (those that would hear from God, must stir up themselves;) and therefore could not be deceived in what they saw and heard, so as those may be, who are half asleep. 2. They were employed now, not in acts of devotion, but in the business of their calling; keeping watch over their flock, to secure them from thieves and beasts of prey, it probably, being in the summer time, when they kept their cattle out all night, as we do now, and did not house them. Note, We are not out of the way of divine visits, when we are sensibly employed in an honest calling, and abide with God in it.

II. Their surprise at the appearance of an angel, (v. 9.) who came upon them of a sudden, or stood over them, most probably, in the air over their heads, as coming immediately from heaven. We read it, the angel, as if it were the same that appeared once and again in the chapter before, the angel Gabriel, that was caused to fly swiftly: but that is not certain. The angels coming upon them intimates that they little thought of such a thing, or expected it; for it is in a preventing way that gracious visits are made us from heaven, or ever we are aware. That they might be sure it was an angel from heaven, they saw and heard the glory of the Lord round about them; such as made the night as bright as day, such a glory as used to attend God's appearance, a heavenly glory, or an exceeding great glory, such as they could not bear the dazzling lustre of. This made them sore afraid, put them into a consternation, as fearing some evil tidings: while we are conscious to ourselves of so much guilt, we have reason to fear, lest every express from heaven be a messenger of wrath.

III. The angel's message to the shepherds, v. 10—12. 1. He gives a supersedeas to their fears; 'Fear not, for we have nothing to say to you, that needs be a terror to you; you need not fear your enemies, and should not fear your friends.' 2. He furnished them with abundant matter for joy; 'Behold, I evangelize to you great joy; I solemnly declare it, and you have reason to bid it welcome, for it shall bring joy to all men.'

Veres 8—14.

'As Abraham and David, to whom the promise of the Messiah was first made, were shepherds.' (Moses likewise might have been added, Ex. 2: 21.) so was the completion of this promise first revealed to shepherds. The shepherds watched severally in their courses.' Whithy.—It was proper that so important an event should be announced with peculiar solemnity, and angels were the heralds of the new-born Savior: (Matt. 2: 1, 2. Marg. and Marg. Ref. q. Marg. Ref. r, s.) The angel encouraged them not to fear, for he was come to bring them good tidings, for to them, as men, as sinners, and as believers, was born on that day, at Bethlehem, a Savior from wrath, Satan, sin, and death, who was indeed the promised and expected Messiah, Israel's anointed Prophet, Priest, and King; nay, 'the Lord of glory,' the Lord of all, 'the Lord from heaven,' God manifest in the flesh.' (Marg. Ref. u—c. Ja. 7: 14, 3. 5, 7.) No sooner had the angel finished this address to the poor shepherds, than he was visibly joined by 'multitudes of the heavenly host,' or of the angelic armies; who, being filled with inexpressible admiration of the love of God, and the display of all his glorious perfections, in this surprising transaction, audibly celebrated his praises with triumphant acclamations, saying, 'Glory to God in the highest, &c.' implying that this was the grand display of the divine glory, and superior to all others which they had ever witnessed. (19: 38.) They therefore called on all the inhabitants of the highest heavens, to praise God in their loftiest strains of adoration: for now peace was prepared for the earth, which had so long lain in a state of rebellion, enmity, discord and misery: peace inward and outward, with God and with each other, would be found on earth, through the gracious work of the divine Peace-maker, whom the Father, out of 'good-will to men,' fallen men, had provided and sent among them. (Marg. Ref. d—f. John 3: 16. Rom. 5: 10. Eph. 1: 3—8. 2: 14—18. 3: 9—12. 1 Pet. 1: 10—12. Rev. 5: 11—14. 20: 4—6.) 'So rich and free is the good-will of God to fallen men; and such blessed peace, external and internal, will eventually be produced on earth, that the glory of God will be more displayed and adored, in this, than in all his other works.'—This seems the purport of these angelic praises; but the abrupt, sententious manner in which they were delivered, while it rendered them more suited to their fervent acclamations, increased the difficulty of unfolding the full meaning of each expression. (Ps. 85:10—13.)

(8.) Abiding the field, keeping watch by night. Commentators were peculiarly solicitous to provide some shelter for these shepherds—tents, cottages, booths, &c. but, not more probable, that they spent the night as the Spanish shepherds do, enveloped in their long mantle, an oblong garment, woven like a carpet, of coarse woollen stuff, of this shape? The head is put through the opening in the middle.

'It was a custom among the Jews, to send out their sheep to the desert, about the passover, and bring them home at the commencement of the first rain. As the passover occurred in the spring, and the first rain began early in the month of Marchesvan, which answers to part of our October and November, we find that the shepherds were kept in the open country during the whole of the summer.' And as the shepherds had not yet brought home their flocks, it is a presumption, to argue that October had not yet commenced, and that consequently our Lord was not born on the 25th of December, when no flocks were out in the fields; nor could he have been born later than September as the flocks were still in the fields by night. (On this very ground the nativity in December should be given up.) [So Loddridge add others.

Ed.
'The first Christians placed the baptism of Christ about the beginning of the fifteenth year of Tiberius; and thence, reckoned back thirty years, they placed his birth in the forty-third year of the Julian period, the forty-second of Augustus, and the twenty-eighth after the victory at Actium. This opinion prevailed till A. D. 527, when Dionysius Exiguus invented the vulgar account. Learned and pious men have trifled egregiously on this subject, making that of importance which the Holy Spirit, by his silence, has plainly informed them is of none. Fabricius gives a catalogue of no less than one hundred and thirty-six different opinions concerning the year of Christ's birth; and as to his birth-day, that has been placed by Christian sects and learned men, in every month of the year. The Egyptians placed it in January—Wagenseil in February—Bochart in March—some mentioned by Clement Alexandrinus, in April—others in May—Epiphanius speaks of some who placed it in June, and others who supposed it to have been in July—Wagenseil, who was not sure of February, fixed it probably in August—Lightfoot on the 15th September—Scaliger, Casaubon, and Calvisius, in October—others in November—but the Latin church, supreme in power, and infallible in judgment, placed it on the 25th December, the very day on which the ancient Romans celebrated the feast of their goddess Bruma.' 'Pope Julius I was the person who made this alteration, and it appears to have been done for this reason: the sun now began his return towards the northern tropic ending the winter, lengthening the short days, and introducing the spring. All this was probably deemed emblematical of the rising of the Sun of righteousness on the darkness of the world, and causing the day-spring from on high to visit mankind.' [But see Bloodfield.]

to all people; and not to the people of the Jews only; th t unto you is born this day, at this time, a Savior, the Savior that has been so long expected, which is Christ the Lord, in the city of David; v. 11. Jesus is the Christ, the Messiah, the Anointed; The Lord, Lord of all; a sovereign Prince; nay, He is God, for the Lord, in the Old Testament, answers to Jehovah. He is a Savior, and He will be a Savior to those only that accept of Him for their Lord. 'The Savior is born, He is born this day; and since it is matter of great joy to all people, it is not to be kept secret, you may proclaim it, may tell it to whom you please. He is born in the place where it was foretold He should be born, in the city of David; and He is born to you, to you Jews He is sent in the first place, to bless you, to you, shepherds, though poor and mean in the world.' This refers to Isa. 9: 6. Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given. To you men, not to us angels; He took not on Him our nature. This is matter of joy indeed to all people, great joy. Long-looked-for is come at last. Let heaven and earth rejoice before this Lord, for He cometh. 3. He gives them a sign for the confirming of their faith in this matter. 'You will find Him by this token; He is lying in a manger, where surely never any new-born infant was laid before.' They expected to be told, 'You shall find Him, though a Babe, dressed up in robes, and lying in the best house in the town, lying in state, with a numerous train of attendants in rich liveries.' 'No, you will find Him wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger.' When Christ was here on earth, He distinguished Himself, and made Himself remarkable, by nothing so much as the instances of his humiliation.

IV. The angels' doxology, and congratulations, v. 13, 14. The message was no sooner delivered by one angel, (that was sufficient to go express,) than suddenly there was with that angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts; sufficient, we may be sure, to make a chorus, that were heard by the shepherds, praising God; and certainly their song was not like that (Rev. 14: 3.) which no man could learn, for it was designed that we should all learn it. 1. Let God have the honor of this work; Glory to God in the highest. God's good-will to men; manifested in sending the Messiah, redounds very much to his praise; and angels in the highest heavens, though not immediately interested in it themselves, will celebrate it in his honor, Rev. 5: 11, 12. Glory to God, whose kindness and love designed this favor, and whose wisdom contrived it in such a way, as that one divine attribute should not be glorified at the expense of another, but the honor of all effectually secured and advanced. Other works of God are for his glory, but the redemption of the world is for his glory in the highest. 2. Let men have the joy of it; On earth, peace, good-will toward men. God's good-will in sending the Messiah, introduced peace in this lower world, slew the enmity that sin had raised between God and man, and resettled a peaceful correspondence. If God be at peace with us, all peace results from thence; peace of conscience, peace with angels, peace between Jew and Gentile; peace is here put for all good, all that good which flows to us from the incarnation of Christ. All the good we have, or hope, is owing to God's good-will; and if we have the comfort of it, He must have the glory of it. Nor must any peace, any good, be expected in a way inconsistent with the glory of God; therefore not in any way of sin, nor in any way but by a Mediator. Here was the peace proclaimed with great solemnity; whoever will, let them come and take the benefit of it. It is on earth peace to men of good-will, (so some copies read it,) to men who have a good-will to God, and are willing to be reconciled; or to men whom God has a good-will to, though vessels of his mercy. See how well affected the angels are to man, and to his welfare and happiness; how well pleased they were in the incarnation of the Son of God, though He passed by their nature; and ought not we much more to be affected with it? This is a faithful saying, attested by an innumerable company of angels, and well worthy of all acceptance—That is good-will of God toward men, is glory to God in the highest, and peace on the earth.

V. The shepherds' visit to the new-born Savior. 1. They consulted about it, v. 15. While the angels were singing their hymn, they could attend to that only; but when they were gone away to heaven, (for angels never made long stay, but returned as soon as they had despatched their business,) the shepherds said one to another, Let us go to Bethlehem. Note, When extraordinary messages from heaven are no more to be expected, we must set ourselves to improve what we have. Nor is it any reflection on the testimony of angels, nor upon even a divine testimony itself, to get it corroborated by observation and experience. But observe, These shepherds do not speak doubtfully, 'Let us go see whether it be so or no;' but with assurance, Let us go see this thing which is come to pass; for what room was left to doubt of it, when the Lord had thus made it known to them? The word spoken by angels was steadfast and unquestionably true. 2. They immediately made the visit, (v. 16.)—came with haste to the place, which, probably, the angel directed

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 8-14. We should learn to judge and act as holy angels do: they did not regard the holy family the less, for being lodged in a stable; and the Savior never appeared so honorable and excellent, according to their judgment, as when He lay in the manger, except when He hung expiring on the cross for our sins, and praying for his crucifiers. Humble, simple piety, and honest industry, are more approved by the inhabitants of heaven, than all the dignities and wisdom of the world. (Heb. 1: 13, 14.) The angels delight in celebrating the praises of God, for those displays of his glory, in which they are not personally interested; and they still, as it were, proclaim in our ears, 'To you is born a Savior, who is Christ, the Lord.' These then ought to be glad tidings to all who hear them.—But most happy for us the hour, in which we were enabled to believe in Christ for the salvation of our souls. Unless this has been vouchsafed, we can have no reason to rejoice at the nativity of Jesus; for that event will but enhance our guilt and condemnation; and if real Christians deem it proper to commemorate it, as a season set apart for that purpose, they will not do it with bacchanalian revels, or luxurious feasting, but with more abundant thanksgivings to God, and liberality to the poor. Joining their feeble hymns to the songs of angels, with adoring, grateful acclamations will they repeat, 'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good-will towards men;' they will employ their prayers, and examples, and endeavors, to give glory to God, by making known the Gospel to those who sit in darkness all over the world, and by copying his good-will to men: thus will they ripen for the joys of heaven, by their worship and services here on earth.

In the highest. 'As the Jews reckoned three heavens, the highest was considered as the place of the throne of God. When we find it contrasted with earth, (as in the present verse,) we have reason to assign it this meaning: The one is mentioned as the habitation of God, the other as that of men. This is entirely in the Jewish manner. Ecc. 5: 2.'

This, and this only, is the message which all Christ's true pastors or shepherds bring to men. How can religious contentions, civil broils, or open wars, look that Gospel in the face, which publishes nothing but glory to God, and peace and good-will among men? Crusades for the recovery of a holy land, as wars for the support of religion are an insult to the Gospel.'

18 And all they that heard it, wondered at those things, which were told them by the shepherds.

19 But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart.

20 And the shepherds returned glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them.

21 And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcising of the child, his name was called JESUS, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb.

22 And when the days of her purification, according to the law of Moses, were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord;

them to more particularly than is recorded; ('Go to the stable of such an inn?') and there they found Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger. The poverty, and meanness in which they found Christ the Lord, were no shock to their faith, who themselves knew what it was to live a life of comfortable communion with God in very poor and mean circumstances. We have reason to think that the shepherds told Joseph and Mary of the vision of the angels they had seen, and the song of the angels they had heard, which was a great encouragement to them. And it is probable that Joseph and Mary told the shepherds what visions they had had concerning the child; and so, by communicating their experiences to each other, they greatly strengthened one another's faith.

VI. The care which the shepherds took to spread the report of this; (v. 17.) though they saw nothing in the child that should induce them to believe that he was Christ the Lord, yet the circumstances, how mean soever they were, agreeing with the sign given by the angel, they were abundantly satisfied; and as the helpers argued, (2 Kings 7: 9. This being a day of good tidings, we dare not hold our peace,) so they made known abroad the whole story of what was told them, both by the angels, and by Joseph and Mary, concerning this child, that he was the Savior, even Christ the Lord, that in him there is peace on earth, and that he was conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of a virgin. They told every body, and agreed in their testimony concerning it. And now, if when He is in the world, the world knows Him not; it is their own fault, for they have sufficient notice given them. But what impression did it make on people? Why truly, All they that heard it, wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds, v. 18. The shepherds were plain, downright, honest men, and they could not suspect them guilty of any design to impose upon them; what they had said therefore, was likely to be true; and if it were true, they could not but wonder at it, that the Messiah should be born in a stable, and not in a palace; that angels should bring news of it to poor shepherds, and not to the chief priests. They wondered, but never inquired further about the Savior, their duty to Him, or advantages by Him. O the amazing stupidity of the men of that generation! Justly were the things which belonged to their peace, hid from their eyes, when they thus wilfully shut their eyes against them.

VII. The use made of these things, by those who believed them, and received the impression of them.

1. Mary made them the matter of her private meditation; she said little, but kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart, v. 19. She laid the evidences together, and kept them in reserve, to be compared with the discoveries that should afterwards be made her. As she had silently left it to God to clear up her virtue, when that was suspected, so she silently leaves it to Him to publish her honor, now when it was veiled; and it is satisfaction enough to find, that if no one else takes notice of the birth of her child, angels do. Note, The truths of Christ are hard keeping; and the way to keep them safe, is to ponder them. Meditation is the best help to memory.

2. The shepherds made them the matter of their more public praise. If others were not affected with those things, yet they were; (v. 20.) They returned, glorifying and praising God, with the holy angels. If others would not regard their report, God would accept their thanksgivings. They praised God for what they had heard, and for what they had seen, as it had been spoken to them. They thanked God that they had seen Christ, though in the depth of his humiliation; and as afterward the cross of Christ, so now his manger, though some saw in it only foolishness and a stumbling block, others saw in it, the wisdom of God and the power of God.

V. 21—24. Our Lord Jesus, being made of a woman, was made under the law, Gal. 4: 4. Not only the law of nature, but, the law of Moses; he puts his neck under that yoke, though a heavy yoke, and a shadow of good things to come. And though its institutions were beggarly elements, and rudiments of this world, He submitted to it, that He might the better cancel it, and set it aside for us.

Now here we have two instances of his being made under that law, and submitting to it.

1. He was circumcised, on the very day that the law appointed, (v. 21.) that day seven-night that He was born. Though a painful operation, (Exod. 4: 25.) yet Christ would undergo it for us, to give an instance of his early obedience even unto blood. Then He shed his blood by drops, which afterward He poured out in purple streams. Though it supposed Him a stranger, nay, a sinner, yet He submitted to it, because He would be made in the likeness, not only of flesh, but of sinful flesh, Rom. 8: 2. Though thereby He made Himself a Debtor to the whole law, (Gal. 5: 8.) yet He submitted to it, because He would take on Him the form of a servant, though free-born. Christ was circumcised, 1. That He might own Himself of the seed of Abraham, of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who was to take on Him the seed of Abraham, Heb. 2: 16. 2. That He might own Himself our surety, and undertaker. Circumcision (saith Dr. Goodwin) was our bond, whereby we acknowledged ourselves debtors to the law; and Christ, by being circumcised, did, as it were, set his hand to it, being made Sin for us. The ceremonial law consisted much in sacrifices; Christ here offered Himself to offer, not the blood of bulls or goats but his own blood, which none that ever were circumcised before, could oblige themselves to. 3. That He might justify, and put an honor on the dedication of the infant seed of the church of God, by that ordinance which is the instituted seal of the covenant, and of the righteousness which is by faith; as circumcision was (Rom. 4: 11.) and baptism is. And certainly his being circumcised at eight days old, doth make much more for the dedicating of the seed of the faithful by baptism in their infancy, than his being baptized at thirty years old doth, for the deferring of it till they are grown up. The change of the ceremony alters not the substance.

At his circumcision, according to the custom, He had his name given him.—Jesus or Joshua, for he was so named of the angel to his mother Mary, before he was conceived in the womb (Luke 1: 31.) and to his supposed father Joseph after, Matt. 1: 21. It was a common name among the Jews, as John was; (Col. 4: 11.) and in this He would be made like unto his brethren. It was the name of two eminent types of him in the Old Testament; Joshua, the successor of Moses, who was commander of Israel, and conqueror of Canaan; and Joshua, the high priest, who was therefore purposely

(Marg. Ref. c. 1. 57. 65. Gen. 17: 9—12. Matt. 3: 13—15.) This painful ceremony was, in his case, a pledge given of his future perfect obedience to the whole law. (Gal. 5: 3.) in the midst of sufferings and temptations, even unto death for us; and it was an entrance on that vicarious work which He finished on the cross. The name Jesus has already been explained. (Matt. 1: 21, 21.) Eight. That is, not when the eighth day was ended, but when it was come. Whithy. This illustrates the expression 'after three days,' as used concerning our Lord's resurrection. (Mark 8: 31.)

(Marg. Ref.—Ex. 13: 2, 11—13. Lev. 12: 2—5.) At the end of four days, Mary went up to the temple, to offer the appointed sacrifice for her purification; for though in her case, there were not the same reasons for this observance, as in that of other women, yet she cannot on exemption. Joseph also attended her, taking the holy child Jesus; because, being a first-born Son, He was to be presented to the Lord, and redeemed according to the law. (24.) A pair, &c.] Lev. 12: 6. & (23.) There is here some variety of reading. Some copies have "their," others "her," but the great majority "their." The reading "her," is justly suspected to have proceeded from the superstition of those, who were scandalized at the idea of impurity being ascribed to Jesus. But it should be considered that the impurity was only external and ceremonial, not moral, it being merely an obligation and restraint laid on women newly brought to bed, till after certain rites. And although the law of purification does only specify the mother, yet it cannot be doubted but that the infant at the breast must have been comprehended, since the impurity being communicable by contact, the infant could not but be impure also. "Their" has therefore been deservedly adopted by recent modern critics.'

(23.) The law.] 'Agreeably to this precept. (Ex. 13: 2. Num. 8: 16, 17.) they went up to, redeem Him [the Infant Jesus] at the price of five shekels, which was the sum appointed to be paid for every eldest son, without any regard to the condition of the family. Compare Num. 18: 15, 16'

But, according to the law, he was redeemed, Num. 18: 15. The first-born of man shall thou redeem, and five shekels was the value, Lev. 27: 6. Num. 18: 16. But probably, in case of poverty, the priest was allowed to take less, or perhaps nothing, for no mention is made of it here. Christ was presented to the Lord, not to be brought back, but to serve Him forever; and though not left in the temple as Samuel was, to minister there, yet like him He is given to the Lord as long as He lives, and ministers to Him in the true temple not made with hands.

2. The mother brought her offering, v. 24. When she had presented that Son of hers unto the Lord, who was to be the great Sacrifice, she might have been excused from offering any other; but so it is said in the law of the Lord, she must offer a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons; had she been of ability, she must have brought a lamb for a burnt-offering, and a dove for a sin-offering; but, being poor, and not able to reach the price of a lamb, she brings two doves, one for a burnt-offering, and the other for a sin-offering; (see Lev. 12: 7, 8.) to teach us in every address to God, and particularly in those on special occasions, both to give thanks to God for his mercies to us, and to acknowledge with sorrow and shame our sins against Him; in both we must give glory to Him, nor do we ever want matter for both. Christ was not conceived and born in sin, as others are, so that there was not that occasion crowned, that he might prefigure Christ, as a priest upon his throne, Zech. 6: 11, 13. It was very significant of his undertaking. Jesus signifies a Savior. He would be denominated, not from the glories of his divine nature, but from his gracious designs as a Mediator: He brings salvation.

II. He was presented in the temple. This was done with an eye to the law, and at the time appointed by the law, when He was forty days old, when the days of her purification were accomplished, v. 22. Many copies, and authentic ones, read the days of their purification, the purification both of the mother and of the child, for so it was intended to be by the law; and our Lord Jesus, though He had no impurity to be cleansed from, yet submitted to it, as He did to circumcision, because, He was made sin for us; and that, as by the circumcision of Christ we might be circumcised, in the virtue of our union and communion with Him, with a spiritual circumcision made without hands, (Col. 2: 11.) so in the purification of Christ we might be spiritually purified from the filthiness and corruption which we brought into the world with us. Now, according to the law,

1. The child Jesus, being a first-born Son, was presented to the Lord, in one of the courts of the temple. The law is here recited, v. 23. Every male that opens the womb, shall be called holy to the Lord, because by a special writ of protection the first-born of Israel were preserved, when the first-born of the Egyptians were slain by the destroying angel; so that Christ, as First-born, was a Priest by a title surer than that of Aaron's house. Christ was the first-born among many brethren, and was called holy to the Lord, so as never any other was; yet He was presented to the Lord, as other first-born were, and no otherwise; which now signified his presenting Himself to the Lord as Mediator, when He was caused to draw near and approach unto Him, Jer. 30: 31. But, according to the law, he was redeemed, Num. 18: 15. The first-born of man shall thou redeem, and five shekels was the value, Lev. 27: 6. Num. 18: 16. But probably, in case of poverty, the priest was allowed to take less, or perhaps nothing, for no mention is made of it here. Christ was presented to the Lord, not to be brought back, but to serve Him forever; and though not left in the temple as Samuel was, to minister there, yet like him He is given to the Lord as long as He lives, and ministers to Him in the true temple not made with hands.

2. The mother brought her offering, v. 24. When she had presented that Son of hers unto the Lord, who was to be the great Sacrifice, she might have been excused from offering any other; but so it is said in the law of the Lord, she must offer a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons; had she been of ability, she must have brought a lamb for a burnt-offering, and a dove for a sin-offering; but, being poor, and not able to reach the price of a lamb, she brings two doves, one for a burnt-offering, and the other for a sin-offering; (see Lev. 12: 7, 8.) to teach us in every address to God, and particularly in those on special occasions, both to give thanks to God for his mercies to us, and to acknowledge with sorrow and shame our sins against Him; in both we must give glory to Him, nor do we ever want matter for both. Christ was not conceived and born in sin, as others are, so that there was not that occasion

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 15-24. When favored with peculiar discoveries of the glory of the Lord, and of his love to us, we should excite one another to a more unreserved attention to his directions, examine more fully what He has made known to us, and seek to have our faith confirmed by experience; we should also endeavor to interest others in what He has taught us concerning the divine Savior; and, pondering such things in our hearts, we should return from holy ordinances to our secular employments, glorifying God for all we have heard and experienced.—While we trust in the perfect righteousness of our divine Surety, we ought to copy his example; seeking the true circumcision of in his case, that is in others; yet, because He was made under the law, He complied with it. Thus it became Him to fulfil all righteousness. Much more doth it become the best of men to join in confession of sin; for who can say, I have made my heart clean?

V. 25-40. Still Christ has honor done Him, when He humbles Himself. But we might not be stumbled at the meanness of his birth, angels then did Him honor; and now, that we may not be offended at his being presented in the temple, like other children born in sin, Simeon and Anna do Him honor by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

1. A very honorable testimony is borne to Him by Simeon, which was both a reputation to the Child, and an encouragement to the parents, and might have been a happy introduction of the priests into an acquaintance with the Savior, if those watchmen had not been blind. Now observe here,

1. The account given concerning this Simeon, or Simon. He dwelt now in Jerusalem, and was eminent for his piety, and communion with God. Some learned men, who have been conversant with the Jewish writers, find that there was at this time one Simeon, a man of great note in Jerusalem, the son of Hillel, and the first to whom they gave the title of Rabbani, the highest title that they gave to their doctors, and which was never given but to seven of them. He succeeded his father Hillel, as president of the college which his father founded, and of the great sanhedrim. The Jews say he was endued with a prophetic spirit, and turned out of his place, because he witnessed against the common opinion of the Jews concerning the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, and they likewise observe, that there is no mention of him in their Mishna, or book of traditions; which intimates that he was no patron of those fooleries. One thing objected against this conjecture, is, that at this time his father Hillel was living, and that he himself lived many years after this, as appears by the Jewish histories; but as to that, he is not here said to be old; and his saying, Now let thy servant depart, intimates that he was willing to die now, but doth not conclude that therefore, he did die quickly. Paul lived many years after he had spoken of his death as near, Acts 20: 25. Another thing objected is, that the son of Simeon was Gamaliel, a Pharisee, and an enemy to Christianity; but as to that, it is no new thing for a faithful lover of Christ to have a son a bigoted Pharisee.

The account given of him here, is, That he was just and devout,—just towards men, and devout towards God, which two must always go together. He waited for the consolation of the heart, the genuine purification from the pollution of sin and the dedication of body and soul to God, which were shaddowed forth in the ancient types and institutions of the Mosaic law. We ought also to present our children to the Lord, who gave them to us; desiring that He would redeem them from sin and death, make them holy to Himself, and number them with the church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven; and such poor services, if they be the fruit of a humble and upright heart, will not be rejected. (Notes, Matt. 19: 13-15. Mark 10: 13-16.)

SCOTT.

Verses 25-32.

The Jewish priests and scribes remained ignorant of the birth of the promised Messiah, till some time after this. (Matt. 2: 1-12.) But there was a small remnant, who had more spiritual views and expectations; and to them it pleased God to give intimations of what had taken place. Among these was Simeon; concerning whom we know no more than what is here recorded. (38-38. Acts 10: 1, 2. Hag. 2: 6-9. Marg. Ref. y-g.—Is. 12: 2. 45: 8, 15-17, 20-25. Hos. 1: 6, 7. Zech. 9: 9, 10. Matt. 1: 20, 21. Acts 4: 5-12. Tit. 2: 13, 14. 3: 4-7.) The Lord Jesus Himself is here called 'the Salvation of God,' because the whole salvation of a sinner centres in His Person, as 'God manifest in the flesh,' all the purposes and promises of salvation had reference to Him: He obtained all the blessings of it by shedding his blood; they are all treasured up in Him, and dispensed by Him to believers; and they are all applied, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, who is given to us through his intercession. (Is. 9: 2. 42: 5-7. 49: 5, 6. 60: 1-3. John 1: 4-9. 3: 19-21. 8: 12. 12: 34-36. Marg. Ref. k-r-p.—Notes, Rom. 9: 4, 5. Phil. 3: 1-7, r-3.) Not that the Spirit of prophecy opened Simeon's enlarged view, the glorious and blessed consequences, both to Israel and the Gentiles, in all subsequent generations, arising from the birth of the Child which he held in his arms; and joyfully anticipating these glories and blessings, he counted himself to have lived long enough upon earth, and was ready for the society, worship, and joy of heaven, to join the songs of 'the heavenly host,' who had before sang at his birth, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men,' p. 14. 'It is wonderful that, after so many clear prophecies, in the Old Testament, of the calling of the Gentiles, the Jews should have been all so blind, as to imagine God had no kindness for them.' Why? It is likewise worth inquiring, in this view, how far the bulk of professed Christians also may be blinded by prejudice, concerning many things as plainly revealed in the New Testament.

(25.) Simeon.] 'Had Simeon been, as some suppose, the president of the council, and father of the celebrated Gamaliel, Luke would probably have inserted so honorable a circumstance.'

part, or the priest's part; for divers of the ancients say that he was himself a priest. When we receive the record which the Gospel gives us of Christ, with a lively faith, and the offer it makes us of Christ, with love and resignation, then we take Christ in our arms.

4. The solemn declaration he made hereupon; He blessed God, and said, Lord, now lettest Thou thy servant depart in peace, v. 29—32.

(1.) He has a pleasant prospect concerning himself, and (which is a great attainment) is got quite above the love of life, and fear of death; nay, is arrived at a holy contempt of life, and desire of death, v. 29, 30. Here is, [1.] An acknowledgment that God had been as good as his word; as Solomon owns, 1 Kings 8: 56. Note, Never any that hoped in God's word, were made ashamed of their hope. [2.] A thanksgiving for it; He blessed God that he saw that Salvation in his arms, which many prophets and kings desired to see, and might not. [3.] A confession of his faith, that this Child in his arms was the Saviour, the Salvation itself; thy Salvation, the Salvation of thine appointing, the Salvation which Thou hast prepared. [4.] It is a farewell to this world; Now let thy servant depart; now mine eyes have been blessed with this sight, let them be closed, and see no more in this world. The eye is not satisfied with seeing, (Eccl. 1: 8.) till it hath seen Christ, and then it is. What a poor thing doth this world look to one that hath Christ in his arms, and salvation in his eye! Now adieu to all my friends and relations, all my enjoyments and employments here, even the temple itself. [5.] It is a welcome to death; Now let thy servant depart. Note, Death is a departure, the soul's departure out of the body, from the world of sense to the world of spirits. We must not depart till God gives us our discharge, for we are his servants, and must not quit his service till we have accomplished our time. Moses would have had more than was promised, (Deut. 3: 24, 25.) but Simeon is more than satisfied with what is promised him. See here, First, How comfortable the death of a good man is; he departs as God's servant from the place of his toil to that of his rest. He departs in peace, peace with God, peace with his own conscience; in peace with death, well reconciled to it, well acquainted with it. He departs according to God's word, as Moses, Deut. 34: 5. Secondly, What is the ground of this comfort? For mine eyes have seen thy Salvation. This speaks more than a great complacency in the sight, like that of Jacob, (Gen. 46: 30.) Now let me die, since I have seen thy face. It speaks a believing expectation of a happy state on the other side death, through this salvation he now had a sight of, which not only takes off the terror of death, but makes it gain, Phil. 1: 21. Note, Those that have welcomed Christ, never welcome death.

Israel, that is, for the coming of the Messiah, in whom alone the nation of Israel, that was now miserably harassed and oppressed, would find consolation. He understood by books, as Daniel, that the time was at hand, and therefore was now more than ever big with expectation of it. The unbelieving Jews, who still expect that which is already come, use it as an oath, or solemn protestation, As ever I hope to see the consolation of Israel, so and so it is. Note, The consolation of Israel is to be waited for, is worth waiting for, and will be welcome to those who have waited for it, and continue waiting. The Holy Ghost was upon him, not only as a Spirit of holiness, but as a Spirit of prophecy; he was filled with the Holy Ghost, and enabled to speak things above himself. He had a gracious promise made him, that before he died he should have a sight of the Messiah, v. 26. Note, Those, and those only, can with courage see death, and look it in the face without terror, that have had by faith a sight of Christ.

2. The seasonable coming of Simeon into the temple, at the time when Christ was presented there, v. 27. Just then, when Joseph and Mary brought in the child, to be registered, as it were, in the church-book, among the first-born, Simeon came, by direction of the Spirit, into the temple. Note, Those that would see Christ, must go to his temple: for there the Lord whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to meet you, and there you must be ready to meet Him.

3. The abundant satisfaction wherewith he welcomed this sight; (v. 28.) he embraced Him with the greatest affection imaginable. He took Him up in his arms, to present Him to the Lord, (so some think,) to do either the parent's

(2.) He has a pleasant prospect concerning the world, and concerning the church. This Salvation shall be,

[1.] A blessing to the world. It is prepared before the face of all people, not to be hid, but to be made known; to be a Light to lighten the Gentiles; they shall have the knowledge of Him, and of God, and another world, through Him. This has reference to Isa. 49: 6. I will give thee for a Light to the Gentiles; for Christ came to be the Light of the world, not a candle in the Jewish candlestick, but the Sun of righteousness.

[2.] A Blessing to the church; the Glory of thy people Israel. It was an honor to the Jewish nation, that the Messiah sprang out of one of their tribes, and was born, and lived, and died, among them. And of those who were of the spiritual Israel, He was indeed the Glory, and will be so to eternity, Isa. 60: 19. They shall glory in Him. In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory, Isa. 45: 25. When Christ ordered his apostles to preach the Gospel to all nations, therein He made Himself a Light to lighten the Gentiles; and when He added, beginning at Jerusalem, He made Himself the Glory of his people Israel.

5. The prediction concerning this Child, which he delivered, with his blessing, to Joseph and Mary, v. 33. And because they were affected with, and had their faith strengthened by, that which was said to them, here is more said to them.

(1.) Simeon shows them what reason they had to rejoice; for he blessed them, (v. 34.) that is, pronounced them blessed. He prayed for them, that God would bless them, and would have others do so too. They had reason to rejoice, for this Child should be not only a Comfort and Honor to them, but a public Blessing. He is set for the rising again of many in Israel, for the conversion of many to God, that are dead and buried in sin, and for the consolation of many in God, that are sunk and lost in sorrow and despair. Those whom He is set for the fall of, may be the same with those whom He is set for the rising again of. He is set for their fall, in order to their rising again; to humble and abase them, and bring them off from all confidence in themselves, that they may be exalted by relying on Christ; He wounds and then heals. Paul falls and rises again.

(2.) He shows them likewise what reason they had to rejoice with trembling, according to the advice given of old, with reference to the Messiah's kingdom, Ps. 2: 11. Lest they should be lifted up with the abundance of the revelations, here is a thorn in the flesh for them, an alloy to their joy; and it is what we sometimes need.

[1.] It is true, Christ shall be a Blessing to Israel; but there are those in Israel, whom He is set for the fall of, many who will extract poison to themselves out of the balm of Gilead, and split their souls on the Rock of salvation, to whom this precious Foundation-stone will be a stone of stumbling. This refers to that prophecy, (Isa. 8: 14, 15.) He shall be for a Sanctuary to some, and yet for a Snare to others, 1 Pet. 2: 7, 8. Note, As it is pleasant to think how many there are, to whom Christ and his Gospel are a savor of life unto life, so it is sad to think how many there are, to whom it is a savor of death unto death. He is set for a Sign, to be admired by some, but by others, by many, spoken against; that is, on occasion of 'The forgiveness of sin, and deliverance from sin, are also implied, and an entrance into perfect peace and felicity; else death would not be such a release.' SCOTT.

(29) Depart.] 'The result of the researches of critics on the original word here translated depart is this, that it is used partly of death partly of deliverance from prison and bonds, from difficulties of various sorts, dismissal from military office or function, &c. In the use of the word, as found in the Scriptures, and the philosophers, there is a manifest profession of hope in a future state, since the body is supposed to enchain the soul, and detain it from its native home.' a widow of about eighty-four years; some think she had now been eighty-four years a widow; and then she must be considerably above a hundred years old; others, rather than suppose that a woman so very old should be capable of fasting and praying as she did, suppose that she was only eighty-four years of age, and had been long a widow. Though she was a widow young, and had lived with her husband but seven years, yet she never married again, but his being presented, men will show themselves, will discover, and so distinguish themselves, v. 35. The secret good affections and dispositions in the minds of some, will be revealed by their embracing of Christ, and closing with Him; the secret corruptions and vicious dispositions of others, that otherwise would never have appeared so bad, will be revealed by their enmity to Christ, and their rage against Him. Men will be judged of by the thoughts of their hearts, their thoughts concerning Christ; are they for Him, or are they for his adversaries? The Word of God is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart, and by it we are discovered to ourselves, and shall be judged hereafter.

[2.] It is true, Christ shall be a Comfort to his mother; but be not thou too proud of it, for a sword shall pass through thine own soul also. He shall be a suffering Jesus; 'Thou shalt suffer with Him, by sympathy, more than any other of his friends, because of the nearness of thy relation, and strength of affection, to Him.' When He was abused, it was a sword in her bones. When she stood by his cross, and saw Him dying, we may well think her inward grief was such, that it might truly be said, A sword pierced through her soul, it cut her to the heart. 'Thou shalt suffer for Him.' Many understand it as a prediction of her martyrdom; and some of the ancients say, that it had its accomplishment in that. Note, In the midst of our greatest delights and advancements in this world, it is good for us to know that bonds and afflictions abide us.

II. He is taken notice of by one Anna, or Ann, a prophetess, that one of each sex might bear witness to Him, in whom both men and women are invited to believe, that they may be saved. Observe,

1. The account here given of this Anna, who she was. She was a prophetess; the Spirit of prophecy now began to revive, which had ceased in Israel above three hundred years. Perhaps no more is meant than that she had understanding in the Scriptures above other women, and made it her business to instruct the younger women in the things of God. She was the daughter of Phanuel; her father's name (saith Grotius) is mentioned, to put us in mind of Jacob's Phanuel, or Peniel, (Gen. 32:30) that now the mystery of that should be unfolded, when in Christ we should, as it were, see God face to face, and our lives be preserved; and her name signifies gracious. She was of the tribe of Asher, which was in Galilee; this, some think, is taken notice of, to refute those who said, Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet, when, no sooner did prophecy revive but it appeared from Galilee. She was of a great age, continued a widow to her day, which is mentioned to her praise. She was a constant resident in, or at least attendant on, the temple. Some think she had lodgings in the courts of the temple, being maintained by the temple charities; or, as a prophetess, lodged there, as in a proper place to be consulted and advised with by those that desired to know the mind of God; others think her not departing from the temple means no more, but that she was constantly there at the time of divine service: when any good work was to be done, she was ready to join in it. It is most probable she had an apartment of her own among the out-buildings of the temple; and besides her constant attendance on the public worship, abounded in private devotions, for she served God with fastings and prayers night and day; having no secular business to employ herself in, or being past it, she gave up herself wholly to her devotions, and not only fasted twice in the week, but always lived a mortified life, and spent that time in religious exercises, which others spent in eating and drinking and sleeping; she not only observed the hours of prayer, but prayed night and day; was always in a praying frame, lived a life of prayer, gave herself to prayer, frequent in ejaculations, large in solemn prayers, and very particular in her intercessions. And in those she served God; that was it that put a value on them, and an excellency into them. The Pharisees fasted often, and made long prayers, but in this they served themselves, and their own pride and covetousness; but not so this good woman; she did it from a good principle, and with a good end; she served God, and aimed at his honor, in her fasting and prayers. Note, [1.] Devotion is a thing we ought to be constant in; other duties are in season now and then, but we must pray always. [2.] It is a pleasant sight to see aged Christians abounding in acts of devotion, as those that are not weary of well-doing, that do not think themselves above these exercises, or past them, but that take more and more pleasure in them, and see more and more need of them, till they come to heaven. [3.] Those that are diligent and faithful in improving the light and means they have, shall have further discoveries made them. Anna is now at length abundantly recompensed for her attendance so many years in the temple.

2. The testimony she bore to our Lord Jesus; (r. 35.) She came in at that instant when the child was presented, and Simeon discoursed concerning Him; she, who was so constant to the temple, could not miss the opportunity.

Now, (1.) She gave thanks likewise to the Lord, just as Simeon; perhaps, like him, wishing now to depart in peace. Note, Those to whom Christ is made known, have reason enough to give thanks to the Lord for so great a favor; and we should be excited to that duty by the praises and thanksgivings of others; why should not we give thanks likewise, as well as they? Anna concurred with Simeon, and

Verses 33-35.

(Marg. Ref. r.) Many would reject, despise, persecute, and crucify Him, through the pride and enmity of their hearts against the truth; and this would terminate in the temporal ruin of the nation, as well as in the reprobation of many souls: but, at the same time, numbers, yea, many who at first rejected and persecuted Him, would at length repent, and by faith in Him obtain pardon, and so be raised up again to walk in newness of life. His external meanness, his holy character, his humbling doctrine, and his spiritual salutation, proved equally offensive to the Pharisees and Sadducees, and interfered as much with the reputation, interests, and authority of the hypocritical priests and scribes, as with the carnal prejudices of the nation in general. (Notes, Ps. 42:9, 10, John 19:25-27.) The event of the ministry of Jesus, and of the dispensation which He came to introduce, would, also, be that 'the thoughts of many hearts would be revealed,' or the imaginations and reasonings which secretly occupied men's minds, detected. The plausible characters of numbers would thus be shown to be leavened with pride, malice, covetousness, and hypocrisy; while the humility, faith, and piety of others, who had been disregarded, would thus be brought forth and made manifest. (Marg. Ref. s-y.) (34.) This, &c. Neither look that He shall be applauded of all; yea rather, He shall be as a common mark, whereto the arrows of contumely and reproach shall be generally shot, throughout the world: and his name and religion shall be sure to receive opposition and contradiction, every where. And thereby men shall be tried, and occasions shall be given them, to show either the truth or falsehood of their hearts, towards his name and profession. Ep. Mail. (Is. 8:11-13)

1 Pet. 2:7, 8.) (35.) The thoughts. See Mark 7:21. 'It signifieth more than thoughts, even reasonings, disputations, discourses, done with 'weighing and poising things.' Leigh. 'That reasonings out of many hearts may be revealed.' May be revealed. See Matt. 16:17.

(34.) Sign. 'The word seems here to be used for a mark or butt to shoot or dart at; which finely intimates the deliberate malice and hellish artifice with which the character and person of Christ was assaulted, while He endured the contradiction of sinners against Himself, Heb. 12:3.'

(35.) That the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed. 'The sense is, "Thus will it be evinced what is the real disposition of every one to the Messiah." The word translated thoughts is a word of multiple signification, and denotes imaginations, whether good or bad.'

(36.) A prophetess. 'Not in the strictest sense of the word, i. e. one who could foretell future events; but rather a holy woman, who from her extensive knowledge and deep experience in divine things, was capable of instructing others, according to the use of the word prophetess, 1 Cor. 14:3.'

The circumstances of her young and long widowhood are particularly mentioned, since widows who did not marry again are especially honored among the Jews.

BLOOMFIELD.

37 and she was a widow of about fourscore and four years, which departed not from the temple, and served God with fastings and prayers night and day.

38 And she coming in that instant gave thanks likewise unto the Lord, and spake of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem.

39 ¶ And when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth.

40 And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him.

Practical Observations.

V. 35—40. Professing to depend on the salvation of the Lord, and to 'wait for the consolation' of Israel, justice, truth and mercy, as well as piety, should adorn our conduct; and if the Holy Spirit rest upon us, our feet will be directed to the courts and ordinances of the Lord. In this way we shall experience the fulfilment of the promises, and embracing the Savior, be willing to leave this world and go to heaven; provided our work be done, and God be pleased to dismiss us to his heavenly rest. (Heb. 4: 3—11.) Blessed be his name, that this Salvation 'is prepared before the face of all people,' and that this Light hath lightened our Gentile land: may we become a part of the true Israel, who glory in Christ alone! (Note, Phil. 3: 1—7, v. 3.)—But let us not look merely on one side of this subject. This blessed Gospel eventually occasions the fall of many professed Christians, as well as causes the rising again of many, who were sunk deep into guilt and impiety. Still Jesus, his doctrine and his people, are for a 'sign, that is every where spoken against,' still his truth and holiness are contradicted and blasphemed; still the preaching of his word is the touch-stone of men's characters; still they, who are blessed by their relation to Jesus, must expect such things in this evil world, as will wound and distress their souls; and still they helped to make up the harmony. She confessed unto the Lord; (so it may be read;) she made an open profession of her faith concerning this Child.

(2.) She, as a prophetess, instructed others concerning Him; she spake of Him to all them that believed the Messiah would come, and with her looked for redemption in Jerusalem. Redemption was the thing wanted, waited for, and wished for; redemption in Jerusalem, for from thence the word of the Lord was to go forth, Isa. 2: 3. Some there were in Jerusalem, that looked for redemption; yet but a few, for Anna, it should seem, had acquaintance with them all that were joint-expectants with her of the Messiah; she knew where to find them, or they where to find her, and she told them all the good news, that she had seen the Lord; and it was great news, this of his birth now, as afterward that of his resurrection. Note, Those that have got an acquaintance with Christ themselves, should do all they can, to bring others acquainted with Him.

Lastly, Here is a short account of the infancy and childhood of our Lord Jesus.

1. Where He spent it, v. 39. When the ceremony of presenting the child, and purifying the mother, was all over, they returned into Galilee. Luke relates no more concerning them, till they were returned into Galilee; but it appears by Matthew's gospel, (ch. 2.) that from Jerusalem they returned to Bethlehem, must prepare to endure contradiction, reproach, and contempt, because they resemble their blessed Savior.—We should be careful how we indiscriminately condemn practices, or modes of life, because many have disgraced them: for who can refuse a tribute of commendation to the pious Anna? When the relative and social duties have been attended to, or as far as consists with a due performance of them, it is very proper to spend the decline of life especially, in retirement and devotion; and to serve God with fastings and prayers, day and night, as connected with deep humility, and a readiness to welcome Christ and his Salvation, and to speak of Him to all who wait for his redemption, must be allowed to be essentially different from the proud austerities and hypocritical devotions of self-righteous Pharisees, ancient and modern. But, whether zeal against the latter has not led many persons to overlook and even despise the former, instead of considering them, in similar circumstances, as models for imitation, is a question which ought seriously to be examined. They, however, who are most mortified to the world, and abstracted from it, or abundant in every good work from proper principles, will with one consent bear testimony to Christ, 'as the end of the law, for righteousness, to every one that believeth.' (Note, Rom. 10: 1—4.) SCOTT.

Luke passes over the coming of the wise men, and the flight of the holy family into Egypt; for it is evident, that this return to Nazareth did not occur till some time afterwards. Probably they returned to Bethlehem, supposing that Jesus was there to be educated. After some time the wise men arrived, and then, by the divine monition, they fled into Egypt, and on their return went to reside at Nazareth. (Notes, Matt. 3.)

Returned into Galilee.] Not immediately to Galilee, but probably first to Bethlehem, when they received the visit of the wise men, whence they then fled into Egypt, and afterward thence returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth. Doddridge, Dr. A. Clarke, and Horne.

Luke has omitted the account Matthew gives of the visit of the wise men, and of the holy family's retiring into Egypt; and so has taken no notice of their returning any more to Bethlehem. But there is no sufficient reason to conclude from hence that these occurrences were antecedent to the purification of Mary, and that the holy family immediately returned from Jerusalem to Nazareth; for we have many other instances of a like kind, where events are connected by Luke and the other evangelists, which did not immediately follow each other.

DODDIDGE.

Verse 40.

It was manifest, that as the faculties of his human soul unfolded, all holy affections and dispositions became proportionally vigorous; and all his words and actions were regulated in perfect conformity to the divine law, so that the special favor of God ev. Jently rested on Him. As to the manner, in which the indwelling Deity gradually communicated knowledge, wisdom, and holiness to the human nature of Christ we must confess that we know nothing. Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh. (1 Tim. 3: 16.) That, as man, his wisdom and knowledge could not be infinite or incapable of increase, we know: but how the union was formed.

DODDIDGE.

to them, which were very surprising and satisfactory. r. 47. And his wisdom and understanding appeared as much in his questions, as in his answers; so that all who heard Him were astonished: they never heard one so young, nor indeed any of their greatest doctors, talk sense at the rate He did; like David. He had more understanding than all his teachers, yea, than the ancients, Ps. 119: 99, 100. Now Christ showed forth some rays of his glory which were presently drawn in again. He gave them a taste (saith Calvin) of his divine wisdom and knowledge. Metinks, this public appearance of Christ in the temple, as a Teacher, was like Moses' early attempt to deliver Israel, which Stephen put this construction on, that he supposed his brethren would have understood, by that, honest God by his hand would deliver them, Acts 7:24, 25. They might have taken the hint, and been delivered then, but they understood not; so they here might have had Christ (for aught I know) to enter on his work now, but they were only astonished, and understood not the indication; and therefore, like Moses, He retires into obscurity again, and they hear no more of Him for many years after.

5. His mother talked with Him privately about it, when the company broke up, r. 48. Joseph and Mary were both amazed to find Him there, and to find that He had so much respect showed Him, as to be admitted to sit among the doctors. His father knew he had only the name of a father, and therefore said nothing. But, (1.) His mother told Him how ill they took it:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 41—52. Let us not pass over unimproved the only authentic record which we have, of our Redeemer's conduct in his youth. When we read that He 'waxed strong in Spirit, filled with wisdom, and that the grace of God was with Him,' (alas! most of us may say, 'How contrary to my youthful years, in which I grew in sin and folly, as I grew in stature, and as the powers of my mind unfolded') we might have expected to hear many extraordinary things concerning Him; yet nothing is related, of such matters as are commonly reported about promising children. We are, however, informed that the ordinances and temple of God were his delight; and that, in Jerusalem, nothing so much attracted his attention, as the instructions of the public teachers of the divine law. (Matt. 23: 1—4.) Thus young persons should employ their early days; and from the earliest youth, every one should deem the service of God his great business: the glory of his name, and the duty owing (49.) About my Father's business. In my 'Father's house?' In those things, or places, 'which are my Father's.' Scott. 'Father, at my Father's.' There is a known ambiguity in the original. I have chosen with Grotius, Capellus, Fuller, &c. to follow the Syriac version of the words, where it is rendered, in my Father's house, which it is certain they will well bear; and so Josephus puts an expression exactly similar to the original Greek, for, in Jupiter's temple; and, indeed, though a general apprehension of his being well employed might be a reason against their excessive anxiety, yet it could not (as the words in this connection seem to imply,) have directed them where to find Him.

POPPINGHAM

'Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? Why dost Thou put us into such a fright?' They were ready to say, as Jacob of Joseph, 'A wild beast has devoured him; or, He is fallen into the hands of some more cruel enemy, who at length found out that He was the young Child whose life Herod had sought some years ago.' A thousand imaginations, we may suppose, they had concerning Him, each more frightful than another. 'Now, why hast Thou given us occasion for these fears?' Thy father and I have sought Thee, sorrowing; not only troubled that we lost Thee, but vexed at ourselves that we did not take more care of Thee, to bring Thee along with us.' Note, Those may have leave to complain of their losses, that think they have lost Christ; but their weeping did not hinder sorrowing; they did not sorrow, and sit down in despair, but sorrowed, and sought. Note, If we would find Christ, we must seek Him sorrowing, sorrowing that we have provoked Him to withdraw, and that we have sought Him no sooner. They that thus seek Him, shall find Him, at length, with so much the greater joy. (2.) He gently reproved their inordinate solicitude about Him; (r. 49.) 'How is it that ye sought Me? Ye might have depended on it. I would have followed you home when I had done the business I have to do here; I could not be lost in Jerusalem. Wist ye not that I ought to be in my Father's house?' (so some read it;) 'where else should the Son be, who abideth in the house forever? I ought to be; [1.] Under my Father's care and protection; and therefore you should have cast the care of Me on Him, and not have burdened yourselves with it.' Christ is a shaft hid in his Father's quiver, Isa. 49: 2. He takes care of his church likewise, and therefore let not us ever despair of its safety. [2.] 'At my Father's work;' (so we take it;) 'I must be about my Father's business, and therefore could not go home so soon as you might. Wist ye not? Have you not already perceived that I have devoted myself to the service of religion, and therefore must employ myself in the affairs of it?' Herein He hath left us an example; for it becomes the children of God, in conformity to Christ, to attend their heavenly Father's business, and to make all other business give way to it. This word of Christ, we now think, we understand very well, for He hath explained it in what He hath done and said; it was his errand into the world and his meat and drink in the world to do his Father's will, and finish his work; a duty at that time his parents understood not this saying, v. 50. They did not understand what business He had to do then in the temple of his Father. They believed Him to be the Messiah, that should have the throne of his father David; but they thought that should rather bring Him to the royal palace than to the temple. They

to Him, must be allowed a pre-eminence, even above that of children to their parents; and must be attended to, even when it interferes with their inclination and satisfaction. In all things else the blessed Savior has left an example to young persons, of unreserved subjection, not only to their own parents, but even to those who are by any means intrusted with parental authority; and He has also taught them patient industry and contentment in a mean condition. These, when connected with piety and humility, are proper evidences of an increase of true wisdom, and of having obtained favor with God; they have a tendency to render the possessor dear to his fellow-creatures also; especially to those who most deserve estimation, and whose friendship is a privilege. Let us then endeavor to keep the sayings of Jesus in our hearts, and to transcribe his example in our life.

(52.) 'It seems a very just and important remark of Erasmus here, that all the endowments of the Man Christ Jesus were owing to the divine beneficence, and that the Deity communicated itself in a gradual manner to that human nature which it had assumed.'

DODDIDGE.

'Nor is it improbable that the extraordinary improvement made by Jesus in his childhood was promoted by that divine nature which his human nature was united to; but (though) promoted, in a manner which did not interfere with the plan, according to which his physical and intellectual abilities were, like those of other men, gradually to increase.'

selves to Him a faithful seed. Though his parents were poor and mean, though his father was only his supposed father, yet He was subject to them; though He was strong in spirit, and filled with wisdom, nay, though He was the Son of God, yet He was subject to his parents; how then will they answer it, who, though foolish and weak, yet are disobedient to their parents?

2. That his mother, though she did not perfectly understand her Son's sayings, yet kept them in her heart, expecting that hereafter they would be explained to her, and she should fully understand them, and know how to make use of them. However we may neglect men's sayings, because they are obscure, yet we must not neglect God's sayings. That which at first is dark, so that we know not what to make of it, may afterward become plain and easy; we should therefore lay it up for hereafter; see John 2:22. We may find use for that, another time, which now we see not how to make useful to us.

3. That He improved, and came on, to admiration; (v. 52.) this is meant of his human nature, his body increased in stature and bulk, He grew in the growing age; and his soul increased in wisdom, and in all the endowments of a human soul. Though the eternal Word was united to the human soul from his conception, yet the Divinity that dwelt in Him, manifested itself to his humanity by degrees, in proportion to his capacity; as the faculties of his human soul grew more and more capable, the gifts it received from the divine nature were more and more communicated. And He increased in favor with God and man, that is, in all those graces that rendered Him acceptable both to God and man. Herein Christ accommodated Himself to his estate of humiliation, that, as He condescended to be an Infant, a Child, a Youth, so the image of God shone brighter in Him, when He grew up to be a Youth, than it did, or could, while He was an Infant and a Child. Note, Young people, as they grow in stature, should grow in wisdom; and then, as they grow in wisdom, they will grow in favor with God and man.

CHAP. III. v. 1-14. Nothing is related concerning our Lord Jesus from his twelfth year to his entrance on his thirtieth; we often think it would have been a pleasure and advantage to us, if we had journals, or at least annals, of occurrences concerning Him; but we have as much as Infinite Wisdom thought fit to communicate to us, and if we improve not that, neither should we have improved more, if we had it. The great intention of the evangelists was, to give us an account of the Gospel of Christ, which we are to believe, and by which we hope for salvation: now that began in the ministry

NOTES.

CHAP. III. v. 1. In the interval, between the birth of Jesus, and the entrance of John the Baptist on his public ministry, various changes had taken place in the government of Judæa, and the adjacent countries. Augustus Cæsar, having admitted his nephew Tiberius to a share in the imperial authority, died about three years after: and Tiberius was at that time in the fifteenth year of his reign, from his appointment as the colleague of Augustus. Not long after the death of Herod the Great, his dominions were divided into four distinct governments, under the Roman emperor. Pontius Pilate had just been appointed procurator of Judæa. Herod Antipas, the son of king Herod, held, as tetrarch, the government of Galilee; his brother Philip, that of Ituræa and Trachonitis, to the west of Herod's district; and Lysanias (who seems not to have been of Jewish extraction) held the government of Abilene, to the north of Galilee on the borders of Syria. (See on Matt. 14:1.)

His fifteenth year.] That is, from the time when Augustus made him his colleague in the empire. If the birth of Christ be placed (as seems most probable) in September, A. U. 749, and Tiberius was admitted to part in the empire (three years before Augustus died) in August, 764, the fifteenth year of Tiberius on this computation, began in August, 779. And if John entered on his ministry the spring following, A. U. 779, in the same year of Tiberius, and, after he had preached about twelve months, baptized Jesus in the spring of 780, then Jesus at his baptism would be but thirty years of age and some odd months, which perfectly agrees with what Luke says, of his being at that time about thirty years of age!

understood not his prophetic office; and He was to do much of his work in that.

Lastly, Here is their return to Nazareth. This glimpse of his glory was to be short; it was now over, and He did not urge his parents either to come and settle at Jerusalem, or to settle Him there, but very willingly retired into Nazareth, where for many years He lived in obscurity. Doubtless, He came up to Jerusalem, to worship at the feasts, three times a year, but whether He ever went again into the temple, to dispute with the doctors there, we are not told: it is not improbable but He might. But here we are told,

1. That He was subject to his parents; though once, to show that He was more than a man, He withdrew Himself from his parents, to attend his heavenly Father's business, yet He did not, as yet, make that his constant practice, nor for many years after, but was subject to them, observed their orders, and went and came as they directed; and, as it should seem, worked with his father, at the trade of a carpenter. Herein He hath given an example to children to be dutiful and obedient to their parents in the Lord. Being made of a woman, He was under the law of the fifth commandment, to teach the seed of the faithful, thus to approve themselves to Him a faithful seed. Though his parents were poor and mean, and baptism of John, and therefore they hasten to give us an account of that. We could wish, perhaps, that Luke had wholly passed by what was related by Matthew and Mark, and had written only what was new, as he had done in his first two chapters. But it was the will of the Spirit, that some things should be established out of the mouth, not only of two, but of three witnesses; and we must not reckon it a needless repetition, nor shall we do so, if we renew our meditations upon these things, with satisfaction.

John's baptism introducing a new dispensation, it was requisite that we should have a particular account of it. Observe,

1. The date of the beginning of John's baptism, here taken notice of, (which was not by the other evangelists,) that the truth of the thing might be confirmed by the exact fixing of the time. And it is dated,

1. By the government of the heathen, which the Jews were under, to show that they were a conquered people, and therefore it was time for the Messiah to come to set up a spiritual kingdom, and an eternal one, upon the ruins of all the temporal dignity and dominion of David and Judah.

It is dated by the reign of the Roman emperor, the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, the third of the twelve Cæsars, a very bad man, given to covetousness, drunkenness, and cruelty. The people of the Jews, after a long struggle, were of late made a province of the empire, and were under the dominion of this Tiberius; and that country, which once had made so great a figure, and had many nations tributaries to it, in the reigns of David and Solomon, is now itself an inconsiderable, despicable part of the Roman empire, and rather trampled on than triumphed in. The lawgiver was now departed from between Judah's feet; and as an evidence of that, their public acts are dated by the reign of the Roman emperor, and therefore now Shiloh must come.

It is dated by the governments of the viceroys that ruled in the several parts of the Holy Land under the Roman emperor, which was another badge of their servitude, for they were all foreigners, which bespeaks a sad change with that people whose governors used to be of themselves, (Jer. 30:21.) and it was their glory. How is the gold become dim? [1.] Pilate is here said to be the governor, president, or procurator, of Judæa, as some say, a wicked man, and one that made no conscience of a lie. He reigned ill, and at last was displaced by Vitellius, president of Syria, and sent to Rome, to answer for his mal-administrations. [2.] The other three are called tetrarchs, from the countries which they had the command of, each of them being over a fourth part of that which had been entirely under the government of Herod the Great: (so some) or as others think, from the post of honor they were in, in the government; they having the fourth place; the emperor being first; the proconsul, who governed a province,

'The facts here powerfully confirm the evangelical history. Persons, places and times, are all marked with the utmost exactness. It was in the time of the Cæsars that the preaching of the Gospel took place, and the facts on which the whole of Christianity is founded made their appearance—an age the most enlightened and best known, from the multitude of its historic records. It was in Judæa, where every thing that professed to come from God, was scrutinized with the most exact and rigid criticism. Now let it be observed, that the persons of that time only, could confute these things, had they been false; yet they never attempted it. All are silent. None appears to offer even an objection. Therefore these facts are absolute and incontrovertible truths: this conclusion is necessary. Shall a man then give up his faith in such attested facts as these, because more than a thousand years after, an infidel creeps out, and ventres publicly to sneer at what his iniquitous soul hopes is not true?'

word of the Lord is not lost in the wilderness. The word of the Lord made its way to Ezekiel among the captives by the river of Chebar, and to John in the Isle Patmos. John was the son of a priest, now entering on the thirtieth year of his age; and therefore, according to the custom of the temple, he was now to be admitted into the temple service, where he should have attended as a candidate five years before; but God had called him to a more honorable ministry, and therefore the Holy Ghost enrolls him here, since he was not enrolled in the archives of the temple; John the son of Zacharias began his ministration such a time.

The ecclesiastical affairs of the Jews were at this time fallen into great disorder, and the high priesthood was disposed of at the will of the ruling powers, from secular motives, without regard to the regular succession; and frequently the high priest was deposed, and another substituted in his place; so that, in some instances, it appeared more like an annual office, than one held during life. It cannot be supposed, that there were, strictly speaking, two high priests at the same time; but in the New Testament the same word is used for the high priest, and the chief priests who were the heads of the twenty-four courses; both singular when the high priest is intended, and plural when used for the chief priests. The two persons, therefore, whom the Roman governor considered as the chief of the priests, and whose names stood as such in the public registers, may be intended. From the time of the Maccabees, the high priesthood had been held by persons, who also exercised a kind of regal authority. And when the nation was subdued under the Roman government, the ruler of the people, (Acts 23:5) and the president of the sanhedrim, was the high priest, or a chief priest. Now Annas had been high priest, in the ordinary sense of the word, but had been deposed by the Roman governor; yet it seems that he still continued ruler of the people and president of the sanhedrim; while, after several other changes, Caiaphas, his son-in-law, had been appointed by Pilate high priest, to officiate at the temple. So that an irregularity had arisen out of the confusion of the times; and the ruler or prince under the Romans, though a chief priest, was a distinct person from the high priest; Annas being the one, and Caiaphas the other. Thus John mentions the carrying of Christ to Annas first, as to an officer of principal authority among them, who sent him bound to Caiaphas, who "was the high priest that year," (John 18:13, 14, 21. Acts 4:6) and so continued all the time of Pilate's procuratorship. Hammond.—Some indeed suppose that Annas was high priest, and Caiaphas acted as his deputy; but no deputy of the high priest was allowed to officiate, except when the high priest was sick, or by some means incapacitated, and it does not appear that Annas was either; and the above statement seems satisfactorily to solve the difficulty, of two persons being considered as chief or high priests, one as the ruler of the people, and the other as performing the office of high priest at the temple. Thus the sceptre was departing from Judah, and consequently Shiloh was at hand, at the time when the word of the Lord came to John; as to the prophets of old; (Gen. 49:10) and when by immediate inspiration he was directed to go into the country about Jordan, and to preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sin. From these words we learn that John preached the necessity of repentance, in order to the remission of sin; and that the baptism of water was an outward sign of that inward cleansing and renewal of heart, which attend or spring from true repentance; so that if the baptized persons were really partakers of this inward humiliation and cleansing, they would certainly receive forgiveness of sins through the Savior, who was about to appear; for they would then be prepared to the second; and a king the third. So Lightfoot.

2. By the government of the Jews among themselves, to show that they were a corrupt people, and that therefore it was time that the Messiah should come, to reform them, v. 2. Annas and Caiaphas were the high priests. God had appointed that there should be but one high priest at a time, but here were two, to serve some ill turn or other, one served one year, and the other the other year; so some. One was the high priest, and the other the sagan, as the Jews called him, to officiate for him when he was disabled; or, as others say, one was high priest, and represented Aaron, and that was Caiaphas; Annas, the other, was Nasi, or head of the sanhedrim, and represented Moses. But to us there is but one High Priest, one Lord of all, to whom all judgment is committed.

II. The original and tendency of John's baptism.

1. It was from heaven, v. 2. He received full commission and full instructions from God to do what he did; it is the same expression that is used concerning the Old Testament prophets; (Jer. 1:2) for John was a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, and in him prophecy revived, which had been long suspended. We are not told how the word of the Lord came to John, whether by angel, dream, vision, or voice, but it was to his satisfaction, and ought to be to ours. John is here called the son of Zacharias, to refer us to what the angel said to his father, when he assured him that he should have this son. The word of the Lord came to him in the wilderness; for those whom God fits, He will find out, wherever they are. As the word of the Lord is not lost in the wilderness. The word of the Lord made its way to Ezekiel among the captives by the river of Chebar, and to John in the Isle Patmos. John was the son of a priest, now entering on the thirtieth year of his age; and therefore, according to the custom of the temple, he was now to be admitted into the temple service, where he should have attended as a candidate five years before; but God had called him to a more honorable ministry, and therefore the Holy Ghost enrolls him here, since he was not enrolled in the archives of the temple; John the son of Zacharias began his ministration such a time.

2. The scope and design of it were, to bring all the people of his country off from their sins, and home to their God, v. 3. He came first into all the country about Jordan, the neighborhood wherein he resided, that part of the country which Israel took possession of first, when they entered the land of promise under Joshua, there was the banner of the Gospel first displayed. John resided in the most solitary part of the country; but, when the word of the Lord came to him, he quitted his deserts, and came into the inhabited country. Those that are best pleased in their retirements, must cheerfully exchange them, when God calls them into places of con-course. He came out of the wilderness into all the country, with some marks of distinction, preaching a new baptism; not a sect, or party, but a profession, or distinguishing badge; the sign or ceremony, such as was ordinarily used among the Jews, washing with water, by which proselytes were sometimes admitted, or disciples to some great master; but the meaning of it was, repentance for the remission of sins; that is, all that submitted to his baptism,

(1.) Were thereby obliged to repent of their sins, to be sorry for what they had done amiss, and to do so no more; the former they professed and were concerned to be sincere in their professions; the latter they promised, and were concerned to make good what they promised. He found them, not to such ceremonious observances as were imposed by the tradition of the elders, but to change their mind, and change their way, to cast away from them all their transgressions, and to make them new hearts, and to live new lives. The design of the Gospel, which now began, was, to make men devout and pious, holy and heavenly, humble and meek, sober and chaste, just and honest, charitable and kind, and good in every relation, who had been much otherwise; and this is to repent.

(2.) They were thereby assured of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance; the baptism he administered, sealing them a gracious and pleasurable discharge from the guilt of sin. Turn yourselves from all your transgressions, so iniquity shall not be your ruin; agreeing with welcome and participate the privileges and blessings of his spiritual redemption and kingdom. (Marg. Ref. g-i.—Matt. 3:1, 2, 5, 6, 11, 12. Mark 1:4-11.) (2.) The word, &c. These are the very words used of the prophets of the Old Testament: (Jer. 1:2, 4, 11. Ez. 1:3, 6:1, 7:1, 12:1, 13:1, 14:2, 12) and it is so said of the rest. Shall we then think that this forerunner of the Messiah spoke the words of the Lord, as did the prophets of the Old Testament; and the prophets and apostles of the New Testament, on whom the Holy Ghost descended, to enable them to teach the mind of Christ, 'all future ages of the church, should not speak and write what they delivered as the rule of faith, by like divine assistance?' Whittby. Nothing can be determined concerning the time of our Lord's baptism, from the date of John's beginning to preach. I believe there are no data, from whence to conclude the age of John at that time. (Num. 4:3, 8:25, 26. 1 Chr. 23:24-28.) Probably he preached and baptized longer, before our Lord entered on his ministry, than some harmonists have allotted him. Nothing, however, can be more frivolous than an objection started by some against the narrative of the evangelists, because the thirtieth year of our Lord's age, (Note, 23.) being supposed coincident with the fifteenth of Tiberius' reign, according to their computation, would fix the birth of Christ, subsequent to the death of king Herod. But John might come forth in the fifteenth of Tiberius; and Jesus might not be baptized till the seventeenth or eighteenth, without the least inconsistency with any thing taught or recorded in Scripture.

(2.) Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests: 'There is no little indeterminateness in the use of the title of high priest in the Gospel; sometimes it is applied exclusively to the person who held the office at the time; sometimes to one or two more, who probably shared with him some of the powers or functions of the office; and sometimes to such of the priests as were eminent by their station and character, Mark 14:53. And the same indeterminateness is found in Josephus, who on one occasion mentions two high priests, Jonathan and Annas, a case precisely similar to this of Annas and Caiaphas.' Farrar.

Word.) That is, order. What this order was, we learn from the event; namely, that he should act the part of precursor to Christ, should excite the people to repentance and reformation, and by baptism lay them under a sacred obligation to perform their vows of amendment of life.

(Marg. Ref. k-o.—Is. 40:3-5. Matt. 3:4. Mark 1:1-3.) This quotation is nearly according to the Septuagint, though it does not exactly accord to it. Instead of the words, 'The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together;' (Is. 40:5) the clause from the Septuagint is here added, 'All flesh shall see the salvation of God.' (Is. 52:9, 10.) The glory of God especially shows in Christ, the salvation of God; and it shall at length be made known to all mankind. The word in the Hebrew is JEHOVAH, 'Prepare ye the way of JEHOVAH, &c.'

forth to be baptized of him, v. 7. This was the purport of his preaching to all that came to him. He neither flattered the great, nor complimented the many, but gave the same reproofs of sin and warnings of wrath to the multitude, that he did to the Sadducees and Pharisees; for if they had not the same faults, they had others as bad. Now observe here,

1. That the guilty, corrupted race of mankind is become a generation of vipers; not only poisoned, but poisonous; hateful to God, hating one another. This magnifies the patience of God, in continuing the race of mankind, and not the word of the Lord, by the Old-Testament prophets, Ezek. 18:30.

III. The fulfilling of the Scriptures in the ministry of John. The other evangelists had referred us to the same text that is here referred to, that of Esaias, ch. 40: 3. It is written in the book of the words of Esaias the prophet, those words of his which were written for the generations to come. Among them it is found, that there should be the voice of one crying in the wilderness; and John is that voice, v. 4. John's business is to bring the people into such a frame and temper, as that Christ might be welcome to them, and they welcome to Christ. Luke goes further on with the quotation than Matthew and Mark had done, and applies the following words likewise to John's ministry, (v. 5, 6.) Every valley shall be filled. Dr. Hammond understands this as a prediction of the desolation coming on the Jews for their infidelity: the land should be made plain by the pioneers for the Roman army, and should be laid waste by it, and there should then be a visible distinction made between the impenitent and the receivers of the Gospel. But it seems rather to be meant of the immediate tendency of John's ministry, and of the Gospel of Christ, which that was the introduction of. 1. The humble shall by it be enriched with grace, for Every valley shall be exalted. 2. The proud shall by it be humbled; the self-confident made to stand on their own bottom, and the self-conceited condemned; for, Every mountain and hill shall be brought low; if they repent, they are brought to the dust; if not, to the lowest hell. 3. Sinners shall be converted to God; The crooked ways and the crooked spirits shall be made straight; for though none can make that straight which God hath made crooked, (Eccl. 7:13.) yet God by his grace can make that straight which sin hath made crooked. 4. Difficulties that were hindering and discouraging shall be removed; The rough ways shall be made smooth; and they that love God's law, shall have great peace, and nothing shall offend them. The Gospel has made the way to heaven plain, and easy to be found, smooth, and easy to be walked in. 5. The great salvation shall be more fully discovered than ever, and the discovery of it shall spread further, (v. 6.) not Jews only, but Gentiles. All shall see it, and some of all sorts enjoy it. When way is made for the Gospel into the heart, by captivating high thoughts, and levelling, and removing all obstructions that stand in the way of Christ and his grace, then prepare to bid the salvation of God welcome.

IV. The general warnings and exhortations which he gave to those who submitted to his baptism, v. 7-9. In Matthew he is said to have preached these same things to many of the Pharisees and Sadducees, that came to his baptism: (Matt. 3: 7-10.) but here he is said to have spoken them to the multitude, that came forth to be baptized of him, v. 7. This was the purport of his preaching to all that came to him. He neither flattered the great, nor complimented the many, but gave the same reproofs of sin and warnings of wrath to the multitude, that he did to the Sadducees and Pharisees; for if they had not the same faults, they had others as bad. Now observe here,

(5.) Every valley shall be filled.) 'By the import of the language that the prophet uses, it is plainly to be seen that the main work is God's, though men are called to concur with Him in it; which is every where the scheme of Scripture, as it certainly is of sound reason. Compare Phil. 2: 12, 13.'

'It is observable that Luke, who wrote his gospel for the instruction of the Gentile converts, quotes here no less than three verses out of Esaias: whereas the other evangelists, Matthew and Mark, quote only the first of them. But it was necessary for Luke's purpose that he should thus extend the quotation, in order to assure the Gentiles, for whom he wrote, that they were destined to be partakers of the privileges of the Gospel, and to "see the salvation of God."

destroying that nest of vipers. He did it once by water, and will again by fire.

2. This generation of vipers is fairly warned to flee from the wrath to come, which is certainly before them, if they continue such; and their being a multitude will not be at all their security, for it will be neither reproach nor loss to God, to cut them off. We are not only warned of this wrath, but are put into a way to escape it, if we look about us in time.

3. There is no way of fleeing from the wrath to come, but by repentance. They that submitted to the baptism of repentance, thereby evidenced that they were warned to flee from the wrath to come, and took the warning; and we by our baptism profess to have fled out of Sodom, for fear of what is coming on it.

4. Those that profess repentance, are highly concerned to live like penitents; (v. 8.) 'Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance; else, notwithstanding your professions of repentance, you cannot escape the wrath to come.' By the fruits of repentance it will be known whether it be sincere or no. By the change of our way must be evidenced the change of our mind.

5. If we be not really holy, both in heart and life, our profession of religion and relation to God and his church will stand us in no stead at all; Begin not now to frame excuses from this great duty of repentance, by saying within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father. What will it avail us, to be the children of godly parents, if we be not godly? or to be within the pale of the church, if we be not brought into the bond of the covenant?

6. We have therefore no reason to depend on our external privileges and professions of religion, because God has no need of us or of our services, but can effectually secure his own honor and interest without us. If we were cut off and ruined, He could raise up to Himself a church out of the most unlikely; children to Abraham even out of stones.

7. The greater professions we make of repentance, and the greater assistances and encouragements are given us to repentance, the nearer and the sorer will our destruction be, if we do not bring forth fruits meet for repentance. Now that the Gospel begins to be preached, the kingdom of heaven to be at hand, and the axe laid to the root of the tree; threatenings to the wicked and impenitent are now more terrible than before, as encouragements to the penitent are now more comfortable. 'Now that you are upon your behavior, look to yourselves.'

8. Barren trees will be at length cast into the fire, as the fittest place for them; Every tree that doth not bring forth fruit, good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. If it serve not for fruit, to the honor of God's grace, let it serve for fuel, to the honor of his justice.

V. The particular instructions he gave to several sorts of persons, that inquired of him concerning their duty; the people, the publicans, and the soldiers. Some of the Pharisees and Sadducees came to his baptism; but we do not find them asking, What shall we do? For they thought that they knew what they had to do as well as he could tell them; or were determined to do what they pleased whatever he told them.

lial, merely with reference to their own licentious characters, as they knew not the Lord. See 1 Sam. 2: 12.' DODDRIDGE.

(8.) We have Abraham to our father.) 'Dr. Whitby well shows how great the presumption of the Jews on this relation to Abraham was. Munster, on this text, quotes a remarkable passage from the Talmud, in which it is said, "that Abraham sits next the gates of hell, and doth not permit any wicked Israelite to go down into it." These Jews might perhaps pervert the promise in Jer. 31: 35, 36, to support this vain and dangerous confidence, in opposition to such a multitude of most express and awful threatenings; particularly Deut. 32: 19. et seq.'

These stones.] 'These very stones that are before your eyes. The many learned commentators who refer this to God's calling the Gentiles, seem to lose all the beauty of the expression; and few, I think, if any, have set it in so strong a light as it will bear.'

(9.) Is hewn down.] 'Is very certainly and quickly to be cut down. In Scripture language, that which is very sure and very near is spoken of as if it was already done. Thus Christ speaks of Himself as if He was already in possession of his glory, while He was here on earth, (John 17: 14.) sinners too are represented as condemned already, (John 3: 18.) and saints are spoken of as already glorified Eph. 2: 6. and Heb. 12: 22, 23.'

10 And the people asked him, saying, 'What shall we do then?'

11 He answereth and saith unto them, 'He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath meat let him do likewise.'

12 Then came also publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, what shall we do?'

13 And he said unto them, 'Exact no more than that which is appointed you.'

14 And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, 'Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages.'

15 ¶ And as the people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts

But the people, the publicans, and the soldiers, who knew that they had done amiss, and that they ought to do better, and were conscious to themselves of great ignorance and unacquaintance with the divine law, were particularly inquisitive; What shall we do? Note, 1. Those that are baptized, must be taught, and those that have baptized them, are concerned, as they have opportunity, to teach them, Matt. 28: 19, 20. 2. Those that profess and promise repentance in general, must evidence it by particular instances of reformation, according to their place and condition are. 3. They that would do their duty, must desire to know it, and inquire concerning it. The first good word Paul said, when he was converted, was, Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do? These here inquire not What shall this man do? but, What shall we do? What fruits meet for repentance shall we bring forth? Now John gives answer to each, according to their place and station.

(1.) He tells the people their duty, and that is, to be charitable; (v. 11.) He that has two coats, and, consequently, one to spare, let him give, or lend at least, to him that has none, to keep him warm. He puts those who had superfluities, upon contributing to the relief of those that had not necessities. The Gospel requires mercy, and not sacrifice; and the design of it is, to engage us to do all the good we can. Food and raiment are the two supports of life; he that hath meat or clothes to spare, let him give to him that is destitute: what we have, we are but stewards of, and must use it accordingly, as our Master directs.

(2.) He tells the publicans their duty, the collectors of the emperor's revenue, v. 13. They must do justice between the government and the merchant, and not oppress the people in levying the taxes, nor any way make them heavier or more burdensome than the law had made them. They must not think that because it was their office to take care that the people did not defraud the prince, they might therefore hear hard on the people; as those that have ever so little a branch of power, are apt to abuse it; 'No, keep to your book of rates, and reckon it enough that you collect for Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and do not enrich yourselves by taking more.' The public revenues must be applied to the public service, and not to gratify the avarice of private persons. Observe, He does not direct the publicans to quit their places, and to go no more to the receipt of custom; the employment is in itself lawful and necessary, but let them be just and honest in it.

(3.) He tells the soldiers their duty, v. 14. Some think that these soldiers were Jews; others, that they were Romans; for it was not likely either that the Jews would serve the Romans, or that the Romans would trust the Jews in their garrisons in their own nation: and then it is an early instance of Gentiles embracing the Gospel, and submitting to it. Military men seem inclined to religion; yet these submitted even to the Baptist's strict profession, and desired to be directed by him. Those who, more than other men, have their lives in their hands, and are in deaths often, are concerned to inquire what they shall do, that they may be found in peace. In answer to this inquiry John does not bid them lay down their arms and desert the service; but cautions them against the sins that soldiers were commonly guilty of; for this is fruit meet for repentance, to keep ourselves from our iniquity. [1.] They must not be injurious to the people among whom they were quartered, and over whom indeed they were set; 'Do violence to no man.' Your business is to keep the peace, and prevent men's doing violence to one another; but do not you do violence to any; shake no man; (so the word signifies); 'do not put people into fear; for the sword of war, as well as that of justice, is to be a terror only to evil doers, but a protection to those that do well. Be not rude in your quarters; force not money from people by frightening them. Shed not the blood of war in peace; offer no incivility either to man or woman, nor have any hand in the barbarous devastations that armies sometimes make.' Nor must they accuse any falsely to the government, thereby to make themselves formidable, and get bribes. [2.] They must not be injurious to their fellow-soldiers, for some think the caution, not to accuse falsely, has special reference to them; 'Be not forward to condemn one of another to your superior officers, that you may be revenged or those whom you have a pique against, or undermine those above you, and get into their places.' Do not oppress any; so some think the word here signifies, as used by the LXX in several passages of the Old Testament. [3.] They must not be given to mutiny, or contend with their generals about their pay; 'Be content with your wages.' While you have what you agreed for, do not murmur that it is no more.' It is discontent with what they have, that makes men oppressive and injurious: they that never think they have enough themselves, will not scruple any the most irregular practices, to make it more, by defrauding others. It is a rule to all servants, that they be content with their wages; for they that indulge themselves in discontents, expose themselves to many temptations, and it is wisdom to make the best of that which is.

of John, whether he were the Christ or not.

16 John answered, saying unto them all, 'I indeed baptize you with water; but one mightier than I cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:

17 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and will gather the wheat into his garner; but the chaff he will burn with fire unquenchable.

18 And many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people.

[Practical Observations.]

19 But Herod the tetrarch, being reproved by him, for Herodias his brother

Messiah as just at hand. Thus the way of the Lord was prepared; for when men's expectations are raised, that which they are in expectation of, becomes doubly acceptable. Now when they observed what an excellent doctrine John Baptist preached, what a divine power went along with it, and what a tendency it had to reform the world,

1. They began presently to consider that now was the time for the Messiah to appear; the sceptre was departed from Judah, for they had no king but Cæsar; the lawgiver too was gone from between his feet, for Herod had lately slain the sanhedrim; Daniel's seventy weeks were now expiring; and in three or four years, they looked that the kingdom of heaven should appear immediately, Luke 19: 11. Never did the corrupt state of the Jews more need a reformation, nor their distressed state more need a deliverance than now.

2. Their next thought was, 'Is not this He that should come?' All thinking men mused, or reasoned, in their hearts, concerning John, whether he were the Christ or not. He had indeed nothing of the external pomp and grandeur in which they generally expected the Messiah to appear; but his life was holy and strict, his preaching powerful and with authority, and therefore why may we not think him to be the Messiah, and that he will shortly throw off this disguise, and appear in more glory? Note, That which puts people upon considering, reasoning with themselves, prepares the way for Christ.

II. How John disowned all pretensions to the honor of being himself the Messiah, but confirmed them in their expectations of Him that really was the Messiah, v. 16, 17. John's office, as a crier or herald, was to give notice that the kingdom of God and the King of that kingdom were at hand; and that therefore they must expect the Messiah now shortly to appear. And this serves as an answer to their misgivings and debates concerning himself. Though he knew not their thoughts, yet, in declaring this, he answered them.

1. He declares that all he could do, was, to baptize them with water; he had no access to the Spirit, nor could command that; he could only exhort them to repent, and assure them of forgiveness, on repentance; he could not work repentance in them, or confer remission or them.

2. He consigns them, turns them over, as it were, to Jesus Christ, for whom he was sent to prepare the way, and to whom he was ready to transfer all the interest he had in the affections of the people, and would have them no longer to debate whether John was the Messiah or no, but to look for Him that was really so.

John owns the Messiah to have a greater excellency than he had, and that He was in all things preferable to him; He is One, the latchet of whose shoe he does not think himself worthy to unloose; he does not think himself worthy to be the meanest of his servants. John was a prophet, yea, more so than any of the Old-Testament prophets; but Christ more than John, for it was both by the Spirit of Christ, and of the grace of Christ, that all the prophets prophesied, and John among the rest, 1 Pet. 1: 10, 11. This was a great truth which John came to preach. Thus highly does it become us to speak of Christ, and thus humbly of ourselves.

He owns Him to have a greater energy than he had. They thought a wonderful power went along with John; but what was that, compared with the power which Jesus would come clothed with? John can only baptize with water, in token that they ought to purify and cleanse themselves; but Christ can give the Spirit, to cleanse and purify the heart, even as fire purges out the dross and melts down the metal, that it may be cast into a new mould. John can separate between the precious and the vile only by word and sign; but Christ hath his fan in his hand, and will perfectly part between the wheat and the chaff, will cast out of his church the unbelieving, impenitent Jews, and confirm therein all that faithfully follow Him. John can only speak comfort, and, like other prophets, say to the righteous that it shall be well with them; but Jesus Christ will give them comfort. John can only promise them that they shall be safe; but Christ will make them so. He will gather the wheat into his garner; good, serious, solid people He will gather now into his church on earth, and shortly into his church in heaven, where they shall be forever sheltered. John can only threaten hypocrites, and tell the barren trees that they shall

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. The servants of God often grow up in obscurity: but when the Lord has prepared them for usefulness, He will bring them forth and employ them.—The true doctrine of the Holy Scriptures is equally calculated to encourage the humble, and to abase the proud. But many attend the preaching of the Gospel, and come to sacred ordinances, who are no better than 'a generation of vipers;' they should therefore be dealt with very plainly, nay, sometimes roughly; that they may be made sensible that it is vain to rely on forms, notions, or external privileges.—Men should not only ask, What 'must we do to be saved?' but also inquire particularly concerning the proper evidences and effects of faith and repentance; and ministers should enter into the detail, and be exact and particular in answering these inquiries. In general, these must be evinced by love to our neighbors and brethren; and surely our clearer discoveries of the unspeakable mercy of the Lord Jesus to our sinful souls, ought not to render us more niggardly in relieving the distresses of our fellow-sinners: yet the rule laid down by this 'man of God' would be deemed extremely rigorous, if we now should attempt to insist on its being strictly observed. Thus much, however, we must say: 'He who soweth liberally, shall reap also liberally;' and that 'God loveth a cheerful giver.' (2 Cor. 8: 1—15.)—It is not generally advisable for men to quit their stations, provided they are not directly criminal; for though attended with peculiar temptations, yet they may afford peculiar advantages for showing the excellency of the Gospel, and the power of divine grace; and there are many employments, that could have no existence, were men not wicked, which are nevertheless needful in the present state of the world, and a person may conscientiously serve God in them. Men should first be cautioned against the peculiar temptations of their respective employments, and warned to avoid the sins, and to give up the iniquitous gains, which generally attend them; (Ez. 22: 25—27.) and when they are prevailed on to make these sacrifices for conscience' sake, their hearts are prepared to welcome the salvation of Christ, and to receive instructions in every thing belonging to Christianity; and eminent holiness so far from rendering a man proud, will proportionably abase him in his own esteem, and render him regardless of his own glory, and make Christ more precious to his heart, and glorious in his eyes.

(Marg.) Some expositors seem to interpret 'the baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire,' almost exclusively of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the apostles, and of the miraculous powers thus communicated; but it seems rather to refer to his penetrating, purifying, and transforming influences in the hearts of true Christians, of which those miraculous operations were an earnest and emblem. (Marg. Ref.—Matt. 3: 11, 12. John 1: 19—23. 10: 40—42. Acts 1: 4—8.)

HORNE.

(17.) The chaff He will burn, &c.] 'It may in part refer to the calamities to come on the Jewish nation for rejecting Christ, (as Bishop Chandler has observed) yet it seems chiefly to intend the final destruction of all sinners in hell, which alone is properly opposed to the gathering the wheat into the garner. The phrase, unquenchable fire, is absolutely inconsistent with all the views of the restoration of the wicked; and however the phrase of being consumed like chaff might seem to favor the doctrine of their annihilation, the epithet of unquenchable given to this fire, is so far from proving it, that it cannot, by any easy and just interpretation, be reconciled with it.'

Verses 18.

Preached, &c.] 'Preached the Gospel.' John's testimony to Jesus, as 'the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world,' as 'the Son of God,' as 'the Bridegroom' of the church, and as 'baptizing with the Holy Ghost,' fully answers the import of this appropriate term. (John 1: 29—34, 37: 27—38.) John was a preacher of the Gospel; though many consider his ministry in another light. (Marg. Ref.) SCOTT.

Preached he, &c.] 'As it was a very imperfect intimation, rather than a full discovery of the Gospel that was given by the Baptist, it does not seem so proper here to render the original word by preaching the Gospel, though the word has often that signification; see Matt. 11: 6 Luke 4: 18. and Acts 8: 4, &c.'

be hewn down, and cast into the fire; but Christ can execute that threatening; those that are as chaff, light, and vain, and worthless, He will burn with fire unquenchable. John refers here to Mal. 3: 18, 4: 1, 2. Then, when the floor is purged, ye shall return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, for the day comes, that shall burn as an oven.

The evangelist concludes his account of John's preaching, with an et cetera, (v. 18.) which are not recorded. 1st. John was an affectionate preacher; he was hortatory and beseeching; he pressed things home upon his hearers, followed his doctrine close, as one in earnest. 2dly. He was a practical preacher; quickening to duty, directing in it, and not amusing with matters of nice speculation. 3dly. He was a popular preacher; though he had scribes and Pharisees, men of polite learning, attending his ministry, and Sadducees, men of free thought, as they pretended, yet he addressed himself to the people, and accommodated himself to their capacity, as promising himself best success among them. 4thly. He was an evangelical preacher, for so the word here used signifies; he preached the Gospel; in all his exhortations, he directed people to Christ, and excited and encouraged their expectations of Him. When we press duty on people, we must direct them to Christ, both for righteousness and strength. 5thly. He was a copious preacher; many other things he preached—many things, and different. He preached a great deal, shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God; and he varied in his preaching, that those who were not reached, and touched, and wrought upon, by one truth, might be by another.

III. How full a stop put to John's preaching, by the malice of Herod, v. 19, 20. Because he could not bear his reproofs, others should be deprived of the benefit of his instructions and counsels. Some little good he might do to those who had access to him, when he was in prison; but nothing to what he might have done, if he had had liberty to go about all the country, as he had done. We cannot think of Herod's doing this, without the greatest compassion and lamentation; nor of God's permitting it, without admiring the depth of the divine counsels, which we cannot account for; must he be silenced, who is the voice of one crying in the wilderness? Must such a preacher be shut up in prison, who ought to have been set up in the courts of the temple? But thus the faith of his disciples must be tried; thus the unbelief of those who rejected him must be punished;

Verses 22.

Jesus 'began to be about thirty years of age,' at his baptism; or perhaps He began his public ministry, by being baptized of John, when He was about thirty years old. Some understand the clause to mean, that He was ruled, or was in subjection to Joseph and Mary, for about thirty years. He was however about thirty years of age when He entered on his ministry. (Note, 2, 3.) This single decision of an inspired writer outweighs all the specious conjectures of learned men, concerning the duration of our Lord's ministry; and if He was crucified in the year A. D. 33, it must have lasted longer than they generally allow; for He would be thirty years old A. D. 27. (Note, Matt. 4: beginning.) But the word about, and the decimal number, concur in warranting an opinion, that He might be rather above thirty at this time.

ANOM. 'The very use of this adverb mainly teaches that nothing thus he must be Christ's forerunner in suffering as well as preaching; and thus, having seen for about a year and a half preparing people for Christ, he must now give way to Him, and, the Sun being risen, the morning-star must of course disappear.

V. 21, 22. The evangelist mentioned John's imprisonment before Christ's being baptized, though it was near a year after it, because he would finish the story of John's ministry, and then introduce that of Christ. Now here we have,

I. A short account of Christ's baptism, which had been more fully related by Matthew. Jesus came to be baptized of John, and He was so, v. 21, 22.

1. It is here said, that when all the people were baptized, then Jesus was baptized; all that were then present. Christ would be baptized last, among the common people; thus He humbled Himself, and made Himself of no reputation, as one of the least, nay, as less than the least. He saw what multitudes were hereby prepared to receive Him, and then He appeared.

2. Notice is here taken of Christ's praying when He was baptized, which was not in Matthew. He did not confess sin, as others did, for He had none to confess; but He prayed, as others did, for He would thus keep up communion with his Father. Note, The inward and spiritual grace which sacraments are the outward and visible signs of, must be fetched in by prayer; and therefore prayer must always accompany them. We have reason to think that Christ now prayed for this manifestation of God's favor to Him, which immediately followed; He prayed for the discovery of his Father's favor to Him, and the descent of the Spirit. What was promised to Christ, He must obtain by prayer; Ask of Me, and I will give Thee. Thus He would put an honor on prayer, would tie us to it, and encourage us in it.

3. When He prayed, the heaven was opened. He that by his power parted the waters, to make a way through them to Canaan, now by his power parted the air, to open a correspondence with the heavenly Canaan. Thus was there opened to Christ, and by Him to us, a new and living way into the holiest: sin had shut up heaven, but Christ's prayer opened it again. Prayer is an ordinance that opens heaven; Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

4. The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon Him; our Lord Jesus was now to receive greater measures of the Spirit than certain can be defined respecting the age of Christ at his baptism, and commencement of his ministry. Hence it is no wonder that the conjectures of commentators should be so various.

Which was the son of Heli.] 'The son of Joseph, who, by adoption, or rather by the marriage of his daughter, was the son of Heli.'

DODDIDGE.

'In the latter times, names were selected from those of the progenitors of a family; hence in the New Testament hardly any other than ancient names occur.'

JAHN.

As was supposed, the son of Joseph.] 'Matthew, in descending from Abraham to Joseph, the spouse of Mary, speaks of sons properly such, by way of natural generation; but Luke, in ascending from the Savior to God Himself, speaks of sons either properly or improperly such; on this account he uses an indeterminate mode of expression which may be applied to sons either putatively, or really such.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

'As the Hebrews never permitted women to enter into their genealogical tables, whenever a family happened to end with a daughter, instead of naming her in the genealogy, they inserted her husband as the son of him who was in reality but his father-in-law.'

Bp. Pearce, in CLARKE.

(Marg. Ref.) There seems no reason to doubt, that the following is the genealogy of Jesus in the line of Mary: (Matt. 1: 2-17.) but as the names of men alone, or chiefly, stood in public registers, so the name of Joseph, not that of Mary, must have been inserted. It had been said that Jesus was 'supposed to be the Son of Joseph; which may refer to the legal constitution, as well as to the common opinion of the Jews, as He was born of Mary after she was married to Joseph. Joseph's father was called Jacob: (Matt. 1: 16.) but marrying the daughter of Heli, and being perhaps adopted by him, he was called his son, and as such his name seems to have been inserted in the public registers; and so the pedigree is carried backward in the line of Nathan to David, and from him to Adam 'who was the son of God,' as created before, to qualify Him for his prophetic office, Isa. 61: 1. When He begins to preach, the Spirit of the Lord is upon Him; which is here expressed by a sensible evidence for his encouragement, and for the satisfaction of John, who was told before, that by this sign it should be notified to him, which was the Christ. Dr. Lightfoot suggests, that the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape, that He might be revealed to be a personal Substance, and not merely an Operation of the Godhead; and thus (saith he) was made a full, clear, and sensible demonstration of the Trinity, at the beginning of the Gospel; and very fitly is this done at Christ's baptism, who was to make the ordinance of baptism a badge of the profession of that faith, in the doctrine of the Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

5. There came a voice, from heaven, from God the Father, from the excellent glory; (so it is expressed, 2 Pet. 1: 17.) Thou art my beloved Son. Here, and in Mark, it is expressed as spoken to Christ; in Matthew, as spoken of Him; This is my beloved Son; it comes all to one, it was intended to be a notification to John, and as such was properly expressed by, This is my beloved Son; and likewise an answer to his prayer, and so it is most fitly expressed by, Thou art. It was foretold concerning the Messiah, I will be his Father, and He shall be my Son, 2 Sam. 7: 14. I will make Him my First-born, Ps. 89: 27. It was also foretold that He should be God's Elect in whom his soul delighted; (Isa. 42: 1.) and, accordingly, it is here declared, Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

II. A long account of Christ's pedigree, which had been more briefly related by Matthew, v. 23—38. Here is,

1. His age, v. 23. So old Joseph was, when he stood before Pharaoh, (Gen. 41: 46.) David, when he began to reign; (2 Sam. 5: 4.) and at this age the priests were to enter on the full execution of their office, Num. 4: 3. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it plain, by the manner of expression here, that He was just twenty-nine years old complete, and entering on his thirtieth year, in the month Tisri; that, after this, He lived three years and a half, and died when He was thirty-two years old and a half. Three years and a half, the time of Christ's ministry; is a period of time very remarkable in Scripture; three years and six months the heavens were shut up in Elijah's time, Luke 4: 25. Jam. 5: 17. This was the half week in which the Messiah was to confirm the covenant, Dan. 9: 27. This period is expressed in the prophetic writings, by a time, times, and half a time, (Dan. 12: 7. Rev. 12: 14.) and by forty-two months, and a thousand two hundred and three score days, Rev. 11: 2, 3. It is in the time fixed for the witnesses' prophesying in sackcloth, in conformity to Christ's preaching in his humiliation just so long.

2. His pedigree, v. 23, &c. Matthew had given us somewhat of this, (he goes no higher than Abraham,) but Luke brings it as high as Adam. Matthew designed to show that Christ was the son of Abraham, in whom all the families of the earth are blessed, and that He was Heir to the throne of David; and therefore he begins with Abraham, and brings the genealogy down to Jacob, who was the father of Joseph, an heir-male of the house of David; but Luke, designing to show that Christ was the Seed of the woman, that should break the serpent's head, traces his pedigree upward as high as Adam, and begins it with Eli, or Heli, who was the father, not of Joseph, but of Mary. And some suggest, that the supply which our translators all along insert here, is not right, and that it should not be read which, that is, which Joseph was the son of Heli, but which Jesus; he was son of Joseph, of Eli, of Matthat, &c. and He, that is, Jesus, was the son of Seth, of Adam, of God, v. 38. The difference between the two evangelists, in the genealogy of Christ, has been a stumbling-block to infidels that cavil at the Word; but such a one as has been removed by the labors of learned men, both in the early ages of the church, and in latter times. Matthew draws the pedigree from Solomon, whose natural line ending in Jeconias, the legal right was transferred to Salathiel, who was of the house of Nathan, another son of David, which line Luke here pursues, and so leaves out all the kings of Judah. It is well for us, that our salvation doth not depend on our being able to

by Him in his own image, though he soon lost it by sin. Some of the same names indeed occur, which are in Joseph's genealogy; but as different persons often bear the same name, it seems needless to perplex ourselves about so common a case. Indeed Joseph could not, in the male line, be descended both from Solomon and Nathan. Yet the arguments urged to prove that this is Joseph's genealogy, not Mary's, are formed on the supposition that the female line was excluded. Cainan (35) is not found in the Hebrew text in any of the genealogies, but only in the Septuagint. It is probable the evangelists transcribed the registers as sufficiently exact for their purpose, and as more generally suited to command attention, than if they had even rendered them more accurate. The interpretation of this genealogy as that of Mary, and in the line of Nathan, is objected to, on the supposition that the Messiah was to descend from Solomon; which in this case He did not. But it is no where said, that He was to descend from Solomon; but merely, that He was to be the Son of David, and spring from the root of Jesse. Solomon was an eminent type of Christ, and is spoken of as such; but it is not said to David, 'In Solomon shall thy seed be called'; as to Abraham, 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called.' 'When we survey any such series of generations, it is obvious to reflect how, like the leaves of a tree, one passeth away and another cometh; yet the earth still abideth, and with it the goodness of the Lord, which runs on, from generation to generation, the common home of parents and children. Of those who formerly lived upon the earth, and perhaps made the most conspicuous figure among the children of men, how many have there been whose names have perished with them; and how many of whom nothing but their names are remaining. Thus we are passing away, and thus shall we be shortly forgotten. Happy, if, while we are forgotten of men, we are remembered by God, and our names are found written in the book of life.' time, translated the Old Testament into Greek, for reasons best known to themselves, inserted that Cainan; and Luke, writing among the Hellenist Jews, was obliged to make use of that translation, and therefore to take it as he found it.

The genealogy concludes with this, who was the son of Adam, the son of God. (1.) Some refer it to Adam; he was in a peculiar manner the son of God, being, more immediately than any of his offspring, the offspring of God by creation. (2.) Others refer it to Christ, and so make the last words of this genealogy to speak his divine and human nature. He was both the Son of Adam and the Son of God, that He might be a proper Mediator between God and the sons of Adam, and might bring the sons of Adam to be, through Him, the sons of God.

CHAP. IV. v. 1-13. The last words of the foregoing chapter, that Jesus was the Son of Adam, bespeak Him to be the Seed of the woman; being so, we have Him here, according to the promise, breaking the serpent's head, baffling and foiling the devil in all his temptations, who, by one temptation, had baffled and foiled our first parents. (2.) He did eat, &c. Jesus not only abstained from some kinds of food, or for a certain portion of each day, as fasting is often understood; but He ate nothing all those days. (4.) Man shall not live by bread, &c. (Note, Luke 4: 4.) and then "led them with manna." (A light aerial sort of food,) giving them as great strength from that, as from the bread and flesh thou didst eat in Egypt; and this He did, providing it miraculously every day, "that He might teach thee" (by this example) "that man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word of God," every thing that He shall please to command to give him nourishment. So that, though I am now hungry, as they were; I have no need to work a miracle myself to satisfy my hunger; seeing I know by this example, that God, though He suffer his children to want bread, yet will command some other thing to keep them alive, and will Himself rather work a miracle, than they shall want nourishment." Whitby. (Deut. 8: 2, 3.) (5.) In a moment, &c. This circumstance is noted by Luke alone; and it confirms the opinion, that the whole was an illusion of the senses, effected by "the prince of the power of the air." (Eph. 2: 1, 2.) (6.) That is delivered, &c. A most direct falsehood spoken by "the father of lies," who, in this and similar ways, has always deceived the children of men. (Gen. 3: 1-5.) solve all these difficulties, nor is the divine authority of the gospels at all weakened by them: for the evangelists are not supposed to write these genealogies, either of their own knowledge, or by divine inspiration, but to have copied them out of the authentic records of the genealogies among the Jews, in which they found the pedigree of Jacob, the father of Joseph, to be as it is set down in Matthew; and the pedigree of Heli, the father of Mary, to be as it is set down here in Luke; and this is the meaning of v. 23. not, as it was supposed, referring only to Joseph, but, as it is entered into the books—as we find it on record; by which it appeared, that Jesus was both by father and mother's side, the Son of David; witness this extract out of their own records, which any one might at that time have liberty to compare with the original, and further the evangelists needed not to go; nay, had they varied from that, they had not gained their point. Its not being contradicted at that time, is satisfaction enough to us now, that it is a true copy, as it is further worthy of our observing, that, when those records of the Jewish genealogies had continued thirty or forty years after these extracts out of them, long enough to justify the evangelists therein, they were all lost and destroyed with the Jewish state and nation; for now there was no more occasion for them.

One difficulty occurs between Abraham and Noah, which gives us some perplexity, v. 35, 36. Sala is said to be the son of Cainan, and he the son of Arphaxad, whereas Sala was the son of Arphaxad, (Gen. 10: 24. 11: 12.) and there is no such man as Cainan found there. But as to that, it is sufficient to say, that the Seventy interpreters, who, before our Savior's entry into Greece, for reasons best known to themselves, inserted that Cainan; and Luke, writing among the Hellenist Jews, was obliged to make use of that translation, and therefore to take it as he found it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

and earnest of eternal felicity. (ch. 11: 5-13. Matt. 7: 7-11, v. 11.) If our souls be renewed, by his sacred influences, to a conformity with Christ, we shall thus be evinced to be the children of our Father, with whom for his sake He will be well pleased, though in ourselves we are most unworthy; and thus also we shall be qualified for every service to which we are called. These are privileges worthy of our estimation.—'All flesh,' as descended from the first Adam, is indeed 'as grass,' and 'withers as the flower of the field;' but He who partakes of 'the Spirit of life' from the second Adam, has that eternal happiness 'which by the Gospel is preached to us.' (1 Cor. 15: 45-49.)

Hardly any kind of temptation will be found, which may not be referred either to distrust of God, the desire of perishing things, or vain ostentation.' Beza. 'If this enemy of mankind omitted no season of tempting Christ, we have reason to believe he will omit no opportunity of tempting us.' Whitby. (3.) The Son of God. See on Matt. 14: 33. 27: 54. (1.) Was led by the Spirit into the wilderness. Christ probably intended this as a devout retirement, to which He found Himself strongly inclined, that He might give vent to those sacred passions, which the late occurrences of the descent of the Spirit upon Him, and the miraculous attestation of a voice from heaven, had such a tendency to inspire. It seems to be a groundless conjecture of Mr. Fleming, that He was carried through the air to mount Sinai. Mr. Maundrell's is much more probable, that it might be the wilderness near Jordan; which, as Le, who travelled through it, assures us, is a miserable and horrid place, consisting of high and barren mountains, so that it looks as if nature had suffered some violent convulsions there. This is the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan. Luke 10: 30. Our Lord probably was assaulted in the northern part of it, near the sea of Galilee, because He is said here to be returning or going back to Nazareth, from whence He came to be baptized, Mark 1: 9.

DOUBLEDAY.

3 And the devil said unto him, 'If thou be the Son of God, command this stone that it be made bread.

4 And Jesus answered him, saying, 'It is written, 'That man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God.

5 And the devil, taking him up into a high mountain, shewed unto him all the kingdoms of the world 'in a moment of time.

6 And the devil said unto him, 'All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them: for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will I give it.

7 If thou therefore wilt worship me, all shall be thine.

8 And Jesus answered and said unto him, 'Get thee behind me, Satan; 'for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.

9 And he brought him to Jerusalem, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, 'If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down from hence:

more than a conqueror in every assault. During the forty days, He was tempted, not by any inward suggestions, for the prince of this world had nothing in Christ by which to inject any such, but by outward solicitations, perhaps in the likeness of a serpent, as he emptied our first parents. But at the end of the forty days, he came nearer Him, and did, as we were, close with Him, when he perceived that He was a hungred, v. 2.

1. He tempted Him to distrust his Father's care, and to shift for Himself in such a way, as his Father had not appointed for Him; (v. 3.) If Thou be the Son of God, as the voice from heaven declared, command this stone to be made bread. (1.) 'I counsel Thee to do it; for God, if He be thy Father, has forgotten Thee, and it will be long enough He sends either ravens or angels to feed Thee.' If we begin to think of being our own carvers, and of living by our own forecast, without depending on Divine Providence, we must look on it as a temptation of Satan's, and reject it accordingly: 'it is Satan's counsel to think of an independence on God. (2.) 'I challenge Thee to do it, if Thou canst; if Thou dost not do it, I will say Thou art not the Son of God; for John Baptist said lately, God is able of stones to raise up children to Abraham, which is the greater; Thou therefore hast not the power of the Son of God, if Thou dost not of stones make bread for Thyself, when Thou needest it, which is the less.' Thus was God Himself tempted in the wilderness: Can He furnish a table? Can He give bread? Ps. 73: 19, 20.

Now, [1.] Christ yielded not to the temptation: First, Because He would not do what Satan bid Him do, for that would have looked as if there had been indeed a compact between Him and the prince of the devils. Note, We must not do any thing that looks like giving place to the devil. Miracles were wrought for the confirming of faith, and the devil had no faith to be confirmed, and therefore He would not do it for him. He did his signs in the presence of his disciples, (John 20: 30,) and particularly the beginning of his miracles, that his disciples might believe on Him; (John 2: 11.) but here in the wilderness He had no disciples with Him. Secondly, He wrought miracles for the ratification of his doctrine, and therefore till He began to preach, He would not begin to work miracles. Thirdly, He would not work miracles for Himself and his own supply, lest He should seem impatient of hunger, whereas He came not to please Himself, but to suffer grief, and that grief among others. Fourthly, He would reserve the proof of his being the Son of God for hereafter, and would rather be upbraided by Satan with being not able to do it, than be persuaded by Satan to do that which it was not fit for Him to do; thus He was upbraided by his enemies as if He could not save Himself, and come down from the cross, when He could have come down, but would not, because it was not fit that He should. Fifthly, He would not do any thing that looked like distrust of his Father, or acting separately from Him, or any thing disagreeable to his present state. Being in all things made like unto his brethren, He would, like the other children of God, live in a dependence on the Divine Providence and promise, and trust God either to send Him a supply into the wilderness, or to lead Him to a city of habitation where there was a supply, as He used to do, (Ps. 107: 5-7.) and in the mean time support Him, though hungry, as He had done, these forty days past.

own to preach, and a religion to found, yet it agreed with Moses and the prophets, whose writings He therefore lays down as a rule to Himself, and recommends to us, as a reply to Satan and his temptations. The Word of God is our sword, and faith in that Word is our shield; we should therefore be mighty in the Scriptures, and go forth, and go on, in our spiritual warfare in that might; know what it is written, for it is for our learning, for our use. The text of Scripture He made use of, is quoted from Deut. 8: 3. 'Man shall not live by bread alone. I need not turn the stone into bread, for God can send manna for our nourishment, as He did for Israel; man can live by every word of God, by whatever God will appoint, that he shall live by.' How had Christ lived, lived comfortably, these last forty days? Not by bread, but by the Word of God, by meditation on that Word, and communion with it, and with God in and by it: and in like manner He could live yet, though now He began to be a hungred. God has many ways of providing for his people, without the ordinary means of subsistence; and therefore He is not at any time to be distrusted, but at all times to be depended on, in the way of duty. If meat be wanting, God can take away the appetite, or give such degrees of patience as will enable a man even to laugh at destruction and famine, (Job 6: 22.) or make pulse and reater more nourishing than all the portion of the king's meat, (Dan. 1: 12, 13.) and enable his people to rejoice in the Lord, when the fig-tree doth not blossom, Hab. 1: 12, 13. She was an active believer, who said that she had made many a meal's meat of the promises, when she wanted bread.

2. He tempted Him to accept from him the kingdom, which, as the Son of God, He expected to receive from his Father, and to do Him homage for, v. 5-8. This evangelist put this temptation second, which Matthew had put last, and which, it should seem, was really the last: but Luke was full of it, as the blackest and most violent, and therefore hastened to it. In the devil's tempting of our first parents, he represented to them the forbidden fruit, first, as good for food, and then, as pleasant to the eyes; and they were overpowered by both these charms. Satan here first tempted Christ to turn the stones into bread, which would be good for food, and then showed Him the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, which was pleasant to the eyes; but in both these, He overpowered Satan, and perhaps, with an eye to that, Luke changes the order. Now observe,

[1.] He gave him a prospect of all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time, an airy representation of them, such as he thought most likely to strike the fancy, and seem a real prospect; to succeed the better, he took Him up for this purpose into a high mountain; and because we next, after the temptation, find Christ on the other side Jordan, some think it probable that it was to the top of Pisgah, whence Moses had a sight of Canaan; that it was but a phantasm that the devil here presented our Savior, with, as the prince of the power of the air, is confirmed by that circumstance which Luke here takes notice of, that it was done in a moment of time; whereas, if a man take a prospect of but one country, he must do it successively, must turn himself round, and take a view first of one part, and then of another. Thus the devil thought to impose on our Savior with a fallacy,

(3.) If Thou be the Son of God, 'If Thou art the Son of God, in such an extraordinary manner as Thou hast been declared to be, and art indeed the promised Messiah, who is expected under that character.' That the Jews supposed the Messiah would be in a very extraordinary manner, the Son of God, appears from comparing Matt. 14: 33. 16: 16. 26: 63. John 1: 34, 49. 11: 27. 20: 31. and Acts 8: 37.

(9.) 'One of the battlements of the temple. Pinnacle leads the English reader to imagine that He stood on the point of a spire. The truth is, the roof of the temple was flat, and had a kind of balustrade round it; (Deut. 22: 8.) and somewhere on the edge of this battlement, we may suppose that Satan placed Christ, in attacking Him with this temptation.

action; ^g 7. First, He would have Him worship himself. Perhaps he does not mean so as never to worship God, but let Him worship him in conjunction with God; for the devil knows, if he can but once come in a partner, he shall soon be sole proprietor. Secondly, He would contract with Him, that, when, according to the promise made to Him, He had got possession of the kingdoms of this world, He should make no alteration of religions in them, but permit and suffer the nations, as they had done hitherto, to sacrifice to devils. (1 Cor. 10: 20.) that He should still keep up demon-worship in the world, and then let Him take all the power and glory of the kingdoms, if He pleased. Let who will take the wealth and grandeur of this earth, Satan has all he would have, if he can but have men's hearts and affections, and adulations, for then he effectually devours them.

(2.) How our Lord Jesus triumphed over this temptation. He gave it a peccatory repulse, rejected it with abhorrence; (^g 8.) 'Get thee behind Me, Satan; I cannot bear the mention of it. What! worship the enemy of God, whom I came to serve? and of man whom I came to save? No, I will never do.' Such a temptation as this, was not to be reasoned with, but in a word immediately refused. It is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God; and not only so, but Him only, Him, and no other. And therefore Christ will not worship Satan, nor, when He has the kingdoms of the world delivered to Him by his Father, as He expects shortly to have, will He suffer any remains of the worship of the devil to continue in them. No, it shall be perfectly rooted out and abolished, wherever his Gospel comes. He will make no composition with him. Polytheism and idolatry must sink, as Christ's kingdom rises. Men must be turned from the power of Satan unto God, from the worship of devils to the worship of the only living and true God; this is the great, divine law that Christ will re-establish among men, and by his holy religion reduce men to the obedience of, That God only is to be served and worshipped; and therefore whoever sets up any creature as the object of religious worship, though it were a saint, or an angel, or the virgin Mary herself, they directly thwart Christ's design, and relapse into heathenism.

3. He tempted Him to be his own murderer, in a presumptuous confidence of his Father's protection, such as He had no warrant for. Observe,

(1.) What he designed in this temptation, ^g 9. [1.] He would have Him seek for new proof of his being the Son of God, (as if the voice from heaven, and the descent of the Spirit on Him, were not sufficient,) which would have been a dishonor to God, (as if He had not chosen the most proper way of giving him the assurance of it,) and would have argued a distrust of the Spirit's dwelling in Him, which to Himself was the great and most convincing proof of his being the Son of God, Heb. 1: 8, 9. [2.] He would have Him seek a new method of proclaiming and publishing this to the world. As if it had been done in an obscure corner, only among a company of ordinary people who attended John's baptism, he would have Him now declare it from the pinnacle of the temple, among all the great people who attended the temple-service, and then, for proof of it, throw Himself down thence, when He would presently be received by every body as a Messenger sent from heaven. Thus Satan would have Him seek honors of his devising, in contempt of those which God had put on Him. [3.] It is probable, that he had some hopes, that, though he could not throw Him down, and by making Him believe that he could show Him all the kingdoms of the world, would draw Him into an opinion that he could give Him all those kingdoms.

[2.] He boldly alleged, that these kingdoms were all delivered to him, that he had power to dispose of them, and all their glory, and to give it to whomsoever he would, ^g 6. Some think that herein he pretended to be one of the angels of light, that was set over the kingdoms, who had out-bought, or out-fought, all the rest, and so was intrusted with the disposal of them all, and in God's name, would give them Him, if He would fall down and worship him. But a good angel would not have admitted this: (Rev. 14: 10. 22: 9.) and I rather take it, that he claimed this power as Satan, and as delivered to him, not by the Lord, but by the kings and people of these kingdoms, who gave their power and honor to the devil, Eph. 2: 2. Hence he is called the god of this world, and the prince of this world. It was promised to the Son of God, that He should have the heathen for his inheritance, Ps. 2: 8. 'Why,' saith the devil, 'the heathen are mine, my subjects and votaries: however, they shall be thine, I will give them Thee, on condition that Thou worship me for them, and say they are the rewards which I have given Thee, as others have done before Thee; (Hos. 2: 12.) and consent to have and hold them by, from, and under me.'

[3.] He demanded of Him homage and adoration; ^g 7. First, He would have Him worship himself. Perhaps he does not mean so as never to worship God, but let Him worship him in conjunction with God; for the devil knows, if he can but once come in a partner, he shall soon be sole proprietor. Secondly, He would contract with Him, that, when, according to the promise made to Him, He had got possession of the kingdoms of this world, He should make no alteration of religions in them, but permit and suffer the nations, as they had done hitherto, to sacrifice to devils. Thus Satan would have Him seek honors of his devising, in contempt of those which God had put on Him. [3.] It is probable, that he had some hopes, that, though he could not throw Him down, to do Him the least mischief, yet, if he won, he'd throw Himself down, the fall might be his death, and then he should have got Him finely out of the way.

(2.) How he backed and enforced this temptation, (^g 10.) It is written. Christ had quoted Scripture against him; and he thought he would show that he could quote Scripture as well as He. It has been usual with heretics and seducers, to pervert Scripture, and to press the sacred writings into the service of the worst of wickedness. He shall give his angels charge over thee, if Thou be his Son, and in their hands they shall bear Thee up. And now that He was upon the pinnacle of the temple, He might especially expect this ministration of angels; for if He were the Son of God, the temple was the proper place for Him to be in, (^g 2: 46.) and if any place under the sun had a guard of angels constantly, it must needs be that, Ps. 68: 17. It is true, God has promised the protection of angels, to encourage us to trust Him, not to tempt Him; as far as the promise of God's presence with us, so far the promise of the angels' ministration goes, but no further; 'They shall keep Thee when Thou goest on the ground, where thy way lies, but not if Thou wilt presume to fly in the air.'

(3.) How he was baffled and defeated in the temptation, ^g 12. Christ quoted Deut. 6: 16. where it is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God, by desiring a sign for the proof of divine revelation, when He has already given that which is sufficient; for so Israel did, when they tempted God in the wilderness, saying, He gave us water out of the rock; but can he give flesh also? This Christ would be guilty of, if He should say, 'He did indeed prove Me to be the Son of God, by sending the Spirit upon Me, which is the greater; but can He also give his angels a charge concerning Me, which is the less?'

III. What was the result and issue of this combat, ^g 13. Our victorious Redeemer kept his ground, and came off a Conqueror, not for Himself only, but for us also.

1. The devil emptied his quiver; He ended all the temptation. Christ gave him opportunity to say and do all he could against Him; He let him try all his force, and yet defeated him. Did Christ suffer, being tempted, till all the temptation was ended? And must not we expect also to pass all our trials, to go through the hour of temptation assigned us?

2. He then quitted the field; he departed from Him; he saw it was to no purpose to attack Him; he had nothing in Him for his fiery darts to fasten upon; He had no blind side, no weak or unguarded part, and therefore Satan gave up the cause. Note, If we resist the devil, he will flee from us.

3. Yet he continued his malice against Him, and departed with a resolution to attack Him again; he departed but for a season, till a season, or till the season when he was again to be let loose upon Him, not as a tempter, to draw Him to sin, and so to strike at his head, which was what He now aimed at, and was wholly defeated in; but as a persecutor, to bring Him to suffer by Judas, and the other wicked instruments by whom he was employed, and so to bruise his heel, Gen. 3: 15. He deserted now till that season came, which Christ calls the power of darkness, (^g 22: 53.) and when the prince of this world would again come, John 14: 30.

V. 14—30. After Christ had vanquished the evil spirit, He made it appear how much He was under the influence of the good Spirit; and having defended Himself against the devil's assaults, He now begins to act offensively, and to make those attacks upon him by his preaching

(10.) Charge over Thee, &c.) 'Many (after Jerome) have observed that Satan made his advantage of quoting Scripture merely by scraps, leaving out those words, in all thy ways. The cause of truth, and sometimes of common sense, hath suffered a great deal by those who have followed his example.'

(12.) Tempt 1. To demand further evidence of what is already made sufficiently plain. That this is the purport of the phrase, tempting God, is easy to be seen from comparing Ex 17: 2, 7. Num. 14: 22. Ps. 78 15. and 106: 14.

(^g 13 from ^g 2.) 'Who can read this account without amazement, when he compares the insolence and malice of the prince of darkness, with the condescension and grace of the Son of God? But how highly are we obliged and indebted to our great Deliverer! Who can sufficiently adore thy condescension, O blessed Jesus! who wouldst permit Thyself to be thus assaulted and led from place to place by an infernal spirit, whom Thou couldst in a moment have reined back to hell, to be bound in chains of darkness, and overwhelmed with flaming ruin!'

The opportunity He had for it; He came to Nazareth when He had gained a reputation in other places, in hopes that thereby something at least of the contempt and prejudice with which his countrymen would look on Him, might be worn off. There He took occasion to preach, [1.] In the synagogue, the proper place, where it had been his custom to attend when He was a private person, v. 16. We ought to attend on the public worship of God, as we have opportunity. But now that He was entered on his public ministry, there He preached. There He taught in their synagogues, their places of public worship, where they met, not, as in the temple, for ceremonial services, but for the moral acts of devotion, to read, expound, and apply the Word, to pray and praise, and for church-discipline; these came to be more frequented since the captivity, when the ceremonial worship was near expiring. 3. This He did so as that He gained a great reputation; A fame of Him went through all that region, (v. 14,) and it was a good fame; for (v. 15.) He was glorified of all. Every body admired Him. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. Fervent devotion, or sharp conflicts, may render us for a time regardless of the concerns of our animal life, and this may conduce to our earnestness and success; but the cravings of nature will again return, and then the devil will tempt us to impatience, to irregular methods of obtaining a supply, or to excessive indulgence: we ought therefore to be especially on our guard, after remarkable seasons of abstraction and communion with God; and it is our wisdom and duty to study all the peculiarities of our situation, that we may be prepared for assault.—To whatever sin we are tempted, the Scripture supplies us with spiritual armor, with which to baffle the tempter. All Satan's promises and pretensions are illusion and deceit; and as far as he is permitted to have any influence, in disposing of the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, he uses them merely as baits, by which to ensnare men to their destruction. We should therefore reject every opportunity of sinful gain or advancement, with decision and abhorrence; (P. O. Matt. 16:21—28.) and seek our riches, honors and happiness, in the worship and service of God only. Thus, as his beloved children, angels will have it in charge to 'keep us in all our ways,' and we shall be preserved from presumptuously or ostentatiously 'tempting the Lord our God.'—As seasons of peculiar consolation are commonly transient, so are those of distressing temptation, especially when the enemy is vigorously resisted. And though we shall never be out of his reach, till we are removed from this evil world: yet when, in the strength and after the example of our Redeemer, we have obtained a decisive victory, we may hope for a respite, and an opportunity of applying ourselves, with composure and diligence, to our proper work. When our Lord had made a circuit through the other parts of Galilee, He came at length to Nazareth, where He had spent his former life; 'that He by his example might teach us, saith Theophylact, first to teach and do good to those of our own family and abode.' Whitby. On the Sabbath-day, according to his constant custom in every place, He resorted to the synagogue, that He might join in the public worship there performed, and embrace the opportunity of instructing the people: (Marg. Ref. h, i.) and, either because He had been used to join in their stated worship, and perhaps sometimes to officiate as a reader; or because of the reputation, which He had acquired by his miracles and doctrine in other places; they gave Him a roll containing the prophecy of Isaiah, that He might read the Scriptures to them, which was always a part of their stated service. (18) To preach the Gospel. The word gospel is used in rather different meanings, both in the subsequent part of the New Testament, and in modern divinity: sometimes signifying the publication of Christianity, or the coming and kingdom of the Messiah, in general; at other times, the glad tidings of salvation, as distinguished from other parts of revealed truth.

SCOTT.

(15.) As his custom was. 'Our Lord regularly attended the public worship of God in the synagogues; for there the Scriptures were read—other parts of the worship were very corrupt, but it was the best at that time to be found in the land. To worship God publicly is the duty of every man; and no man can be guiltless who neglects it. If a person cannot get such public worship as he likes, let him frequent such as he can get. Better to attend the most indifferent, than to stay at home, especially on the Lord's day. The place and the time are set apart for the worship of the true God: if others do not conduct themselves well in it, that is not your fault, and need not be any hindrance to you. You come to worship God—don't forget your errand—and God will supply the lack in the service by the teachings of his Spirit.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Went into the synagogue on the Sabbath-day. 'We do not find mention of public worship in the synagogues, except on the Sabbath; yet there can be no doubt, that these Jews, who were unable to go to Jerusalem, attended worship on their festival days, as well as on the Sabbath, in their own synagogues.'

JAHN.

He stood up to read. 'One cannot but be amazed at the ignorance of Suidas, in arguing from hence that Christ was a priest. It is well known that any man of gravity and reputation might at the request of the ruler, officiate on such occasions; compare Acts 13:15.'

without measure, John 3: 34. He now came in the power of the Spirit, v. 14.

Secondly, How He was commissioned; Because He has anointed Me, and sent Me. His extraordinary qualification amounted to a commission; his being anointed, signifies both his being fitted for the undertaking, and called to it. Those whom God appoints to any service, He anoints for it.

Thirdly, What his work was; He was qualified and commissioned,

1. To be a great Prophet. He was anointed to preach; that is three times mentioned here, for that was the work He was now entering upon. Observe, (1.) To whom He was to preach; to the poor; to the poor in the world, whom the Jewish doctors disdained; to the poor in spirit, to the meek and humble, and to those that are truly sorrowful for sin: to them the Gospel and the grace of it will be welcome, and they shall have it, Matt. 11: 5. (2.) What He was to preach; in general, He must preach the Gospel. He is sent to evangelize them; not only to preach to them, but to make that preaching effectual; to bring it, not only to their ears, but to their hearts, and deliver them into the mould of it.

Three things He is to preach:

[1.] Deliverance to the captives. The Gospel is a proclamation of liberty, like that to Israel in Egypt and in Babylon. By the merit of Christ, sinners may be loosed from the bonds of guilt, and, by His Spirit and grace, from the bondage of corruption. It is a deliverance from the worst of thralldoms, which all those shall have the benefit of, that are willing to make Christ their Head, and are willing to be ruled by Him.

[2.] Recovering of sight to the blind. He came, not only by the word of his Gospel to bring light to them that sat in the dark, but by the power of his grace to give sight to them that were blind—to every unregenerate soul; to tell us that He has eye-salve for us, which we may have for the asking; that, if our prayer be, Lord, that our eyes may be opened, his answer shall be, Receive your sight.

[3.] The acceptable year of the Lord, v. 19.

He came, to let the world know, that the God whom they had offended was willing to be reconciled to them, and to accept of them on new terms; that there is now a time of good-will toward men. It alludes to the year of release, or that of jubilee, which was an acceptable year to servants, who were then set at liberty; to debtors, against whom all actions then dropped; and to those who had mortgaged their lands, for then they returned to them again. Christ came, to sound the jubilee-trumpet; and blessed are they that heard the joyful sound, Ps. 89: 15. It was an acceptable time, for it was a day of salvation.

2. Christ came, to be a great Physician; for He was sent to heal the broken-hearted, to comfort and cure afflicted consciences, to give peace to those that were troubled and humbled for sins, and under a dread of God's wrath against them for them, and to bring them to rest, who were weary, and heavy-laden, under the burden of guilt and corruption.

3. To be a great Redeemer. He not only proclaims liberty to the captives, as Cyrus did to the Jews in Babylon; (Whoever will, may go up;) but He sets at liberty them that are bruised; He doth by his Spirit incline and enable them to make use of the liberty granted, as then none did but those whose spirit God stirred up, Ezra 1: 5. He came, in God's name, to discharge poor sinners that were debtors and prisoners to divine justice. The prophets could but proclaim liberty; but Christ, as One having authority, as One that had power on earth to forgive sins, came to set at liberty; and therefore this clause is added here. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that, according to a liberty the Jews allowed their readers, to compare Scripture with Scripture, in their reading, for the explication of the text, Christ added it from Isa. 58: 6. where it is made the duty of the acceptable year, to let the oppressed go free, where the phrase the LXX use, is the same with this here.

(4.) Here is Christ's application of this text to Himself; v. 21. When He had read it, He rolled up the book, and gave it again to the minister, or clerk, that attended, and sat down, according to the custom of the Jewish teachers,

(17.) Opened. 'Rather, unrolled. The sacred Writings used to this day, in all the Jewish synagogues, are written on skins of basil, parchment or vellum, pasted end to end, and rolled on two rollers, rolling at each end; so that, in reading from right to left, they roll on the left, while they roll on with the right. Probably the place in the prophet Isaiah here referred to, was the lesson for that day.

'The book was selected by the ruler of the synagogue; but the parts to be read do not appear to have been previously pointed out.' JAHN.

(18.) The Spirit of the Lord. 'The proclaiming of liberty to the captives, and the acceptable year (or year of acceptance) of the Lord, is a manifest allusion to the proclaiming of the year of jubilee by sound of trumpet, see Lev. 25: 9. &c. Our Savior, by applying this text to Himself, a text so manifestly relating to the institution above mentioned, plainly declares the typical design of that institution.'

LOWRY.

He hath anointed Me.] 'All the functions of this new prophet are exercised on the hearts of men; and the grace by which He works in the heart is a grace of healing, deliverance, and illumination; which, by an admirable virtue, causes them to pass from sickness to health, from slavery to liberty, from darkness to light, and from the lowest degree of misery to supreme, eternal happiness. To those who feel their spiritual poverty; whose hearts are broken through a sense of their sins; who see themselves tied and bound with the chains of many evil habits; who sit in the darkness of guilt and misery, without a friendly hand to lead them in the way in which they should go—to these the Gospel of the grace of Christ is a pleasing sound, because a present and full salvation is proclaimed by it; and the present is shown to be the acceptable year of the Lord; the year, the time, in which

He saves to the uttermost all who come unto Him in the name of His Son Jesus. Reader! what dost thou feel? Sin—wretchedness—misery of every description? Then come to Jesus—He will save thee—He came into the world for this very purpose. Cast thy soul upon Him, and thou shalt not perish, but have everlasting life.'

To the poor.] 'That, in the exposition of these prophecies, the figurative sense of the expression is not to exclude the literal, is evident from this consideration, that the discoveries of the Christian revelation are in fact emphatically glad tidings to the poor, in the literal acceptance of the word; to those who are destitute of worldly riches, who from their present condition might be likely to think themselves forsaken of their Maker.'

Bp. HORSLEY.

Recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised.] 'The former clause seems an allusion to the wretched state of those prisoners, who, according to the inhuman custom still retained in the eastern countries, had their eyes put out; and, with regard to such as these, this great Deliverer is represented as restoring them, a work far beyond all human power. I take them to be the same with those who are spoken of in the next clause, as bruised with the weight of their fetters; for it is plain that even the blind captives were sometimes loaded with them; as Samson, (Judg. 16: 21.) and Zedekiah, 2 Kings 25: 7.'

DOODRIDGE.

Bruised.] 'Meaning the Jews, bruised in their consciences by the galling fetters of a religion of external ordinances, whom our Lord released by the promulgation of his perfect law of liberty.'

Bp. HORSLEY.

(Marg. Ref. x, y) 'He stood up to read, (20.) and closing the book, 'He sat down to teach. Here Christ conforms to the ceremonies of the Jewish doctors, who, in honor of the law and prophets, stood up when they read them, and sat down to teach.' Whitby.—He began by explicitly declaring, that the words, read to them, had been that 'day fulfilled in their ears;' which implied that He was the promised Messiah of whom the prophet spake; and doubtless He explained the words, as referring to the spiritual redemption which He came to effect in behalf of enslaved sinners, and earnestly exhorted and persuaded his hearers to seek these important blessings. Yet, instead of inferring that He had his wisdom and utterance immediately from heaven, they rejected his claim to be the Messiah, and seem even to have doubted of the reality of the miracles, which it was reported that He wrought. (Matt. 11: 2-6. 13: 54-58. Mark 6: 1-6.) 'It does not appear to me likely, that persons of every kind were rashly admitted to speak publicly in the synagogues; but that this was the ordinary office of the scribes and lawyers; the Levites for this purpose having been dispersed into many places. But, moreover, that certain persons, as invited by the rulers of the synagogues, sometimes officiated, besides this settled order, appears from Acts 13: 15. The majesty and the miracle melting way. Note, Christ's words are words of grace, (Ps. 45: 2.) and words to be wondered at; Christ's name was Wonderful, and in nothing was He more so, than in the words of his grace, and the power that went along with them. We may well wonder that He should speak such words of grace to such graceless wretches as we are. Secondly, What it was that increased their wonder; Is not this Joseph's Son? Hence some took occasion, perhaps, so much the more to admire his gracious words, concluding He must needs be taught of God, for they knew no one else had taught Him; while others, perhaps, with this consideration corrected their wonder at his gracious words, and concluded there could be nothing really admirable in them, whatever appeared, because He was the Son of Joseph. Can any thing great, or worthy our regard, come from one so mean?

'of Christ every where procured Him a hearing.' Beza. (22.) The gracious words.] 'The words of the grace, &c.' which, it is probable, may refer to the agreeable manner of Christ's discourse, as well as to the matter of it. Doddridge. That our Lord's elocution was peculiarly becoming, majestic, solemn, impressive, and persuasive, can scarcely be doubted. In every sense, 'He spake as never man spake'; and this would excite the additional astonishment of those, who knew the reasonableness of his birth and education. It may, however, be questioned, whether the original word ever has this meaning in the New Testament. Scott.

(20.) And sat down.] 'As did the doctors; thus rightly claiming the office of doctor, for others, of the common people, even when they took any part in the sacred offices, did it standing.' Grotius.

'The custom of preaching from a text of Scripture, which now prevails throughout all the Christian churches, seems to have derived its origin from the authority of this example.' Macknight.

(22.) Bare Him witness.] 'This is a phrase which signifies "to bear testimony to any one's merits, to praise him." Bloomfield.

At the gracious words.] 'At the words of grace, or the doctrines of grace, which He then preached. It is very strange, that none of the evangelists give any account of this sermon! There was certainly more of it than is related in the 21st verse. To-day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears, seems to have been no more than the first sentence He spoke on the occasion. But had it been necessary for our salvation, it would have been recorded. It was a demonstration to those Jews that Jesus, who preached to us, was the Person of whom the prophets there spoke; it was not designed for general edification. The ear is never satisfied with hearing: we wish for another and another revelation, while sadly unacquainted with the nature and design of that which God's mercy has already given us.' Dr. A. Clarke.

(6.) Christ's anticipation of an objection, which He knew to be in the mind of many of his hearers. Observe,

[1.] What the objection was, v. 23. 'Because ye know that I am the Son of Joseph, your neighbor, you will expect that I should work miracles among you, as I have done in other places; as one would expect that a physician, if he be able, should heal, not only himself, but those of his own family and fraternity.' Most of Christ's miracles were cures; 'Now, why should not the sick in this town own they are healed, as well as those in other cities?' 'Why should not the disease of unbelief, if it be indeed a disease, be cured in those of this town city, as well as in those of others? Whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, that has been so much talked of, do here also in this town country.' They were pleased with Christ's gracious words, only because they hoped they were but the introduction to some wondrous works of his; they wanted to have their lame, and blind, and sick, and lepers, healed, that the charge of their town might be eased; and that was the chief thing they looked at. They thought their own town as worthy to be the stage of miracles, as any other; and why should not He rather draw company to that, than to any other? And why should not his neighbors and acquaintance have the benefit of his preaching and miracles, rather than any other?

[2.] How He answers this objection against the course He took.

First, By a plain and positive reason; v. 24. No prophet is accepted in his own country; experience seals this. When prophets have been sent with messages and miracles of mercy, few of their own countrymen, that have known their extraction and education, have been fit to receive them. So Dr. Hammond. Familiarity breeds contempt; we are apt to think meanly of those, whose conversation we have been accustomed to; and they will scarcely be duly honored as prophets, who were well known when private men. That is most esteemed, which is far-fetched and dear-bought, though what is home-bred, is really more excellent. This arises likewise from the envy which neighbors commonly have towards one another. For this reason, Christ declined working miracles, or doing any thing extraordinary, at Nazareth, because of the rooted prejudices they had against Him there.

Secondly, By pertinent examples of two of the most famous prophets of the Old Testament, who chose to dispense their favors among foreigners, rather than among their own countrymen, and that, no doubt, by divine direction.

(1.) Elijah maintained a widow of Sarepta, a city of Sidon, one that was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, when there was a famine in the land, v. 25, 26. The story we

Verses 23-32.

They were disposed to dictate to our Lord, or to cavil at his ministry, because He did not comply with their unreasonable demands, or pay court to them; nay, they spake as if they had a just claim to his miraculous cures, in preference to others. (Marg. Ref. d-g.) He therefore now first applied to them that proverb, which has already been considered; (Marg. Ref. h.-Matt. 13: 54-58, John 4: 43-45.) and then further observed, that He had a right to dispense his favors as He saw good; in which He did the same as the ancient prophets had done; (1 Kings 17. 2 Kings 5.) so that if He had not only given Capernaum the preference to Nazareth, but had even neglected the Jews, and conferred his favors on the Gentiles, they could not have objected to his conduct, without condemning the prophets. This declaration exceedingly enraged them, so if it had been an inexcusable injustice! (Marg. Ref. i-o.) 'When they heard Christ declaring them unworthy of the benefit of those miracles which He had done at Capernaum, and plainly intimating, that this Gospel should chiefly be received among the Gentiles, they, in a furious zeal, seek to destroy Him.' Whitby. The inhabitants, however, of the cities in which our Lord's miracles were principally wrought, were expressly declared by Him to be unworthy of them; (10: 13-15, Note, Matt. 11: 20-24.) yet their prejudices were not so strong as those of the Nazarenes, nor were they disposed to persecute Him; and there were more believers among them than at Nazareth. But, in fact, the indignation shown on this occasion, was excited by the doctrine of the divine sovereignty. 'May I not do what I will with my own?' 'May I not confer unmerited favors on whom I will, without doing injustice to those who do not share them?' The doctrine, which is supported against all objections by these questions, offended the men of Nazareth; as it ever did, and ever will, offend those, who 'have not submitted to the righteousness of God.' (Matt. 20: 1-16, v. 13-15. P. O. 1-16. Rom. 9: 15-21) Acce.

25 But I tell you of a truth, 'Many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land :

26 But unto none of them was Elias sent, 'save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow.

to his own, and they received Him not. [1.] They rose up in a tumultuous manner against Him, interrupted Him in his discourse, and themselves in their devotions, for they could not stay until their synagogue-worship was over. [2.] They thrust Him out of the city, thrust from them the Savior of their salvation, as if He had been the offscouring of all things. How justly He have called for fire from heaven upon them! But this was the day of his patience. [3.] They led Him to the brow of the hill, with a purpose to throw Him down headlong, as one not fit to live. Though they knew have, 1 Kings 17:9, &c. 18:1. As God would hereby show Himself a Father of the fatherless, and a Judge of the widows, so He would show that He was rich in mercy, to all, even to the Gentiles.

(2.) Elisha cleansed Naaman the Syrian of his leprosy, though he was a Syrian, and not only a foreigner, but an enemy to Israel; v. 27. Many lepers were in Israel in the days of Elisha, four particularly, that brought the news of the Syrians' raising the siege of Samaria with precipitation, and leaving the plunder of their tents to enrich Samaria, when Elisha was himself in the besieged city, and this was the accomplishment of his prophecy too; see 2 Kings 7:1, 3, &c. And yet we do not find that Elisha cleansed them, no, not for a reward of their service, and the good tidings they brought, but only this Syrian; for none besides had faith to apply himself to the prophet for a cure. Christ Himself often met with greater faith among Gentiles than in Israel. And here He mentions both these instances, to show that He did not dispense the favor of his miracles by private respect, but according to God's wise appointment. And the people of Israel might as justly have said to Elijah or Elisha, as the Nazarenes to Christ, Physician, heal thyself. Nay, Christ wrought his miracles, though not among his townsmen, yet among Israelites; whereas these great prophets wrought theirs among the Gentiles. The examples of the saints, though they will not make a bad action good, yet will help to free a good action from the blame of exceptive people.

2. How He was persecuted at Nazareth.

(1.) That which provoked them was, his taking notice of the favor which God by Elijah and Elisha showed to the Gentiles; (v. 28.) a great change since v. 22. when they wondered at the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth; thus uncertain are the opinions and affections of the multitude, and so very fickle. They were angry that He should compare Himself, whom they knew to be the Son of Joseph, with those great prophets, and compare them with the men of that corrupt age, when all had bowed the knee to Baal. But that which especially exasperated them was, that He intimated some kindness God had in reserve for the Gentiles, which the Jews could by no means hear the thoughts of, Acts 22:21. Their pious ancestors pleased themselves with the hopes of adding the Gentiles to the church; (witness many of David's psalms and Isaiah's prophecies;) but this degenerate race, when they had forfeited the covenant themselves, hated to think that any others should be taken in.

(2.) They were provoked to that degree, that they made an attempt on his life. This was a severe trial, now at his setting out, but a specimen of the usage He met with, when He came to his own, and they received Him not. [1.] They rose up in a tumultuous manner against Him, interrupted Him in his discourse, and themselves in their devotions, for they could not stay until their synagogue-worship was over. [2.] They thrust Him out of the city, thrust from them the Savior of their salvation, as if He had been the offscouring of all things. How justly He have called for fire from heaven upon them! But this was the day of his patience. [3.] They led Him to the brow of the hill, with a purpose to throw Him down headlong, as one not fit to live. Though they knew how inoffensively He had for so many years lived among them, how shining his conversation had been, though they had heard such a fame of Him, and had but just now themselves admired his gracious words, though in justice He ought to have been allowed a fair hearing and liberty to explain Himself, yet they hurried Him away in a popular fury, or frenzy rather, to put Him to death in a most barbarous manner. Sometimes they were ready to stone Him for the good works He did; (John 10:32.) here, for not doing the good works they expected from Him. To such a height of wickedness was violence sprung up.

(3.) Yet He escaped; He passed through the midst of them, unhurt; either He blinded their eyes, as the Sodomites and Syrians were, or He bound their hands, or filled them with confusion, so that they could not do what they designed; for his work was but just begun, his hour not yet come; when it was come, He freely surrendered Himself. They drove Him from them, and He went his way. He would have gathered Nazareth, but they would not, and therefore their house is left to them desolate. This added to the reproach of his being Jesus of Nazareth, that not only it was a place whence no good thing was expected, but that it was such a wicked, rude place, and so unkind to Him. Yet there was a providence in it, that He should not be much respected by the men of Nazareth, for that would have looked like collusion between Him and his old acquaintance; but now, though they received Him not, there were those that did.

V. 31-44. When Christ was expelled Nazareth, He came to Capernaum, another city of Galilee; the account we have in these verses of his preaching and miracles there, we had before, Mark 1:21, &c. Observe,

I. His preaching, v. 31. In hearing the Word preached, as an ordinance of God, we worship God, and it is a proper work for sabbath days. Christ's preaching much affected the people; (v. 32.) there was weight in every word He said, and admirable discoveries were made to them by it. The doctrine itself was astonishing, and not only as it came from One that had not had a liberal education. His word was with power; there was a commanding force in it, and a working power went along with it to the consciences of men. The doctrine Paul preached, hereby proved itself to be of God, that it came in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power.

II. His miracles. Of these we have here, 1. Two particularly specified, showing Christ to be,

(1.) A Controller and Conqueror of Satan. Observe, [1.] The devil is an unclean spirit, his nature directly contrary to that of the pure and holy God, and degenerated from what it was at first. [2.] He works in the children of men; in the souls of many, as then in men's bodies. [3.] Those who are very much under his power and working, may yet be found in the synagogue, among the worshippers of God. [4.] Even the devils know and believe, that Jesus Christ is the Holy One of God, is sent of God, and is a Holy One. [5.] They believe and

(25.) Three years and six months.] 'As to the difficulty of the six months, which both our Lord here, and James (5:17) mention, and which are not mentioned in the book of Kings, whence the account is taken, it may be easily understood thus: The rains fell in Judea, twice in the year, about April, and about October. At this latter period, when the rain was expected, the prophet prayed that it might not rain; the rain therefore of Marchesvan, or October, &c. was then restrained: this restraint continued for three full years, but six months had elapsed from Nisan, April, &c. when they had their last rain; add these six months to the three full years that the rain was restrained at the prayer of Elijah, and then we have a period of three years and six months, according to our Lord and James.'

Dr. A. CLARKE. (26, 27.) 'This verse is elliptical, and means, To none of them was Elias sent; he was not sent, except to Sarepta; for the widow at Sarepta was a Sidonian, and not a widow of Israel.' PEARCE. 'The 27th verse is to be understood in the same way. The meaning of these verses is, God dispenses his benefits when, where, and to whom He pleases. No person can complain of his conduct in these respects, because no person deserves any good from his hand. God never enriches any but those who deserve it; but He blesses incessantly those who deserve it not! The reason is evident: justice depends on certain ruins; but beneficence is free. Beneficence can bless both the good and the evil; justice can punish the latter only. Those who do not make this distinction, must have a very confused notion of the conduct of Divine Providence among men.'

Dr. A. CLARKE. (29.) The brow of the hill.] 'After dinner, we made a small excursion, in order to see that which they call the mountain of the precipitation. This precipice is at least half a league distant from Nazareth southward. In going to it, you cross first over the vale in which Nazareth stands, and then going down two or three furlongs in a narrow cleft between the rocks, you there climb up a short, but difficult way on the right hand, at the top of which you find a great stone standing on the brink of a precipice, which is said to be the very place where our Lord was destined to be thrown down by his enraged neighbors, had He not made his escape out of their hands.'

MAUNDRELL. 'Precipitation was a punishment rarely used, though we meet with it in the history of the kings, and in subsequent times. 2 Kings 9:30, 33. 2 Chron. 25:12.'

HORN. (30.) 'Passed through the midst of them.] 'Whether the miracle lay in rendering Himself entirely invisible, or in putting on some other form, or in affecting their eyes or minds, in such a manner that they should not know Him, we cannot certainly determine; but it seems evident, that there was something miraculous in the case. Compare John 8:5, 9. Luke 24:16. and 2 Kings 6:8-20.'

to Capernaum, a city of Galilee, 'and taught them on the sabbath-days.

[Practical Observations.]

32 And 'they were astonished at his doctrine; for his word was with power.

33 ¶ And 'in the synagogue there was a man, which had a spirit of an unclean devil, and cried out with a loud voice, 34 Saying, *Let us alone: 'what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? 'art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art; 'the Holy One of God.

35 And 'Jesus rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him. And when the devil had 'thrown him in the midst, he came out of him, and hurt him not.

36 And 'they were all amazed, and spake among themselves, saying, 'What a word is this! for with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out!

37 And 'the fame of him went out into every place of the country round about.

38 ¶ And 'he arose out of the synagogue, and entered into Simon's house: and Sitremble. This unclean spirit cried out with a loud voice, under a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and apprehensive that Christ was now come to destroy him. Unclean spirits are subject to continual frights. [6.] The devils have nothing to do with Jesus Christ, nor desire to have any thing to do with Him; for He took not on Him the nature of angels. [7.] Christ has the devil under check; He rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace; and this word He spake with power; He muzzled; Christ did not only enjoin him silence, but stopped his mouth, and forced him to be silent against his will. [9.] In the breaking of Satan's power, both the enemy that is conquered, shows his malice, and Christ, the Conqueror, shows his overruling grace. The devil showed what he would have done, when he threw the man in the midst, as if he would have dashed him to pieces. But Christ showed what a power He had over him, in that He not only forced him to leave him, but to leave him without so much as hurting him. Whom Satan cannot destroy, he will hurt all he can; but this is a comfort, he can harm them no further than Christ permits; nay, he shall not do them any real harm. He came out, and hurt him not; that is, the poor man was perfectly well in an instant, though the devil left him with so much rage, mon's wife's mother was taken with a great fever; 'and they besought him for her.

39 And he stood over her, 'and rebuked the fever; and it left her. And immediately 'she arose, 'and ministered unto them.

40 ¶ Now 'when the sun was setting, all they that had any sick with divers diseases brought them unto him; 'and he laid his hands on every one of them, and healed them.

41 And devils also came out of many, 'crying out, and saying, 'O Thou art Christ, the Son of God. And he, rebuking them, suffered them not to speak; for they knew that he was Christ.

42 And 'when it was day, he departed and went into a desert place; 'and the people sought him, and came unto him, 'and stayed him, that he should not depart from them.

43 And he said unto them, 'I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also; for 'therefore am I sent.

44 And 'he preached in the synagogues of Galilee.

that all that were present thought he had torn him to pieces. [9.] Christ's power over devils was universally acknowledged and adored, v. 36. No one doubted of the truth of the miracle, it was evident beyond contradiction, nor was any thing suggested to diminish the glory of it, for they were all amazed, saying, What a word is this? They that pretended to cast out devils did it with abundance of charms and spells; (to pacify the devil, and lull him asleep, as it were;) but Christ commanded them with authority and power, which they could not gain-say or resist. Even the prince of the power of the air is his vassal, and trembles before Him. [10.] This, as much as any thing, gained Christ a reputation, and spread his fame. This instance of his power, which many now-a-days make light of, was then, by them that were eye-witnesses of it, (and those no fools neither, but men of penetration,) magnified, and was looked upon as greatly magnifying Him; (v. 37.) on the account of this, the fame of Him went out, more than ever, into every place of the country round about. Our Lord Jesus, when He set out at first in his public ministry, was greatly talked of, more than afterward, when people's admiration wore off with the novelty of the thing.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—31. When, for a time, we meet with acceptance in our endeavors to do good, we should expect some change or alloy; nor can we reasonably hope to escape that reproach and contempt, which our Redeemer continually experienced: yet this ought not to damp our ardor, or dismay us from constancy in our attempts to be useful. It should be our custom, as it was our Savior's, to resort, on 'the Lord's day' at least, to the assemblies of his people; and whether we read, hear, or preach the Word of God, we should inquire diligently into its meaning, and faithfully apply it to ourselves or others. 'The Spirit of the Lord,' who anointed the Savior for his work, and who has revealed Him in the Scriptures, must also discover Him to our hearts, in all his gracious characters and offices: we ought, therefore, to seek his blessing, by fervent prayer, especially when attending on 'the means of grace,' or when about to use them. Under this blessed influence we shall perceive, that the message of the Gospel is indeed 'glad tidings to the poor' and humble.—The divine Redeemer came on purpose to 'bind up the broken in heart,' and to give peace to the wounded conscience; to rescue the wretched captives of Satan; to bring them forth into the blessed light of divine truth; and to open their blinded eyes, that they may behold and rejoice in the light, and be delivered from all the galling chains of their own destructive lusts; and thus to admit them 'to the glorious liberty of the children of God.' Let sinners then attend to the Savior's invitation, in 'the acceptable year of the Lord,' when liberty is thus proclaimed to 'those that are bruised' let them seek to Him for this blessed deliverance, that this Scripture may not only be fulfilled in their ears, but in their hearts and experience.—But many will attend to the Gospel, and express their approbation of the things which are spoken; yea, many will give the Lord Himself good words, who will not give Him their hearts. Some prejudice intervenes, to furnish an objection against the humbling doctrine of the cross; and, while the Word itself excites their enmity, they lay the blame on something in the conduct or manner of the speaker, that they may not be self-condemned in neglecting his message.—Many seem to think themselves entitled almost exclusively to the favor of God, yet they will not seek it in his appointed way; when, therefore, others enjoy the privileges which they have forfeited, they are greatly offended. In vain do we show, that God has asserted his undoubted right to 'do what He will with his own,' that He has frequently passed by formalists, to save pagans and prodigals; and that He always dispenses his favors in that manner, which tends most to display his own glory, and especially the riches of his unmerited grace and mercy. Instead of being silenced, they are the more exasperated by such representations; and their enmity to God often shows itself in revilings, outrages, and persecutions against his servants. But He, who avoided the assaults of his enraged enemies, till his appointed hour arrived, will uphold and protect all his ministers, till they have 'finished their testimony.'

CHAP. V.

Jesus teaches the people from Simon's ship, 1-3; whom, by his divine authority and power, takes a large draught of fishes, 4-7. Simon, James, and John, follow Him, 8-11. He cleanses a leper, 12-15; with prayers for prayer, 16; heals a paralytic, and silences the objections of the scribes and Pharisees against his forgiving sins, 17-25; calls Levi, and justifies his own eating with publicans and sinners, 27-32; and vindicates his disciples, for not fasting, at present, after the manner of the Pharisees and John's disciples, 33-38.

grievous than others; she was taken with a great fever, very acute, and high, and threatening. [4.] No age can exempt from diseases. It is probable that Peter's mother-in-law was in years. [5.] When our relations are sick, we ought to apply ourselves to Christ, by faith and prayer, on their account; They besought Him for her: and there is a particular promise, that the prayer of faith shall benefit the sick. [6.] Christ has a tender concern for his people when they are in sickness and distress; He stood over her, as one concerned for her, and compassionating her case. [7.] Christ had, and still has, a sovereign power over bodily diseases; with a word's speaking, He commanded the fever away, and it left her. He saith to diseases, Go, and they go, Come, and they come; and can still rebuke fevers, even great fevers. [8.] This proves Christ's cures to be miraculous, that they were done in an instant; Immediately she arose. [9.] Where Christ gives a new life, in recovery from sickness, He designs and expects that it should be a new life indeed, spent more than ever in his service, to his glory. If distempers be rebuked, and we arise from a bed of sickness, we must set ourselves to minister to Jesus Christ. [10.] Those that minister to Christ, must be ready to minister to all that are his for his sake; she ministered to them, not only to Him that had cured her, but to them that had besought Him for her. We must study to be grateful to them that have prayed for us.

2. A general account given of many other miracles of the same kind, which Christ did.

(1.) He cured many that were diseased, even all without exception that made their application to Him; (v. 40.) it was when the sun was setting, in the evening of that sabbath-day which He had spent in the synagogue. Note, It is good to do full sabbath-day's work, to abound in some good work or other, even till sunset; as those that call the Sabbath, and the business of it, a delight. Observe, He cured all that were sick, poor as well as rich, and though they were sick of divers diseases; so that there was no room to suspect that He had only a specific for some one disease; He had a remedy for every malady. The sign He used in healing was, laying his hands on the sick; not lifting up his hands for them, for He healed as having authority. He healed by his own power. And thus He would put honor on that sign, which was afterward used in conferring the Holy Ghost.

(2.) He cast the devil out of many that were possessed, v. 41. Confessions were extorted from the demons; they said, Thou art Christ, the Son of God, but they said it, crying with rage and indignation; it was a confession on the rack, and therefore was not admitted in evidence; Christ rebuked them, and did not suffer them to say that they knew Him to be the Christ, that it might appear, beyond all contradiction, that He had obtained a conquest over them, and not a compact with them.

3. Christ's removal from Capernaum, v. 42, 43.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 32-44. If the ministers of Christ be persecuted from one place, and driven to another, let them still boldly proceed in declaring to 'all men every where' the way of salvation. The word which they speak, being attended with the power of their Lord, will be made effectual to convince, alarm and convert. No case can be desperate if Jesus see good to work. We ought therefore to spread abroad the fame of the Savior in every place; to beseech Him for those who are diseased in body or mind; and to use our influence in bringing sinners to Him, that his powerful hands may be laid on them for their healing. Thus relying on his power, truth and love, we should seek to

(1.) He retired for a while into a place of solitude; it was but a little while that He allowed Himself for sleep; not only that a little served Him, but He was content with a little, and never indulged Himself in ease; but when it was day, He went into a desert place, not to live constantly like a hermit, but to be sometimes alone with God, as even those should be and contrive to be, that are most engaged in public work, or else their work will go on but poorly; and they will find themselves never less alone than when thus alone.

(2.) He returned again to the places of con course, and to the work He had to do there. A desert place may be a convenient retreat, but it is not a convenient residence: we were sent into the world not to live to ourselves, not to the best part of ourselves only, but to glorify God, and do good in our generation.

[1.] He was earnestly solicited to stay at Capernaum. I doubt, more because He had healed their sick, than because He had preached repentance to them. They sought Him, inquired which way He went; and, though it was in a desert place, they came unto Him. A desert is no desert if we be with Christ there. His old neighbors at Nazareth had driven Him from them, his new acquaintance at Capernaum were very importunate for his continuance with them. Note, It ought not to discourage the ministers of Christ, that some reject them, for they will meet with others that will welcome them and their message.

[2.] He chose rather to diffuse the light of his Gospel to many places, than to fix it to one that no one might pretend to be a mother-church to the rest. Though He was welcome at Capernaum, and had done abundance of good there, yet He is sent to preach the Gospel to other cities also; and Capernaum must not insist on his stay there. They that enjoy the benefit of the Gospel, must be willing that others also should share in that benefit, and not covet the monopoly of it. And those ministers who are not drawn from one place, may yet be drawn to another by a prospect of greater usefulness. Christ, though He preached not in vain in the synagogue at Capernaum, yet would not be tied to that, but preached in the synagogues of Galilee, v. 44. What is good, is self-diffusive. It is well for us, that our Lord Jesus has not tied Himself to any one place or people, but wherever two or three are gathered in his name, He will be in the midst of them; and even in Galilee of the Gentiles, his special presence is in the Christian synagogues.

CHAP. V. V. 1-11. This passage of story fell in order of time, before the two miracles we had in the close of the foregoing chapter, and is the same with that which was more briefly related by Matthew and Mark, of Christ's calling Peter and Andrew to be fishers of men, Matt. 4:18, and Mark 1:16. They had not related this miraculous draught of fishes at that

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1-11. (Matt. 4:18-22. 13:1, 2. Mark 1:16-22.) This is generally supposed to be a more particular account of the manner, in which Andrew and Peter, James and John, were called to be the constant followers of Christ; in order to their appointment to the apostolical office. Andrew indeed is not mentioned; but it is probable that he was present. The exact order of the history is not, on that supposition, observed. Some of the company might be employed in 'mending their nets' after washing; and others in 'washing their nets,' by casting them from the shore into the lake. All of them had become acquainted with Jesus some time before; were called his disciples; and had had some conversation with Him before, which began at John's baptism, (John 1:40, 41.) they were with Him at Cana of Galilee, (John 2:2.) and in Judea; (John 4:2.) but as yet they were not called to attend Him constantly, and therefore here we have them at their calling, and now it was that they were called into a more intimate fellowship with Christ.

1. When Christ had done preaching, He ordered Peter to apply himself again to the business of his calling, v. 4. It was not the sabbath-day, and therefore as soon as the lecture was over, He set them to work. Time spent on week-days in the public exercises of religion, may be but little hindrance to us in time, and a great furtherance to us in temper of mind, in our worldly business. It is our wisdom and duty so to manage our religious exercises, as that they may befriend our worldly business, and so to manage our worldly business, as that it may be no enemy to our religious exercises.

2. Peter having attended Christ in his preaching, Christ will accompany him in his fishing. Note, Those that will be constant followers of Christ, shall have Him a constant Guide to them.

3. Christ orders Peter and his ship's crew to cast their nets into the sea, which they do, in obedience to Him, though they had been hard at it all night, and had caught nothing, v. 4, 5.

We may observe here, time, having only in view the calling of his disciples. Now observe here,

I. What vast crowds attended Christ's preaching; v. 1. No house would contain them, but He was forced to draw them out to the strand. The people flocked about Him; (so the word signifies;) they showed respect to his preaching, though not without some rudeness to his person, for they pressed upon Him. Some would reckon this a diminution to Him, to be thus cried up by the vulgar, when none of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on Him; but He reckoned it an honor to Him, for their souls were as precious as the souls of the grandees; and it is his aim to bring not so much the mighty as the many sons to God; and it was foretold of Him, that to Him shall the gathering of the people be. Christ was a popular Preacher; and though able, at twelve, to dispute with the doctors, He chose, at thirty, to preach to the capacity of the vulgar. See how the people relished good preaching, though under all external disadvantages; they pressed to hear the Word of God; they could perceive it to be the Word of God, by the divine power and evidence that went along with it, and therefore they coveted to hear it.

II. What poor conveniences Christ had for preaching; v. 1. None of his hearers appear to have had any contrivance to give Him advantage, but there were two ships, or fisher-boats, brought to shore, one belonged to Simon and Andrew, the other to Zebedee and his sons, v. 2. At first, Christ saw Peter and Andrew fishing at some distance; (so Matthew tells us, ch. 4:13.) but He waited till they came to land, and till the fishermen, that is, the servants, were gone out of them, having washed their nets, and taken care of them: then He entered into Simon's ship and begged it of him for a pulpit; so having prayed him, for convenience' sake, to thrust out a little from the land, there He sat down, and taught the people the good knowledge of the Lord. Wisdom cries in the top of high places; (Prov. 8:2.) it intimates that Christ had a strong voice, and that He did not desire to favor Himself.

III. What a particular acquaintance Christ, hereupon, fell into with these fishermen. They hereupon, fell into with these fishermen. They hereupon, fell into with these fishermen. They hereupon, fell into with these fishermen.

(1.) How melancholy their business had now been, v. 5. But they mention it to Christ, only as He bids them go a fishing again. Note, [1.] Some callings are much more unlucrative than others are, and more perilous; yet Providence has so ordered it for the common good, that there is no useful calling so discouraging, but some or other have a genius for it. Those who with great ease get abundance by their business; should think with compassion of those who, by theirs, with great fatigue, can hardly get a bare livelihood. When we have rested all night, let us not forget those who have toiled all night, as Jacob, when he kept Laban's sheep. [2.] Be the calling ever so laborious, it is good to see people diligent in it, and make the best of it; these fishermen, that were thus industrious, Christ singled out for his favorites. [3.] Even those who are most diligent in their business, often meet with disappointments; the race is not always to the swift. God will have us to be diligent, purely in duty to his command, and dependence on his goodness, rather than with an assurance of worldly success. We must do our duty, and then leave the event to God. [4.] When we are tired with our worldly business, and crossed in our worldly affairs, we are welcome to come to Christ, and spread our case before Him, who will take cognizance of it.

(2.) How ready their obedience was to the command of Christ; v. 5. Though they had toiled all night, yet, if Christ bid them, they will renew their toil, for they know that they who wait on Him, shall renew their strength, as work is renewed on their hands; for every fresh service they shall have a fresh supply of grace sufficient. Though they have taken nothing, yet, if Christ bid them let down for a draught, they will hope to take something. Note, We must not abruptly quit the callings wherewith we are called, because we have not the success in them we promised ourselves; and this is thankworthy, to continue unwearied in our labors, though we see not the success of them. [3.] In this, ministers should have an eye to the word of Christ, and a dependence on that; 'At thy word, I will let down the net, because Thou dost enjoin it, and Thou dost encourage it.' We are then likely to speed well, when we follow the guidance of Christ's word.

4. The draught of fish they caught, was so much beyond what was ever known, that it amounted to a miracle; (v. 6.) their net brake, and yet, which is strange, they did not lose their draught; it was so great a draught, that they had not hands sufficient to draw it up, but beckoned to their partners, at a distance, to come, and help them, v. 7. But the greatest evidence of the vastness of the draught was, that they filled both the ships with fish, so that degree that they began to sink, so that the fish had like to have been lost again with their own weight; as many an overgrown estate, raised out of the water, returns to the place whence it came. Suppose these ships were but five or six tons apiece; what a vast quantity of fish must there be to load, nay, to overload them both!

Now, by this vast draught of fishes, Christ even baptized those who became his followers: and probably had attended Him to Jerusalem, and returned with Him through Samaria into Galilee: (Notes. John 1:35-42. 2:1-5. 3:22-24. 4:1-9.) yet they seem to have followed their ordinary employments, from time to time, till, on this occasion, they became his constant attendants, which was after John the Baptist had been 'cast into prison.' (Matt. 4:12-17. v. 12.) Jesus had hitherto, generally, preached in the synagogues; but now such numbers thronged around Him, that those places of worship could no longer contain them. (Marg. Ref. a. b. Marg. Ref. c. d. e. Matt. 13:1. 2. Marg. Ref. f. g. h. i. Notes, John 21:1-14.) Peter very humbly, but ignorantly, desired Jesus 'to depart from him,' being afraid of some fatal consequence from his presence with so great a sinner. (Marg. Ref. l. m. n. Job 42:1-6. v. 6. Is. 6:5-8. Matt. 8:5-9.) Depart, &c. He spoke according to the notions which have generally been entertained of sinful man's danger, from the power and presence of a holy God, or of those whom He especially approves and favors. (8:37. Notes. Deut. 5:22-29. Judg. 13:18-23. 1 Sam. 6:19-21. 2 Sam. 6:8, 9. 1 Kings 17:18.) The miracle itself was emblematic of many things relative to the preaching of the Gospel, and especially of Peter's great success on the day of Pentecost. (Acts 2:41.) When Christ had encouraged him and his companions, and assured them, that He purposed to employ them in bringing sinners by His Gospel to the obedience of faith, they did not hesitate to leave all and follow Him. (Marg. Ref. Matt. 19:27, 28.) Scott.

(3, 4.) Ships—Draught.] It is highly improper to term these ships. They appear to have been only such small boats, as are used to manage nets on flat, smooth beaches; one end of the net is attached to the shore; the fishermen row out and return, dipping the net as they go, and making a kind of semi-circle from the shore; and as it was sunk with weights to the bottom, and floated with corks at the top, all the fish in that compass were included, and drawn ashore.

(5.) Nevertheless at thy word, &c.] 'They were not discouraged by the weariness of a whole night's fruitless labor, but willingly renewed their toil, at the instance of our Lord. A seasonable warning to every servant of his, not to depend upon any unsuccessful trials in his Master's business; nor to sink his spirits for any disappointments in the way of his ordinary calling; when He contemplates this eminent example of such a blessing upon a mind ready to labor at his word, and so large amends made at once for so many fruitless experiments before.'

Dean STANHOPE.

(6.) Brake.] 'Or, began to break, or was likely to be broken. Raphaelus gives some very pertinent examples of this usage out of Herodotus.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

7 And they beckoned unto their partners, which were in the other ship, * that they should come and help them. And they came, and filled both the ships, so that they began to sink.

8 When Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord.

9 For he was astonished, and all that were with him, at the draught of the fishes which they had taken:

10 And so was also James and John, the sons of Zebedee, which were partners with Simon. And Jesus said unto Simon, Fear not; from henceforth thou shalt catch men.

11 And when they had brought their ships to land, * they forsook all, and followed him.

12 ¶ And it came to pass, when he was in a certain city, behold, a man, full of leprosy; who, seeing Jesus, * fell on his face, and besought him, saying, Lord, so if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

13 And he put forth his hand, and touched intended to show his dominion in the seas, as well as on the dry land; over its wealth as over its vases, Ps. 8: 8. He intended hereby to confirm the doctrine He had just now preached. We may suppose that the people on shore, who heard the sermon, staid halting about there, to see what He would do next; and his miracle immediately following, would be a confirmation to their faith, that he was a Teacher come from God. He intended hereby to repay Peter for the loan of his boat; for Christ's Gospel now, as his ark formerly in the house of Obed-edom, will make rich amends for its kind entertainment. None shall shut a door, or kindle a fire in God's house for nought, Mal. 1: 10. Christ's recompenses for services done to his name, are abundant, they are superabundant. He intended hereby to give a specimen to those who were to be his ambassadors to the world, of the success of their embassy, that, though they might, for a time, and in one particular place, toil and catch nothing, yet they should be instrumental to bring in many to Christ, and inclose many in the gospel-net.

5. The impression which this miraculous draught of fishes made on Peter, was very remarkable.

(1.) All concerned were astonished, all the boat's crew, (v. 9.) and the more they considered it, and all the circumstances of it, the more they wondered, and so were also James and John, who were partners with Simon, (v. 10.) and, for aught that appears, were not so well acquainted with Christ, before this, as Peter and Andrew were. Now they were the more affected with it, [1.] Because they understood it better than others did. They were well acquainted with the sea, probably had plied upon it many years, yet never had seen such a draught of fishes, nor any thing like it; they therefore could not be tempted to diminish it, as others might, by suggesting that it was accidental, and what might as well have happened at any time. It greatly corroborates the evidence of Christ's miracles, that those who were best acquainted with them, most admired them. [2.] Because they were most interested in it, and benefited by it. It was a rich booty to Peter and his part-owners; therefore it transported them, and their joy was a helper to their faith. Note, When Christ's works of wonder are, to us in particular, works of grace, then especially they command our faith in his doctrine.

(2.) Peter, above all the rest, was so astonished, that he fell down at Jesus' knees, as He sat in the stern of his boat, and said, as one in an ecstasy or transport, that knew not where he was, or what he said, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord, &c. 8. He thought himself unworthy of the favor of Christ's presence in his boat, and worthy that it should be to him a matter rather of terror than of comfort, as those who, under the Old Testament, so often said that they did exceedingly fear and quake, at the extraordinary displays of the divine glory and majesty. It was the language of Peter's humility and self-denial, not that of the devil's dialect, What have we to do with Thee, Jesus, Thou Son of God? His acknowledgment was very just, and what it becomes us all to make; I am a sinful man, O Lord. Even the best men are sinful men, and should be ready on all occasions to own it, and especially to own it to Jesus Christ; for to whom else, but to Him who came into the world to save sinners, should sinful men apply themselves? His inference was what might have been just, though really it was not so; If I be a sinful man, as indeed I am, I ought to say, Come to me, O Lord, or let me come to thee, or I am undone, forever undone. But, considering what reason sinful men have to tremble before the holy Lord God, and to dread his wrath, Peter may be well excused, if, in a sense of his own sinfulness and vileness, he cried out on a sudden, Depart from me. Note, Those whom Christ designs to a limit to the most intimate acquaintance with Him, He first makes sensible that they deserve to be set at the greatest distance from Him. We must all own ourselves sinful men, and that therefore Jesus Christ might justly depart from us; but we must therefore fall down at his knees, to pray to Him that He would not depart; for woe unto us, if He leave us.

6. The occasion which Christ took from hence to intimate to Peter, (v. 10.) and soon after to James and John, (Matt. 4: 21.) his purpose to make them his apostles, and instruments of planting his religion in the world. He said unto Simon, who was in the greatest surprise of any of them, Fear not; be not afraid that, after having done this honor, I shall never do thee more; no, from henceforth thou shalt catch men, and that shall be a greater instance of the Redeemer's power, and of his favor to thee, than this is; a more astonishing miracle, and infinitely more advantageous than this. When; by Peter's preaching, three thousand souls were, in one day, added to the church, then the type of this great draught of fishes was abundantly answered.

Lastly, The fishermen's farewell to their calling, in order to their constant attendance on Christ; (v. 11.) instead of going to seek a market for their fish, they forsook all, and followed Him, being more solicitous to serve the interests of Christ, than to advance any secular interests of their own. It is observable that they left all to follow Christ, when their calling prospered in their hands more than ever it had done, and they had had uncommon success in it. When riches increase, and we are therefore most in temptation to set our hearts on them, then to quit them for the service of Christ, this is thankworthy.

V. 12—16. Here is,

I. The cleansing of a leper, v. 12—14. This narrative we had, both in Matthew and Mark; it is here said to have been in a certain city, (v. 12.) it was in Capernaum; but the evangelist would not name it, perhaps because it was a reflection on the government of the city, that a leper was suffered to be in it. This man had leprosy in a high degree, which the more fitly represents our natural pollution by sin; we are full of that leprosy; from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot there is no soundness in us. Now let us learn here,

1. What we must do in the sense of our spiritual leprosy. We must see Jesus, acquaint ourselves with Him, and reckon the discoveries of Him by the Gospel, the most acceptable and welcome that could be made us. We must humble ourselves before Him, as this leper.

(7.) They beckoned unto their partners. Had not these been called in to assist, the net must have been broken, and all the fish lost.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

(8.) Go out from me, for I am a sinful man. [It is well known that the ancients thought it improper and unsafe (where it could be avoided) for good men to be in the same ship with persons of an infamous character; nor would the heathens sometimes permit the very images of their deities to be carried in the vessel with such, or even with those concerning whom there was any strong suspicion.] Elsner.

DODDRIDGE.

It seems to have been a received maxim among the Jews, that whoever had seen a particular manifestation of God, should speedily die. Gen. 32: 30. Ex. 24: 10, 11. 33: 20. Deut. 5: 26. Judg. 6: 21, 23. 13: 22.

(9.) Astonished. Peter seems to have been more astonished at the draught of fishes, than at the cure of the sick at Capernaum; perhaps from a notion common among the Jews, that the prayers of holy men, with imposition of hands, might have power to heal the sick, and eject evil spirits.

BLOOMFIELD.

The word astonished, in the common version, is far too weak for expressing the effect which we find this miracle produced upon Peter, and which evidently had in it more of terror than astonishment. The manner in which Peter appears to have been affected, and the extraordinary petition he presented to a Person of whose benevolence and humanity he had been so oft a witness, clearly show that he discovered in his Master, on this occasion, something superior to human, which quite overwhelmed him with awe and fear.

CAMPBELL.

(10.) Thou shalt catch men. [Not only in his parables, but in his other discourses, Jesus draws his doctrines and instructions from the scenes of nature, from the objects that surround Him, from the most common occurrences of life, from the seasons of the year, from some extraordinary incidents or remarkable transactions.] PORTERUS.

Verses 12—15.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 8: 1—4. Mark 1: 40—45.) (12.) A certain city. The confines of the city are intended, for the lepers were not suffered to live in towns. It is uncertain, whether Capernaum, or some other place in Galilee, be meant.

honor of Christ, but he must not tell it to his own honor. Those whom Christ hath healed and cleansed, must know that He hath done it in such a way, as doth forever exclude boasting. We must be very thankful, and make a grateful acknowledgment of the divine grace; Go, and offer for thy cleansing. Christ did not require him to give Him a fee, but to bring the sacrifice of praise to God; so far was He from using his power to the prejudice of the law of Moses. We must keep close to our duty. The man whom Christ had made whole, He found in the temple, John 5: 14. Those that by any affliction

We must be ashamed of our pollution, and, in the sense of it, blush to lift up our faces before the holy Jesus. We must earnestly desire to be cleansed from the defilement, and cured of the disease of sin, which renders us unfit for communion with God. We must firmly believe in Christ's ability and sufficiency to cleanse us; Lord, Thou canst make me clean; no doubt is to be made of the merit and grace of Christ. We must be importunate in prayer for pardoning mercy and renewing grace; he fell on his face and besought Him; they that would be cleansed, must reckon it a favor worth wrestling for. We must refer ourselves to the good will of Christ; Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst. This is not so much the language of diffidence, or distrust, as of submission and confidence in Christ.

2. What we may expect from Christ, if we thus apply ourselves to Him. We shall find Him very condescending, and forward to take cognizance of our case, v. 13. When Christ visited this leprosy woman, unasked, unsought unto, He showed how low He could stoop, to do good. His touching of the leper was wonderful condescension; but it is much greater to us, when He is Himself touched with the feeling of our infirmities. We shall find Him very compassionate, and ready to relieve us. He is as willing to cleanse leprosy souls, as they can be to be cleansed. We shall find Him all-sufficient, and able to heal and cleanse us, though we be ever so full of this loathsome leprosy. One word, one touch from Christ, did the business; Immediately the leprosy departed from him. If Christ saith, 'I will, be thou justified, be thou sanctified,' it is done: for He has power on earth to forgive sin, and power to give the Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. 6: 11.

3. What He requires from those that are cleansed, v. 14. We must be very humble, v. 14. He charged him to tell no man. It should seem, this did not forbid him telling it to the honor of Christ, but he must not tell it to his own honor. Those whom Christ hath healed and cleansed, must know that He hath done it in such a way, as doth forever exclude boasting. We must be very thankful, and make a grateful acknowledgment of the divine grace; Go, and offer for thy cleansing. Christ did not require him to give Him a fee, but to bring the sacrifice of praise to God; so far was He from using his power to the prejudice of the law of Moses. We must keep close to our duty. The man whom Christ had made whole, He found in the temple, John 5: 14. Those that by any affliction tion have been detained from public ordinances, when the affliction is removed, should attend on them the more diligently and more constantly.

4. Christ's public serviceableness to men, and his private communion with God; these are put together here, to give lustre to each other.

(1.) Though never any had so much pleasure in his retirements, as Christ had, yet He was much in a crowd, to do good, v. 15. Though the leper should altogether hold his peace, yet the thing could not be hid, so much the more went there a fame abroad of Him; the more He sought to conceal Himself under a veil of humility, the more notice did people take of Him; for honor is like a shadow, which flees from those that pursue it, but follows those that decline it, and draw from it. The less good men say of themselves, the more will others say of them. But Christ reckoned it a small honor to Him, that his fame went abroad; it was much more so, that hereby multitudes were brought to receive benefit by Him—both by his preaching, for they came together to hear Him; and by his miracles, they came to be healed by Him; that invited them, confirmed his doctrine, and recommended it.

(2.) Though never any did so much good in public, yet He found time for pious and devout retirements; (v. 16.) not that He needed to avoid either distraction or ostentation, but He would set us an example, who need so to order the circumstances of our devotion, as to guard against both. It is likewise our wisdom so to order our affairs, as that our public work and our secret work may not intrench upon, or interfere with, one another. Note, Secret prayer must be performed secretly; and those that have ever so much to do of the best business in this world, must keep up constant and stated times for it.

V. 17—26. Here is, I. A general account of Christ's preaching and miracles, v. 17. 1. He was teaching on a certain day, not on the sabbath-day, then he would have said so, but on a week-day; six days shalt thou labor, not only for the world, but for thy soul. Preaching and hearing the Word of God are good works, if they be done well, any day in the week. It was not in the synagogue, but in a private house; for even there, where we

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. When multitudes 'press to hear the Word of God,' it becomes expedient to exceed ordinary measures of diligence, in teaching them. On these rare and important occasions, every day is seasonable, and every place proper, for preaching the Gospel; and the common maxims, by which such matters are regulated at other times, are superseded by far more weighty considerations.—Whatever is employed in the service of Christ, becomes holy by its relation to Him, and may be sanctified to us, by being rendered subservient to his glory. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10: 29—33, v. 31. Col. 3: 16, 17.)—We are often called upon to renounce temporal advantages for his sake, but are seldom, even in these things, eventually losers by Him. Obedience to his Word, and dependence on his power and blessing, insure all desirable success, especially in the great concerns of religion. The minister, who has toiled long, under great discouragement, and with no apparent success, must not give up his hope, or cease from his labor, but at the word of his Lord 'let down the net,' again and again. Such delays sometimes lead to more signal success, by increasing humility, simplicity, and fervency in prayer; and thus the unsuccessful endeavors of many years may be amply recompensed by the blessing of God even on a single sermon! It would indeed be more encouraging to see some fruit of our labors, from time to time; and when we do not, we may well inquire, whether there be nothing in our spirit, conduct or doctrine, which prevents usefulness; and whether we use all proper means of attaining it, and use them in simple dependence on the divine blessing for success: yet the effect may at length be equally great, when we long labor, diligently and patiently, as it were in the dark. Let then the 'fishers of men' persevere in their work; let them seek the salvation of souls alone, and not court applause, or fish for honors and secular advantages; let them stand prepared to relinquish every worldly object at the call of Christ, and give themselves up wholly to their ministry; let them be helpers of each other in the work, as partners, and not rivals; and let them not fear but 'from henceforth they shall catch men.'—The more fully the Lord displays his excellent glory and majesty to us, the viler shall we appear in our own eyes: yet this should not induce us to say, 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord;' but rather to entreat Him to come, and 'dwell in our hearts by faith,' that He may transform and cleanse them. As we are all full of the leprosy of sin, we should humbly and earnestly beseech the Lord to cleanse us: nor need we fear a repulse, for to do this, is his delight and glory. Thus, being saved from the guilt and power of our sins, we may diffuse abroad his fame, and be in some measure instrumental in bringing others to hear Him, and to be healed of their infirmities.

SCOTT.

(14.) 'Let the compassionate air, with which this cure was wrought, be considered by all spiritual physicians as a lesson of condescension and tenderness; and let the modesty, with which it was conducted, engage us to avoid every appearance of ostentation and vain-glory.'

DODDRIDGE.

Verse 16.

He withdrew.] 'He was withdrawing,' or separating Himself. He frequently went aside from the multitude, into retired places, for those exercises of devotion in which his soul delighted. (Notes, 6: 12. Prov. 13: 1, 2. Mark 1: 35—39.)

SCOTT.

And prayed.] 'The more various and important our public labors are, the more evidently do we need to draw down succor by ardent prayer, that we may be strengthened and prospered in them.'

DODDRIDGE.

'We should observe what a deep, fixed, and constant piety was displayed by Christ. Not content to nourish such a feeling in his soul, He thought fit to draw it forth in actual prayer. If any one should think that outward expressions of piety are superfluous, it is enough to answer, that our blessed Lord did not so think. He had all the fulness of devotion in his soul: nevertheless, he thought it not superfluous to utter and pronounce audible prayer to God; and not only so, but to retire and withdraw Himself from other engagements, nay, even from his most intimate and favored companions, expressly for this purpose.'

Verse 17.

(Marg. Ref.) The power, &c.] 'The power of the Lord was present to heal them,' who came to be healed of their infirmities. (15.) and not the Pharisees and lawyers. So, (Ps 99: 8.) 'Thou as he was teaching, that there were Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by, which were come out of every town of Galilee, and Judea, and Jerusalem; and the power of the Lord was present to heal them.

18 And, behold, men brought in a bed a man which was taken with a palsy; and they sought means to bring him in, and to lay him before him.

19 And when they could not find by what way they might bring him in, because of the multitude, they went upon the house-top, and let him down through the tiling, with his couch, into the midst before Jesus.

20 And when he saw their faith, he said unto him, Man, thy sins are forgiven thee.

21 And the Scribes and the Pharisees began to reason, saying, Who is this which speaketh blasphemies? Who can forgive sins but God alone?

22 But when Jesus perceived their thoughts, he answering said unto them, What reason ye in your hearts?

23 Whether it is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Rise up and walk?

24 But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power upon earth to forgive sins, (he said unto the sick ordinarily converse with our friends, it is not improper to give and receive good instruction. 2. There He taught, He healed, as before; (v. 15.) and the power of the Lord was to heal them. It was mighty to do it, it was exerted and put forth, to heal, to heal them whom He taught; we may understand it so; to heal their souls, to cure them of their spiritual diseases, and to give them a new life, a new nature. Note, Those who receive the word of Christ in faith, will find a divine power going along with it, to heal them; for Christ came with his comforts to heal the broken-hearted, ch. 4: 18. The power of the Lord is present with the Word, present to those that pray for it, and submit to it, present to heal them. Or it may be meant, (and so it is generally taken,) of the healing of those who were diseased in body, who came to Him for cures. Whenever there was occasion, Christ was not to seek for his power, it was present to heal. 3. There were some grandees present, and, as it should seem, more than usual; Pharisees and doctors of the law. But as appears, (v. 21,) they were not healed, but cavilled at Christ, which forces us to exclude them; for they sat by as persons unconcerned, as if the word of Christ were nothing to them. They sat by as spectators, censors, and spies, to pick up something on which to ground a reproach or accusation. How many are there in the midst of our assemblies, to whom the Word preached is as a tale that is told! they are willing that we should preach before them, but not that we should preach to them. These Pharisees and scribes (or doctors of the law) came from all parts of the nation; it is likely, they appointed to meet at this time and place, to see what remarks they could make upon Christ, and what He said and did. They were in a confederacy, as those that said, Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah, and agree to smite him with the longue, Jer. 18: 18. Report, and we will report it, Jer. 20: 10. Observe, Christ went on with his work of preaching and healing, though He saw these Pharisees and doctors of the Jewish church sitting by, who, He knew, despised Him, and watched to insnare Him.

II. A particular account of the cure of the man sick of the palsy, which was related much as it is here by both the foregoing evangelists: let us therefore only observe in short, 1. The doctrines hereby taught and confirmed to us. (1.) That sin is the fountain of all sickness, and the forgiveness of sin is the only of the palsy,) 'I say unto thee, Arise, and take up thy couch, and go unto thine house.

25 And immediately he rose up before them, and took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his own house, glorifying God.

foundation on which a recovery from sickness can comfortably be built. They presented the sick man to Christ, and He said, 'Man, thy sins are forgiven thee; (v. 20.) that is the blessing thou art most to prize and seek; for if thy sins be forgiven thee, though the sickness be continued, it is in mercy; if they be not, though the sickness be removed, it is in wrath.' The cords of our iniquity are the bands of our affliction. (2.) That Jesus Christ has power on earth to forgive sins; of which, his healing diseases was an incontestable proof. This was the thing intended to be proved, v. 24. Christ claims one of the prerogatives of the King of kings, when He undertakes to forgive sin, and it is justly expected that He should produce a good proof of it. 'Well,' saith He, 'I will put it on this issue; here is a man struck with a palsy for his sin; if I do not, with a word's speaking, cure his disease in an instant, which cannot be done by nature or art, then say that I am not entitled to the prerogative of forgiving sin, am not the Messiah, am not the Son of God, and King of Israel: but if I do, you must own that I have power to forgive sins.' Thus it was put on a fair trial, and one word of Christ determined it. He did but say, Arise, take up thy couch, and that chronic disease had an instantaneous cure; immediately he arose before them. They must all own that there could be no cheat or fallacy in it; they that brought him could attest how perfectly lame he was before; they that saw him, could attest how perfectly well he was now; inasmuch that he had strength enough to take up and carry away the bed he lay upon. How well is it for us, that this most comfortable doctrine of the Gospel, that Jesus Christ, our Redeemer and Saviour, has power to forgive sin, has such a full attestation. (3.) That Jesus Christ is God. He appears to be so, [1.] By knowing the thoughts of the scribes and Pharisees, (v. 22) which it is God's prerogative to do; though these scribes and Pharisees knew as well how to conceal their thoughts, and keep their countenances, as most men, and probably were industrious to do it at this time, for they lay in wait secretly. [2.] By doing that which their thoughts owned none could do but God only; (v. 21.) Who can forgive sins, say they, but only God? 'I will prove,' saith Christ, 'that I can forgive sins;' and what follows then, but that He is God? What horrible wickedness then were they guilty of, who charged Him with speaking the worst of blasphemies

To guide their resolves respecting Him at the ensuing feast, in which they persecuted Him, and sought to slay Him, John 5: 16. It is very probable, that the scribes at Jerusalem, hearing how expressly He had attacked their interpretation of the law, some days before, in his celebrated sermon on the mount, (which, so far as we can learn, was the first time He did it,) might summon their brethren in the neighboring country to meet them at Capernaum, in order to attend on the next of Christ's public discourses, wherever it might happen to be."

(19.) 'From considering what is now the form of the houses in Barbary and the Levant. Dr. Shaw supposes that "the midst" signifies the courtyard round about which the house was built; and that the Lord was there. He thinks that, crowded as this area was, the bearers of the paralytic might get in at the gateway, (where perhaps Christ could neither be seen nor heard) and might carry him up the stairs, which commonly go up thence; and being got to the flat-roof, might take down inwards a part of the balustrade or parapet-wall, and so let down the bed with cords, by the side of the glazed and perhaps painted tiles, which might beautify the walls of the house towards this court. Many of his quotations from the ancients do, in a very agreeable manner, at once illustrate this account, and receive new light from it.'

It is allowable to suppose that the parapet was built solid, as is common in those flat-roofed houses, and there might have been a projection of 'tilings'—surrounding the court and forming a kind of rude portico, as may be seen in many oriental dwellings. This tiling is so simple, as to be capable of being removed and replaced again in a very few minutes, at the expense only of a little mortar, with which the semi-cylindrical tiles are secured in their places. Ed.

'Ought we not to be as tender and zealous in all the offices of the truest friendship, as were the attendants and friends of this poor paralytic; and to imitate, so far as suits the difference of circumstances, their importunate application, and their lively faith?'

26 And they were all amazed, and they glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day.

27 ¶ And after these things he went forth, and saw a publican, named Levi, sitting at the receipt of custom; and he said unto him, 'Follow me.

28 And he was left all, rose up, and followed him.

29 And Levi made him a great feast in his own house; and there was a great company of publicans, and of others, that sat down with them.

30 But their Scribes and Pharisees murmured against his disciples, saying, Why do ye eat and drink with publicans and sinners?

31 And Jesus answering, said unto them, 'They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.'

2. The duties hereby taught and recommended to us. (1.) In our applications to Christ, we must be very pressing and urgent: that is an evidence of faith, and is very pleasing to Christ, and prevailing with Him; The friends of this sick man pressed through every difficulty, till they brought him to Christ, v. 18, 19. In this, Jesus Christ saw their faith, v. 20. Now here He has taught us to put the best construction on words and actions that they will bear. When the centurion and the woman of Canaan were in no care at all to bring the patients, they interceded for, into Christ's presence, but believed that He could cure them at a distance, He commended their faith. But though in these there seemed to be a different notion of the thing, and an apprehension that it was requisite the patient should be brought into his presence, yet He did not censure and condemn their weakness, but made the best of it, and even in this saw their faith. It is a comfort to us, that we serve a Master who is willing to make the best of us. (2.) When we are sick, we should be more in care to get our sins pardoned, than to get our sickness removed. Christ, in what He said to this man, taught us, when we seek to God for health, to begin with seeking to Him for pardon. (3.) The mercies which we have the comfort of, God must have the praise of. The man departed to his own house, glorifying God, v. 25. To Him belong the escapes from death, and in them, therefore, He must be glorified. (4.) The miracles Christ wrought, were amazing to them that saw them, and we ought to glorify God in them, v. 26.

V. 27—39. All this, except the last verse, we had before in Matthew and Mark; it is an account of some of the wonders of the grace of our Lord Jesus, which, to those who understand things aright, are no less cogent proofs of his being sent of God, than the miracles He wrought in nature.

I. It was a wonder of his grace, that He

36 ¶ And he spake also a parable unto them, 'No man putteth a piece of a new garment upon an old; for otherwise, then both the new and the old, and the piece that was taken out of the new, agreeth not with the old.'

37 And no man putteth new wine into old bottles; else the new wine will burst the bottles, and be spilled, and the bottles shall perish.

38 But new wine must be put into new bottles; and both are preserved.

39 No man also, having drunk old wine, straightway desireth new; for he saith, 'The old is better.'

would call a publican from the receipt of custom, to be his disciple and follower, v. 27. It was wonderful that He would admit poor fishermen to that honor, men of the lowest rank; but much more, that He would admit publicans, men of the worst reputation; in this, Christ humbled Himself, and appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh; by this He exposed Himself, and got the invidious character of a Friend of publicans and sinners.

II. It was a wonder of his grace, that that call was made immediately effectual, v. 28. Publicans commonly had little inclination to religion, but this one for religion's sake left a good place in the custom-house, (which probably was his livelihood, and where he stood fair for better preferment,) and rose up and followed Christ. There is no heart too hard for the Spirit and grace of Christ to work upon, nor any difficulties in the way of a sinner's conversion, insuperable to his power.

III. It was a wonder of his grace, that He would not only admit a converted publican into his family, but would keep company with unconverted publicans, that He might have an opportunity of doing their souls good; He justified Himself in it, as agreeing with the great design of his coming into the world. Here is a wonder of grace indeed, that Christ undertakes to be the Physician of souls distempered by sin, and ready to die of the distemper; (v. 31.) that He has a particular regard to sick sinners as his patients, convinced, awakened sinners, that see their need of the Physician; that He came, to call sinners, the worst of sinners, to repentance, and to assure them of pardon, upon repentance, v. 32. This is glad tidings of great joy indeed.

IV. It was a wonder of his grace, that He did so patiently bear the contradiction of sinners against Himself and his disciples, v. 30. He did not express his resentments of the cavils of the scribes and Pharisees, as He justly might have done, but answered them with reason and meekness; and, took that occasion to show his

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—32. In tracing the example of our divine Savior, we find that He interchanged public services and retired devotion; and that the sole business of his life was to glorify God by doing good to men, and to commune with his Father. Thus our several duties should in succession occupy our time, and piety and charity be connected in all our conduct. A life thus spent will best manifest our faith in Christ, and evince that He has both pardoned our sins and healed our souls. When believers thus copy their Lord's example, they will effectually confute the malicious cavils and perverse reasonings of opposers: and, being enabled by divine grace to delight in the holy service of God, which no man by nature can do, they will not only glorify Him themselves, but excite others to do the same. Indeed, when, through 'the power of the Lord,' the avaricious are induced to forego their unlawful, lucrative employments, and the profligate to live sober, godly lives; mere spectators must sometimes be astonished, and allow that they have witnessed 'strange things,' which they did not expect, and cannot account for.—As Jesus 'came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance,' we too should be ready to go among them, as far as we have a prospect of doing them good; and especially to direct them to the only Physician of distempered souls; and if we well know our own sinfulness, and the power and grace of the divine Redeemer, we shall not disdain or despair of any.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 33-39. Let all, who would prosper in the divine life, attend chiefly to the grand essentials of religion; for when externals and circumstantialia are magnified above their real importance, censoriousness, bigotry and divisions are the inevitable consequences.—Because humble Christians practise their self-denial, and perform their devotions, in secret, and without ostentation, Pharisees may sometimes be ready to conclude that they neither fast nor pray at all. But every part of our duty has its proper season and proportion, as stated in the Scriptures; and it should have the same in the conduct of our lives: the gracious presence of our Beloved makes a feast to our souls, so long as it is continued to us; but when our sins provoke his departure or his frown, we are called to mourn nies of Taitan and Ammonius very justly separated between this feast and the calling of Matthew. And to the many convincing arguments of Mr. Jones, to prove that they ought to be separated, I will add, that to me it seems very evident they were not both on the same day, from this consideration, so many things happened before the calling of Matthew, that the day must be far advanced, and there could not have been time to prepare a great feast, and invite a number of guests, at least, till supper: and so many things happened after the feast, that we cannot suppose them to have been crowded into the little remainder of the evening after supper; on which account it is certain the feast was after the day of his calling, perhaps some months after.

(30.) Their scribes, &c. 'That is, the scribes of that place, viz. the Capernaumites or Galileans.'

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 9: 14-17. Mark 2: 18-22.) (36-38.) No man, &c. Perhaps the impropriety of attempting a coalition between the religion of the Pharisees, and even that of John's disciples, when they did not become the disciples of Jesus, may be meant. True religion has been for substance the same, since the revelation of a Savior to fallen man. Even the ritual law, and the whole Mosaic dispensation, was intended to answer special purposes only for a season. (Notes, Rom. 5: 20, 21. Gal. 3: 19-22.) and the traditions of the elders, with the ceremonies of the law, and many uncommanded plausible austerities, formed the religion of the strictest sect of the Jews, in our Lord's days, to which many of John's disciples, (as distinct from Christ's) seem in great measure to have conformed. But Jesus came, to introduce another and better dispensation, than even that of Moses, which was 'waxing old and ready to vanish away,' (Notes, Heb. 8: 8-13, v. 13.) as well as to vindicate the moral law from the corrupt glosses and traditions of the Pharisees. He would not, therefore, allow his disciples to attempt a coalition between his religion and that of the Pharisees. Fasting, as far as obligatory and useful, would form a part of the new dispensation, and not be discredited by the superstition, hypocrisy, and spiritual pride, which then attended it. But, as things were at that time, it would be as absurd to retain any part of the old system, and to graft Christianity upon it, as to put new undressed cloth on an old, worn-out garment; or new fermenting wine, into old leather-bottles. Thus the Jews, 'going about to establish their own righteousness,' and to shore up the old building by props and buttresses, refused to build on the Foundation which God Himself had laid. (Note, Rom. 10: 1-4.) This attempt at a coalition between the old and new dispensations, or rather between the religion of the Pharisees and that of Jesus, was the grand fault of the Judaizing teachers of Christianity, against whom Paul as zealously contended, especially in his epistle to the Galatians. They wanted to mend the pharisaical religion, which was as an old, worn-out garment, with the Gospel; and to out of Egypt, He would not bring them by the way of the Philistines, lest they should repent, when they saw war, and return into Egypt. Exod. 13: 17. So Christ would train up his followers gradually to discipline; for no man having drunk old wine, will of a sudden straightway desire new, or relish it, but will say, The old is better, because he has been used to it, v. 39. The disciples will be tempted to think their old way of living better, till they are by degrees trained up to this way whereunto they are called. Or, turn it the other way. Let them be accustomed a while to religious exercises, and then they will abound in them as much as you do; but we must not be too hasty with them. Calvin takes it as an admonition to the Pharisees, not to boast of their fasting, nor to despise his disciples because they did not in like manner signalize themselves; for the profession of the Pharisee was indeed pompous and gay, like new wine, that is brisk and sparkling, whereas all wise men say, The old is better; which, though it doth not give its color so well in the cup, yet is more warming in the stomach, and more wholesome. Christ's disciples, though they had not so much of the form of godliness, had more of the power of it.

CHAP. VI. v. 1-11. In this chapter, we have Christ's exposition of the moral law, which He came not to destroy, but to fulfil, and to fill up by his Gospel.

These two passages of story we had both in Matthew and Mark, and they were there laid and fast; as well as pray. The Lord, however, trains up his people gradually for the trials and hardships allotted them; and, in perfect wisdom and tenderness, He proportions their services to their strength: we should therefore copy his example, in dealing with the weak in faith, the young convert, or the tempted, discouraged believer.—Those who have been used to divine consolations, and a close walk with God, have not only lost their relish for earthly joys, but will not easily be brought to attend to those novel inventions and human additions to religion, which, though ostentatious and showy, are far less valuable and satisfactory, than a life of humble faith, and devoted obedience to the commandments of our Lord and Savior.

put the new wine of the Gospel into the old bottles, of the antiquated ceremonies of the Mosaic law, and the traditions of the elders. (36.) No man putteth, &c. 'In the exposition of an allegory, the nature of the thing spoken of is to be considered, in order that the tendency of every comparison may appear, and also the literal meaning which is concealed under the figurative expressions. Nothing is added here by way of explanation; the Pharisees had asked (v. 33.) why Christ's disciples did not fast, but lived more cheerfully than those of John. Our Savior replied in the words of this verse, "No man," &c. Nothing, then, can lead us to understand the passage but the nature of the subject. Now in common life no one voluntarily and readily acts indiscreetly, or in an unbecoming manner. Therefore, says Christ, since no one in common life acts thus indiscreetly, neither do I require my disciples to do so. The time will come (v. 35.) when they will fare hardly enough. At present, neither circumstances, time, nor place, require it; things must be accommodated to circumstances. The passage being thus considered, the meaning of the allegory becomes very evident.'

HORNE.

'By this proverb Christ would signify that men are not suddenly to be brought to a more strict code of life, but are to become accustomed to it gradually; which idea is here accommodated to the case in hand. For the austerity of the Pharisees is compared to new wine, and the gentle mildness of Christ to old wine.'

ROESEN

As old wine is preferable to new, and those who have been used to the former cannot readily relish the latter; so the substantial of religion, which have been the same, from the first, are far more valuable than the peculiarities of any party, or even than the ceremonial observances of the Mosaic law; and they who have been habitually conversant with the former, will not easily be brought to pay great regard to the latter; but will deem repentance, faith, and holiness far preferable to them all. The Christian dispensation was new, compared with the Mosaic covenant; yet the religion contained in it is as old wine, it is that of Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, &c. with only circumstantial variations. (Notes, Heb. 11.) The verse, however, is generally explained to mean, that men cannot at once change their modes and habits of life, but must gradually be inured to those kinds and degrees of self-denial, which are not immediately necessary; and therefore Jesus did not think proper to impose such austerities on his disciples at once, but gradually to train them up to self-denial, hardship, and suffering.

together; (Matt. 12: 1. Mark 2: 23. 3: 1.) because though happening at some distance of time from each other, both were designed to rectify the mistakes of the scribes and Pharisees concerning the sabbath day, on the bodily rest of which they laid greater stress, and required greater strictness, than the Lawgiver intended. Here,

1. Christ justifies his disciples in a work of necessity for themselves on that day, namely, plucking the ears of corn, when they were hungry. This story here has a date, which we had not in the other evangelists; it was on the second Sabbath after the first, (v. 1.) that is, as Dr. Whithy thinks pretty clear, the first Sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread, from which day they reckoned the seven weeks to the feast of pentecost. Whether this circumstance be mentioned, to intimate that this Sabbath was thought to have some peculiar honor, which aggravated the offence of the disciples, or only to intimate that, being the first Sabbath after the offering of the first fruits, it was the time of the year when the corn was near ripe, is not material. We may observe,

1. Christ's disciples ought not to be nice and curious in their diet, at any time, especially on sabbath-days, but to take up with what is easiest got, and be thankful. These disciples plucked the ears of corn, and did eat; (v. 1.) a little served them, and that which had no delicacy in it.

2. Many that are themselves guilty of the greatest crimes, are forward to censure others for the most innocent and inoffensive actions; v. 2. The Pharisees quarrelled with them as doing that which was not lawful to do on the sabbath-days, when it was their own practice to feed deliciously on sabbath-days, more than on all other days.

3. Jesus Christ will justify his disciples when they are unjustly censured, and will own and accept of them in many a thing, which men tell them it is not lawful for them to do. How well it is for us, that men are not to be our judges, and that Christ will be our Advocate!

4. Ceremonial appointments may be dispensed with, in cases of necessity; as was the appropriating of the shew-bread to the priests, when David was by Providence brought into such a strait, that he must have either that or none, v. 3, 4. And if God's own appointments might he thus set aside for a greater good, much more may the traditions of men.

5. Works of necessity are particularly allowable on the sabbath-day; but we must take heed that we turn not this liberty into licentiousness, and to the prejudice of the work of the day.

6. Jesus Christ, though He allowed works of necessity on the sabbath-day, will have us to know and remember that it is his day, and therefore is to be spent in his service, and to his honor; v. 5. The Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath. In the kingdom of the Redeemer, the sabbath-day is to be turned into a Lord's day; the property of it is, in some respects, to be altered, and it is to be observed chiefly in honor of the Redeemer, as it had been before in honor of the Creator; (Jer. 16: 14, 15.) in token of this, it shall not only have a new name, the Lord's day, (yet not forgetting the old, for it is a Sabbath of rest still,) but shall be transferred to a new day, the first day of the week.

II. He justifies Himself in doing works of mercy for others on the sabbath-day. Observe in this,

1. Christ on the sabbath-day entered into the synagogue. Note, 'It is our duty, as we have opportunity, to sanctify Sabbaths in religious assemblies. On the Sabbath there ought to be a holy convocation; and our place must not be empty without very good reason.

2. In the synagogue, on the sabbath-day, He taught. Giving and receiving instruction from Christ is very proper work for a sabbath-day, and for a synagogue. Christ took all opportunities to teach, not only his disciples, but ^e a multitude.

3. Christ's patient was one of his hearers: (v. 6.) whether he had any expectation to be healed, does not appear. But those that would be cured by the grace of Christ, must be willing to learn the doctrine of Christ.

4. There were some who came with no other design than to pick quarrels with Him, v. 7. The scribes and Pharisees would not, as became generous adversaries, give Him fair warning, tions; and it is unfit that his religion should be burthened with them. He suits the duties of his people to their circumstances, and kindly proportions their work to their strength, with a tender regard to their weakness, till by degrees they may be fitted for the more difficult and humbling services. From his example, and the whole genius of his Gospel, let us learn to make all proper allowances to those about us, that we may let them, and train them up as they are able to bear it; not crushing them under any unnecessary load, nor denying them any indulgence which true friendship will permit us to grant them; lest the good ways of God should be misrepresented, disgraced and abandoned through our imprudent, though well-meaning severity: a caution to be peculiarly observed in our conduct towards young persons; and not to be forgotten with respect to those who, like the disciples here in question, are training up for the ministerial office.' Doddridge.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. v. 1. Second Sabbath, &c. Some render the original words, 'the second prime sabbath'; supposing that the day of Pentecost was meant, and that it fell on the sabbath-day. The three great feasts were, in many respects, observed as sabbaths; (Marg. Ref. a.) for the first day of unleavened bread began in the evening, after the close of the fourteenth day of the first month, about the time when the passover was eaten. (Notes, Ex. 12: 15-20.) But when either the first day of unleavened bread, or the day of Pentecost, or the first day of the feast of tabernacles, fell on a sabbath, it was reckoned peculiarly sacred. When the first day of unleavened bread fell thus, it was called 'the first prime sabbath'; the Pentecost falling thus, was called 'the second prime sabbath'; and the first day of the feast of tabernacles, in this case, was called 'the third prime sabbath.' This is the opinion of Grotius, Hammond, and many learned expositors. But others render the words, 'The first sabbath, after the second day of unleavened bread.' From this day seven weeks were numbered, and then the Pentecost, or the feast of weeks, was observed. Epiphanius expressly says, our Lord's disciples did this, on the sabbath following the first day of unleavened bread.' Whithy. If this interpretation be adopted, the ears of corn plucked by the disciples must have been barley; for the wheat was not ripe till some time after. And, though the offering of wave-loaves, for the first-fruits, at the feast of Pentecost, (Note, Lev. 23: 15-21.) shows that some of the harvest was then gathered in; yet it does not follow, but that some might remain in the fields, unreaped, at the same time. It should be observed, that in case there was no likelihood of any barley being fit to cut, at the time when the passover was celebrated, otherwise have been celebrated; a moon, or month, was intercalated, and so the beginning of the first month was fixed to the subsequent new moon; and by the passover all the other feasts were regulated. These are the most probable opinions on this subject, which is essentially of greater difficulty than importance. Scott.

Second Sabbath after the first. 'Among the different explanations given of this term, [the original Greek word,] I find nothing but conjecture, and therefore think it the safest way to render the word by one similarly formed in our language. second prime—on the sabbath called second prime. This is what all the best translators have given in Latin. In the Syriac there is no word answering to it. The common version has, in this instance, neither followed the letter, nor given us words which convey any determinate sense.' CAMPBELL.

'The first Sabbath after the second day of unleavened bread.'] So I venture to render the [original] word used by Luke; yet not without much hesitation; for it is so singular an expression, that I despair of seeing its sense exactly ascertained.' DODDRIDGE.

Second, first. It is worthy of remark that the sabbath, which is thus named in Luke 6: 1 is called in Matt. 12: 1, and in Mark 2: 23, simply the sabbath. What this second first sabbath is, is somewhat difficult to be explained. The majority of critics suppose it was that which immediately succeeded the second day of the passover. For, since the Jews numbered their days from the passover to the Pentecost, (Deut. 16: 9.) the first sabbath after the second day from the passover seems to have been properly enough termed the second-first. VERSES 2-11.

(4.) The high priest. 'If our present reading (which Beza suspects, though older than the Syriac version) be allowed as genuine, here is a remarkable instance of a person being designated by an office which he did not bear till after the date of the event referred to: in like manner as Cyrenius (Luke 2: 2.) is called governor of Syria, because he was so after the enrolment. It seems indeed that Ahimelech was high priest when David took the shew-bread, &c. &c. all the story he is only called the priest; and as it is merely an arbitrary supposition that the father was sometimes called Ahithair, or the son Ahimelech, it seems impossible to defend the received reading, otherwise than, by supposing, with Grotius, that as Ahithair was a much more celebrated person than his father, our Lord mentions his name in preference to the other. He was probably present, and for any thing we certainly know, his aged father might act by his advice in the affair referred to, to which if he did, it was exceedingly proper to mention him first.' DODDRIDGE.

(5.) Is Lord also of the Sabbath. 'This certainly implies, that the Sabbath was an institution of great and distinguished importance; and may perhaps also refer to the signal authority which Christ, by the ministry of his apostles, should exert over it, in changing it from the seventh to the first day of the week.' SCOTT.

3 ¶ And ¹ it came to pass also on another sabbath, that ² he entered into the synagogue and taught: ³ and there was a man whose right hand was withered.

7 And the Scribes and Pharisees ¹ watched him, whether he would heal on the sabbath-day: ² that they might find an accusation against him.

8 But ¹ he knew their thoughts, and said to the man which had the withered hand, ² Rise up, and stand forth in the midst. And he arose, and stood forth.

9 Then said Jesus unto them, I will ask you one thing; ¹ Is it lawful on the sabbath-days to do good, or to do evil; ² to save life or to destroy it?

10 And, ¹ looking round about upon them all, he said unto the man, ² Stretch forth thy hand. And he did so: and his hand was restored whole as the other.

11 And ¹ they were filled with madness; ² and communed one with another what they might do to Jesus.

12 ¶ And it came to pass in those days, ¹ that he went out into a mountain to pray, and ² continued all night in prayer to God.

13 And ¹ when it was day, he called unto him his disciples: and of them he chose ² twelve, whom also he named ³ apostles:

ther, if He did heal on the sabbath-day, they would construe it into a violation of the fourth commandment, which they ought in honor and justice to have done, because it was a case without precedent, (none having ever cured as He did,) and therefore could not be an adjudged case; but they basely watched him, as the lion does his prey, whether He would heal on the sabbath-day, that they might find an accusation against Him, and surprise Him with a prosecution.

5. That Jesus Christ was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the purposes of his grace, in the face of those who, He knew, confronted them, v. 8. He knew their thoughts, and what they designed, and He bid the man rise, and stand forth, hereby to try the patient's faith and boldness.

6. He appealed to his adversaries themselves, and to the conviction of natural conscience, whether it was the design of the fourth commandment to restrain men from doing good on the sabbath-day, which they have an opportunity for, and which cannot so well be put off to another time; v. 9. No wicked men are such absurd and unreasonable men as persecutors are, who study to do evil to men for doing good.

7. He healed the poor man, with a word's speaking, though He knew that his enemies would not only take offence at it, but take advantage against Him for it, v. 10. Let not we be drawn off, either from our duty or from our usefulness, by the oppression we meet with in it.

8. His adversaries were hereby enraged so much the more against Him, v. 11. Instead of being convinced by this miracle, as they ought to have been, that He was a Teacher come from God instead of being brought to love Him as a Benefactor to mankind, they were filled with madness, vexed that they could not frighten Him from doing good, or hinder the growth of his interest in the affections of the people. They were mad at Christ, mad at the people, mad at themselves. Anger is a short madness, malice a long one; impotent malice, especially, disappointed malice; such was theirs. When they could not prevent his working this miracle, they communed one with another what other way they might take to run him down. We may well stand amazed, that men should be so wicked as to do this, and that the Son of God should be so patient as to suffer it.

V. 12—19. In these verses we have our Lord Jesus in secret, in his family, and in public; and in all three acting like Himself.

I. In secret, we have Him praying to God, v. 12. This evangelist takes frequent notice of Christ's retirements, to give us an example of secret prayer, by which we must keep up our communion with God daily, and without which it is impossible that the soul should prosper. In those days, when his enemies were filled with madness against Him, and were contriving what to do to Him, He went out to pray; tho' He might answer the type of David, (Ps. 109: 4.) For my love they are my adversaries, but I give myself unto prayer. Observe, 1. He was alone with God; He went out into a mountain to pray, where He might have no disturbance or interruption given Him. Whether there was any convenient place built on this mountain, for devout people to retire to for their private devotions, as some think, to me seems very uncertain. He went into a mountain, for privacy, and therefore, probably, would not go to a place frequented by others. 2. He was long alone with God; He continued all night in prayer. We think one half hour a great deal to spend in the duties of the closet; but Christ continued a whole night in meditation and secret prayer. We have a great deal of business at the throne of grace, and we should take a great delight in communion with God, and by both those may be kept sometimes long at prayer.

II. In his family, we have Him nominating his immediate attendants, that should be his constant auditors and witnesses, hereafter to be sent forth as apostles, his messengers to the world, to preach his Gospel, and plant his church, v. 13. After He had continued all night in prayer, one would think, when it was day, He would have reposed Himself, and got some sleep. No, as soon as any body was stirring, He called unto Him his disciples. In serving God, our great care should be, not to lose time, but to make the end of one good duty the beginning of another. Ministers are to be ordained with prayer more than ordinarily solemn. The number of the apostles was twelve; it is the third time we have met with them, and in each of the three places, the order of their names differs, to teach both ministers and Christians not to be nice in giving, much less in taking precedence; but, looking on it as a thing not worth taking notice of, let it be as it lights. He that in Mark was called Thaddeus, in Matthew, Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus, is here called Judas the brother, James, the same that wrote the Epistle of Jude. Simon, who in Matthew and Mark was called the Canaanite, is here called Simon Zelotes, perhaps for his great zeal in religion. Concerning the twelve here named, we have reason to say, as the queen of Sheba did of Solomon's servants, Happy are they men, and happy are these thy servants, that stand continually before Thee, and hear thy wisdom; never were men so privileged, and yet one of them had a devil, and proved a traitor; (v. 16.) nor

(11.) They were filled with madness. 'The malice of the Pharisees did not restrain the benevolence of our compassionate Savior, nor deprive the poor patient of his cure. Such let our conduct be! Let us not be overcome of evil; let not the most unjust censures, or the most malicious opposition break our spirits, so as to prevent us from doing our duty. If others are mad with persecuting rage, let us pity them; and let all their fury against the cause of God be improved as a motive to excite our most zealous and courageous endeavors for its service.'

Doddridge.
'Pride, obstinacy, and interest, combined together, are capable of any thing. When men have once framed their conscience according to their passions, madness passes for zeal, the blackest conspiracies for pious designs, and the most horrid attempts for heroic actions.'

Quesnel, in CLARKE.

Verse 12.

Our Lord spent the whole night, preceding the appointment of his apostles, alone upon a mountain, 'in prayer to God.' Some think, that the original words signify 'an oratory of God,' or small 'rudding erected for retirement and devotion; and the construction of the original best suits that rendering. Jesus, however, doubtless was engaged in prayer: during the whole night, whilst his disciples seem to have gone to their rest as usual. 'Christ, by choosing his twelve apostles, not without long and fervent prayer, shows what piety is needful in ecclesiastical elections, or in the choice and ordination of ministers.' Beza. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Acts 13: 1—3. 1 Tim. 5: 21, 22, 24, 25.)

Scott.

In prayer to God.] Or, as many critics would say,—in the prayer of God, i. e. very earnest, importunate prayer; or—in the oratory of God, i. e. a place for private worship, distinct from the synagogue, and more ancient: of which, (according to some—though others are of a different opinion.) there were many, both before and after the Babylonish captivity, and especially in the time of Christ. For interpreting the passage in this way, Dr. Whitby assigns as a general reason, what may be considered the idiom of the Hebrew language in relation to such phrases as the mountains of God, the sacrifices of God, &c.; according to which, it may have either of the constructions above given. The word translated, continued all night, may signify, to lodge in a place, for a night, but is used also to signify, to pass the night in a particular state. Kypke (in Clarke) concludes, by translating the passage thus: 'He passed the night without sleep in prayer to God.' Doddridge, Campbell, Horne, and Dr. A. Clarke.

III. In public, we have Him preaching and healing, the two great works between which He divided his time, v. 17. He came down with the twelve from the mountain, ready to receive those that resorted to Him; and there presently gathered about Him, not only the company of his disciples, who used to attend Him, but also a great, a mixed multitude out of all Judea and Jerusalem; though it was some scores of miles from Jerusalem to that place of Galilee where Christ now was; and they had there abundance of famous rabbins, that had great names, and bore a mighty sway, yet they came to hear Christ. They came also from the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon; though they who lived there, were generally men of business, and bordered on Canaanites, yet here were some well affected to Christ; such there were dispersed in all parts.

1. They came to hear Him; and He preached to them. Those that have not good preaching near them, had better travel far for it than be without it. It is worth while to go a great way, to hear the word of Christ, and to go out of the way of other business for it.

2. They came to be cured by Him, and He healed them. Some were troubled in body, and some in mind; some had diseases, some had devils; but both, on application to Christ, were healed, for He has power over diseases and devils, (v. 17, 18), over effects and causes. Nay, the whole multitude sought to touch Him, (v. 19), those that were in health as well as those that were sick, and they were all, one way or other,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19. The Lord Jesus will vindicate his disciples against the accusations of their enemies, but He will not allow them to neglect his ordinances and commandments: yet how often do nominal Christians take occasion, from his allowance on the Sabbath of works of necessity and mercy, to spend this holy day in sloth, indulgence, worldly employments, or vain company and dissipation! (Notes, Ex. 20:8—10. Is. 53:13, 14.) This, however, neither consists with his authority and glory, as 'the Lord of the Sabbath,' nor with the real good of man, for whose advantage it was instituted. Let us then, on that day, follow our Savior to the places of public worship; or rather, let us meet Him in his house and at his table; (Matt. 18:19, 20.) and imitate Him, in devoting it to the various duties of piety and charity, to the care of our own souls, and the preservation of the lives, or the alleviation of the miseries, of our brethren around us. And if the enemies of true religion consult to injure us, let us retire and give ourselves up to fervent prayer, according to the difficulty and importance of our work and station.—Serious consideration and earnest prayer should precede the appointment of men to the sacred ministry: and all concerned in so momentous a work, should observe and copy the example of Christ, when He ordained his apostles.

Those, who have thoughts of being thus employed, should retire seriously to examine their motives, and to seek the divine direction, assistance and blessing; and all Christians should join in prayer 'to the Lord of the harvest, that He would send forth laborers into his harvest,' and that there may no more be any covetous, treacherous Judas, among those who sustain that sacred character. But at how great a distance do the disciples follow their Lord! Thousands of the votaries of pleasure frequently pass whole nights in the pursuit of it: but how rare for a Christian, or a minister, even in the most important and arduous circumstances, to devote a single night to retired prayer and supplication, or even to abridge himself of any considerable measure of his sleep for that purpose!—Men regard the diseases of their bodies as greater evils than those of their souls; but the Scripture teaches us to form a contrary judgment: for could we from Jesus obtain the most perfect cure of every disease, and secure the greatest degree of health and long life; without deliverance from sin, by the efficacy of his blood, and the energy which proceeds from Him, we must be miserable to all eternity. Yet how few, in proportion, earnestly apply to Him for this inestimable benefit! (P. O. Matt. 9:1—8.)

SCOTT.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 10:1—4. Mark 3:13—19.) SCOTT. (15.) Zelotes. 'Some Jews gave this name to themselves, according to Josephus, because they pretended to be more than ordinarily zealous for religion, and yet practised the very worst of actions.' 'But this, (says the judicious Bp. Pearce), Josephus says of the zealots, at the time when Vespasian was marching towards Jerusalem. They probably were men of a different character above forty years before; which was the time when Jesus chose his twelve apostles, one of whom had the surname of the Zealot.' It is very probable, that this name was first given to certain persons who were more zealous for the cause of pure and undefiled religion than the rest of their neighbors; but, like many other sects and parties who have begun well, they transferred their zeal for the essentials of religion, to non-essential things, and from these to inquisitorial cruelty and murder. See on Matt. 10:4.

Verses 17—19

(Marg. Ref.) (19.) Virtue. Or, power. The word commonly rendered virtue, does not occur in the gospels, or in the Acts of the Apostles; but only, Phil. 4:8. 1 Pet. 2:9. 2 Pet. 1:3, 5. SCOTT. (18.) Unclean spirits. 'It seems to me an excessive refinement in the learned editors of the Prussian Testament, to distinguish unclean spirits from other evil spirits which might possess men; supposing the word only to signify such kind of spirits as drove men to dwell among the tombs, by which they became ceremonially unclean.' See the notes on Matt. 12:43. 'It is evident, unclean and evil' spirits are generally used as nearly synonymous terms, referring to the moral impurity and malignity of their natures. Compare Matt. 12:43. Luke 11:24. and Rev. 16:13, 14. DODDRIIDGE.

'The question here raised by interpreters, whether this sermon be the same which we find mentioned Luke the sixth, or only like a sermon spoken at another time and place, is of some concern for the right understanding of the words; for if the sermon be the same in both gospels, and it were spoken only once by Christ, though it be set down twice by the evangelists: the words of one evangelist must be interpreted in a sense agreeable to the other, or else they cannot both be true. Whereas, if our Lord spake the words recorded by Luke, at any other time and place, than the discourse related by Matthew was delivered at, we may give different interpretations to their words; and that this was so, seems highly probable. 1. Because Luke omits as many things recorded by Matthew, as parts of this discourse, viz. from the thirteenth to the thirty-ninth verse of the fifth chapter; all the sixth chapter; and from the sixth to the sixteenth verse of the seventh chapter; that is, the greatest part of this sermon; and also added many woes. 2. Matthew sufficiently informs us, that his sermon was delivered before the healing of the leper; for 'as Christ came down from the mount, the leper came to Him;' (Matt. 8:2.) where as Luke gives us the story of the leper first, and the history of Christ's sermon after. Again, Luke reckons Matthew among those whom Christ had chosen to be of the twelve; and (17.) adds, that Christ was down with them, and preached the following sermon: whereas the words ciples, and said 'Blessed be ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God.'

21 Blessed are ye that hunger now; for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that weep now; for ye shall laugh.

22 Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and to expect any worldly preferment in my service; you must work hard, and fare hard, as poor people do; but you are blessed in your poverty, it shall be no prejudice to your happiness; nay, you are blessed for it, all your losses shall be abundantly made up to you, for yours is the kingdom of God; all the comforts and graces of his kingdom here—all the glories and joys of his kingdom hereafter; yours it shall be, nay, yours it is.' Christ's poor are rich in faith, Jan. 2: 5.

2. 'You hunger now; (v. 21.) you are not fed to the full as others are—your commons are so short; or you are so intent on your work, that you have no time to eat bread, you are glad of a few ears of corn, for a meal's meat; thus you hunger now in this world, but in the other world you shall be filled, shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more.'

3. 'You weep now, are often in tears, tears of repentance, tears of sympathy; you are of them that mourn in Zion. But blessed are you; your present sorrows are but preparatories for your future joy; you shall laugh. You have triumphs in reserve; you are but sowing in tears, shortly to reap in joy,' Ps. 126: 5, 6. They that now sorrow after a godly sort, are treasuring up comforts for themselves, or, rather, God is treasuring up comforts for them; and the day is coming, when their mouth shall be filled with laughing, and their lips with rejoicing, Job 8: 21.

4. 'You must undergo the world's ill-will; you must expect all the base treatment that a spiteful world can give you for Christ's sake; you must expect that wicked men will hate you, because your doctrine and life convict and condemn them; and those that have church-power will separate you, will force you to separate yourselves, and then excommunicate you for so doing, and lay you under the most ignominious censures, will pronounce anathemas against you, as scandalous and incorrigible offenders; they will do this with all possible gravity and solemnity, and the pomp and pageantry of appeals to heaven, to make the world believe, and alarm you yourselves too, that it is ratified in heaven thus will they endeavor to make you odious to others, and a terror to yourselves.' This is supposed to be the proper notion of, They shall cast you out of their synagogues. 'And they that have not this power, will not fail to show their malice, to the utmost of their power; for they will reproach you, will charge you with the blackest crimes, which you are perfectly innocent of, will fasten on you the blackest characters, which you do not deserve; they will cast out your name as evil, your name as Christians, as apostles; they will do all they can to render these names odious.' This is the application of the eighth beatitude, Matt. 5: 10–12.

'Such usage as this seems hard; but blessed are you when so used; so far from depriving you of your happiness, it will greatly add to it; it is an honor to you; therefore rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy, v. 23. Not only bear it, but triumph in it. 'You are hereby highly dignified in the kingdom of grace; you are treated as the prophets were before you; therefore you not only need not be ashamed of it, but may justly rejoice in it, for it will be an evidence that you walk in the same spirit, and in the same steps, are engaged in the same cause, and employed in the same service, with them.' 'You will for this be abundantly recompensed in the kingdom of glory; not only your services for Christ, but your sufferings will come into the account; Your reward is great in heaven. Venture on your sufferings, in a full belief that the glory of heaven will abundantly counterbalance all these hardships; so that, though you may be losers for Christ, you shall not be losers by Him in the end.'

II. Woes denounced against prospering sinners as miserable people, though the world envies them. These we had not in Matthew. It should seem, the best exposition of these woes, compared with the foregoing blessings, is the

'mentioned by Matthew was preached long before his calling to be one of Christ's disciples. Lastly, Matthew's sermon was preached on the mount by our Lord, calling his disciples up to Him; whereas Luke informs us, that our Lord came down with his disciples from a mount, and stood in the plain, and from thence preached what he recorded, 'Whitby on Matt. 5: 1. 'Here being but four of the eight beatitudes mentioned, (Matt. 5: 1–13.) and not one of these being delivered in the same words which are there used; as it is certain this must be another sermon than that on the mount, and spoken to other auditors; so it is only probable, not necessary, that they should bear the same name.' 'Whitby's ninth, tenth, and forty-fifth verses are not found in the sermon on the mount, but for substance in other parts of Matthew's gospel. (Notes, 39, 40, 43–45.) Some however think, that the circumstance of a plain being here mentioned, and a mountain by Matthew, is not of much weight; 'our Lord, say they, might come down from the mountain with his disciples, and finding a large multitude assembled in the plain, He might re-ascend the mountain so far, as to be placed advantageously for being heard by the people, and his disciples might go and seat themselves around Him. Both the evangelists agree that a mountain was near; both agree, that Christ had been healing considerable numbers, just before He delivered this discourse. Luke says, He had been praying all night in the mountain; we may naturally suppose, in the higher and more retired part of it; that He then came down, and healed the numerous afflicted persons; and that seeing the multitudes, He proceeded to teach them. And after both sermons, we find Him entering into Capernaum, and healing the centurion's servant.' Thus different persons view the subject very differently; but the circumstance of Matthew's gospel recording the sermon on the mount, not only before his own appointment to the apostolic office, but before he relates how he was called from the receipt of custom to follow Christ, seems of great weight; and several passages appear to require so different an interpretation from that which has been given of what are thought parallel passages in Matthew, that I scarcely know how to expound them, without adopting Dr. Whitby's conclusion; though I would by no means be confident in so controverted a point. It seems probable, that the sermon recorded by Luke, being delivered at another time, and to another audience, than the sermon on the mount, our Lord saw good to inculcate the same general and important truths, with such variations, as his perfect knowledge of his hearers required.

Blessed, &c.] (Note, Matt. 5: 3.) 'Christ teaches, against all the philosophers, especially the Epicureans, that the chief felicity of man is laid up no where on earth, but in heaven; and that persecution for righteousness' sake, is the way by which we must attain to it.' Beza. All the true disciples of Christ are 'poor in spirit: most of them are the poor of this world;' and many become poor by forsaking all for the sake and Gospel, or parting with all from zeal for his glory; but though He knows their poverty, he declares 'that they are rich,' 'having nothing, and yet possessing all things;' 'poor, yet making many rich' (2 Cor. 6: 3–10, v. 10.) Poverty indeed has advantages in respect of religion; but the blessing here pronounced, belongs to the poor persons, except those who are Christ's true disciples, and 'heirs of the kingdom, which God hath prepared for them that love Him.' (Note, Jan. 2: 5–7.) Voluntary poverty, without any call to it, is no where commanded; and it has generally been a self-righteous rival to true Christianity, and cannot here be intended. (Marg. Ref. 3, a.) It was peculiarly proper, that a special blessing should be pronounced on poor disciples, who have many trials to endure; but the rich, if 'poor in spirit' and crucified to the world, are not excluded from it. (Jan. 1: 9–11.)

(20.) 'Hardly any thing that I have observed in the common harmonies surprises me more, than that so many of them make this discourse to be the very sermon on the mount, recorded at large by Matthew in his fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters. This was delivered by Christ, sitting on a mountain; (Matt. 5: 1.) this, (as it seems from v. 17.) standing in a plain; and, which weighs yet much more with me, there is such a difference in the expression, when the parallel passages come to be compared, that it seems evident, the evangelists have not related it exactly, if they meant to give us the same.'

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 5: 4, 6, 10–12.) It is probable, that many present were kept at a great distance from their necessary food, by attention on our Lord's instructions: and thus their natural hunger might be the effect of their 'hungering after righteousness,' which would insure their being satisfied, in due time, with divine consolations and a holy felicity. Many might also be weeping for sin, or through affliction; but being Christ's disciples, they must be accounted happy, for they would surely rejoice in due time. (Notes, Ps. 128: 5, 6. 2 Cor. 6: 3–10. 7: 9–11.) 'Blessed are they, who patiently suffer poverty, hunger, grief, and persecution for the sake of Christ; that they may obtain that kingdom, and that reward in heaven, He hath promised to his faithful servants.' Whitby. (Notes, Is. 51: 7 & 66: 5, 6. 2 The. 1: 3–10. Jan. 5: 9–11. 1 Pet. 4: 12–16.)

(22.) They shall separate you.] 'Meaning, they will excommunicate you, or separate you from their communion; Luke, having spoken of their separating or excommunicating them, continues the same idea, in saying that they would cast out their name likewise, as a thing evil in itself. By your name, is meant their name as his disciples. As such, they were sometimes called Nazarenes, and sometimes Christians; and both these names were matter of reproach in the mouths of their enemies. So James (2: 7.) says to the converts, Do they not blaspheme that worthy name by which ye are called? So when St. Paul (in Acts 24: 5) is called a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes, the character of a pestilent fellow, and that of a mover of sedition is joined to it; and in Acts 28: 22, the Jews say to Paul, As concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against, and this is implied in 1 Pet. 4: 14, when he says, If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, i. e. as Christians; agreeably to what follows in v. 16, if any man suffer as a Christian, &c. In after-times, we find Pliny consulting the emperor Trajan, whether or no he should punish the NAME itself, (of Christians) though no evil should be found in it. See Pearce.'

parable of the rich man and Lazarus. Lazarus had the blessedness of those that are poor, and hunger, and weep now, for in Abraham's bosom all the promises made to them who did so, were made good to him; but the rich man had the woes that follow here, as he had the character of those on whom those woes are entailed.

1. There is a woe to them that are rich, that is, that trust in riches, and instead of serving God with their wealth, serve their lusts with it; woe to them, for they have received their consolation, that which they placed their happiness in, and were willing to take up with for a portion, v. 24. They in their life-time received their good things, in their account the best things, and all the good things they are ever likely to receive from God. ^a You that are rich, are in temptation to set your hearts on a smiling world, and to say, Soul, take thine ease, in the embraces of it, This is my rest forever, here will I dwell, and then woe unto you. It is the folly of carnal worldlings, that they make the things of this world their consolation, which were intended only for their convenience; and to them the consolations of God are small, and of no account. It is their misery, that they are put off with these things as their consolation; let them know it, to their terror, when they are parted from them, there is an end of all their comfort, a final end of it, and nothing remains to them but everlasting misery and torment.

PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS.

V. 20-26. We may easily discover that there is but little faith among professed Christians; while we observe how eagerly they seek happiness, in those things on which Jesus has pronounced a woe; and how carefully they shun those circumstances, in which He declares that true happiness may be found. Yet poverty, affliction and contempt, when connected with humility, godly sorrow and faith, conduce more even to present comfort, than all the riches, splendor, luxury, and carnal earth of ungodly men. (1 Tim. 6: 6-10.) The former tends to weaken all those evil propensities, which the latter more and more inflames: and a peaceful conscience, a submissive will, a contented mind, communion with God, well-regulated affections, and the hope of heaven, will render a Christian more happy in a cottage or a dungeon, than a prince can be in a palace, with a guilty conscience, a proud heart, a stubborn will, furious passions, and the fear of death and all its terrifying consequences. (Notes, Ps. 37. Matt. 5: 4, 5, 7, 8. P. O. 1-12.) To the poor, despised believer, the kingdom of heaven exclusively belongs: there he will meet his reward, and there his best desires will be eternally satisfied in the blessed society of prophets and apostles, and of the incarnate Son of God, who passed the same way to his glory. On the other hand, when a few fleeting years are gone, the rich, luxurious sinner will 'lift up his eyes in hell,' at the utmost distance from all consolation; and his unsatisfied desires will there forever torment him; the giddy mirth of the dissipated will be turned into bitter weeping; and the laughter of the scorner will terminate in doleful wailings and lamentations. May these reflections be made effectual, by the Spirit of God, to rectify our judgments, to direct our choice, and to teach us to prefer the reproach of Christ, to the pleasure of sin, or the applause of an ungodly world. (Heb. 11: 24-26.)—No one ought to be disquieted, when he hears worldly men, who teach smooth doctrines and 'prophesy deceits,' applauded on every side: even if it be with invidious, slanderous, and malicious reflections on those, who are less complaisant to the fashions and customs of a wicked world. It is unspeakably better to have the blessing of God, amidst man's contumely and execration, than to be abhorred by Him while 'all men speak well of us.'

SCOTT.

Perhaps some persons, who were rich and lived in plenty and luxury, had come to make remarks on our Lord's preaching, and to deride what they heard; and these might here primarily be addressed. (16: 14, 15.) But in general, He intended to show his disciples the danger of riches, worldly indulgences, and all those ruinous advantages which men so eagerly pursue; and of that pride and self-sufficiency which are commonly increased by outward prosperity. (Marg. Ref. n-s.—Notes, 12: 15-21. 16: 22-23.—Matt. 19: 23-26. 1 Tim. 6: 6-10. 9: 10. Jam. 1: 9-11.) As it could not be expected, that his disciples, who decidedly adhered to his holy doctrine and commandments, would be generally commended in this evil world, He likewise pronounced a woe on 'those, of whom all men speak well.' (2 Tim 3: 10-12.) This might especially be intended of teachers. 'He that will be pleasing to all, must speak things grateful to all; now that cannot be good which is grateful to bad men. Thus the false prophets, whom the Jews commended, spoke to them "smooth things." (Is. 30: 10.) 'they "prophesied lies," "because the people loved to have it so;" they strengthened the hands of evil doers.' (Jer. 23: 14.) and "taunted with untimely mortal." (Ez. 13: 10, 11.)' Whitby. Marg. (24.) Woe unto you, &c. 'Campbell rightly prefers, with Wakefield and others, alas for you, &c. "The form of expression in both languages, in these verses, so much coincides with what we are rarely accustomed to hear, except in passionate imprecations, that it is no wonder they should be, in some measure, misunderstood by the majority of readers. That such words were often directed against those who were not only bad men, but the avowed enemies of our Lord, is a circumstance which ascribes this appearance of imprecation, and renders it difficult for us to conceive otherwise of the expressions. Some have called them authoritative denunciations of judgments; but our Lord is not here acting in the character of judge, pronouncing sentence on the guilty, or doom-ing them to punishment. But He speaks here purely in the character of prophet, or teacher, divinely enlightened as to the consequence of men's actions, and whose zeal for their good obliged Him to give them warning. As the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them, He came not to curse, but to bless us; by turning away every one of us from his iniquities. The words which proceeded out of his mouth were, in every sense, justly denominated full of grace. His example was perfectly conformable to his instructions; and I will venture to affirm, that the more narrowly we examine his discourses, the more we shall be convinced, that nothing He ever uttered against any living being (if candidly interpreted) will be found to bear any, the least, affinity to imprecation." Campbell. 'This enlightened and, I think, just view of the subject, is confirmed by the language of Euthymius. Wetstein compares Dionysius Hal. Bulky still more appositely cites Lucian. He also cites T. A Kempis, de Imit. Christi.'

'It is most evident, that such expressions as these in Scripture are to be taken with some limitation, otherwise they would be contrary to fact in some instances. But there is, generally speaking, cause to denounce a woe to you who are rich.'

DONDERD.

(26.) Alas for you, when all men shall speak well of you. This was meant for the apostles and first teachers. Riesenmueller truly observes, that though it is possible that a good man may be praised by many, yet, that a teacher of religion should be praised by all, even the wicked and the superstitious, must by no means be expected. Grotius has appositely cited a narration respecting Phocion, recorded by Plutarch, that when in his orations he had particularly pleased the multitude, he used to ask his friends whether any thing wrong had escaped him in his address. For, according to the old adage, 'a complaisant temper makes friends, truth excites odium.'

BLOOMFIELD.

'False prophets.' 'Not those, exclusively, who uttered false predictions; but those corrupt teachers, also, who accommodated their sentiments and doctrines to the wishes and passions of their auditors.'

HAWLETT.

27 ¶ But I say ^aunto you which hear, ^bLove your enemies, ^cdo good to them which hate you;

28 ^aBless them that curse you, and pray for them which ^bdespitefully use you.

29 And ^aunto him that ^bsmiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other; ^cand him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid not to take thy coat also.

30 Give ^ato every man that asketh of thee; ^band of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again.

31 And ^aas ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.

32 For ^aif ye love them which love you, ^bwhat thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them.

33 And ^aif ye do good to them which do good to you, what thank have ye? for sinners also do even the same.

34 And ^aif ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again.

well off; that is, who make it their great and only care to gain the praise and applause of men, who value themselves on that more than on the favor of God; (v. 26.) ^aunto you: it seems to intimate that you were not faithful to your trust, and to the souls of men, if you preached so as that nobody would be disgusted; for your business is to tell people of their faults, and if you do that as you ought, you will get that ill-will which never speaks well. The false prophets, indeed, that flattered your fathers in their wicked ways, that prophesied smooth things to them, were caressed and spoken well of; and if you be in like manner cried up, you will be justly suspected to deal deceitfully as they did. We should desire to have the approbation of those that are wise and good, and not be indifferent to what people say of us; but as we should despise the reproaches, so we should also despise the praises, of the fools in Israel.

V. 27—36. These verses agree with Matt. 5:38 to the end of that chapter; I say unto you that hear, (v. 27.) to all you that hear, not to disciples only; ^bHe that has an ear, let him hear. Those that diligently hearken to Christ, shall find He has something to say to them well worth their hearing. Now the lessons Christ here teacheth us, are,

I. That we must render to all their due, and be honest and just in all our dealings, v. 31. What we would expect, in reason, to be done to us, either in justice or charity, by others, if they were in our condition, and we in theirs, that, as the matter stands, we must do to them. We must put our souls into their souls' stead, and then pity and succor them, as we would desire and justly expect to be ourselves pitied and succored.

II. That we must be free in giving to them that need; (v. 36.) to every one that is a proper object of charity, that wants necessities, which we have wherewithal to supply out of our superfluities; 'Those that are not able to help themselves, that have not relations in a capacity to help them.' Christ would have his disciples ready to distribute, and willing to communicate, to their power, in ordinary cases, and beyond their power in extraordinary.

III. That we must be generous in forgiving them that have any way injured us.

1. We must not be extreme in demanding our right; ^aHim that taketh away thy cloak, forcibly or fraudulently, forbid him not by any violent means to take thy coat also, v. 29. Let him have that too, rather than fight for it. And (v. 30.) of him that taketh thy goods, (so Dr. Hammond thinks it should be read,) that borrows them, or that takes them up from thee on trust, of such do not exact them; if Providence have made such insolvent, do not take the advantage of the law against them, but rather lose it than take them by the throat, Matt. 18:28. If a man run away in thy debt, and take away thy goods with him, do not perplex thyself, nor be incensed against him.

2. We must not be rigorous in revenging wrong; ^aUnto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, instead of bringing an action against him, or sending for a writ for him, or bringing him before a justice, offer also the other; that is, pass it by, though thereby thou should be in danger of bringing on thyself another like indignity; which is commonly pretended in excuse of taking the advantage of the law in such a case. If any one smite thee on the cheek, rather than give another blow to him, be ready to receive another from him; that is, leave it to God to plead thy cause, and do thou sit down silent under the affront. When we do thus, God will smile our enemies, as far as they are his, upon the cheek bone, so as to break the teeth of the ungodly; (Ps. 3:7.) for He hath said, Vengeance is mine, and He will make it appear that it is so, when we leave it to Him to take vengeance.

3. Nay, we must do good to them that do evil to us. This is that which our Savior, in these verses, chiefly designs to teach us, as a law peculiar to his religion, and a branch of the perfection of it.

We must be kind to those from whom we have received injuries; not only love our enemies, but do good to them, be as ready to do any good office to them as to any other person, if their case call for it, and it be in our power to do it. We must study to make it appear by positive facts, if there be an opportunity, that we bear them no malice, nor seek revenge. Do they despitefully use us, in word or deed? Do they endeavor to make us contemptible or odious? Let us bless them, and pray for them, speak well of them, the best we can, wish well to them, especially to their souls, and be intercessors with God for them. This is repeated, v. 35. To recommend this difficult duty, it is represented as a generous thing, and an attainment few arrive at. To love those that love us, has nothing uncommon in it, nothing peculiar to Christ's disciples; there is nothing self-denying in that, it is but following nature, even in its corrupt state, and puts no force at all upon it; (v. 32.) it is no thanks to us, to love those that say and do just as we would have them. And, (v. 33.) if you do good to them that do (30.) Ask again.] (Deut. 15:2, 3. Neh. 5:7.) Sept. 'Do not exact even what has been taken away by fraud or violence, if it would distress the person concerned to repay thee: rather lose it, if consistent with other duties, than demand it by a legal process.' (Marg. Ref. e.—1 Cor. 6:1—6.) (32, 34.) What thank, &c.] 1 Pet. 2:20, 21. 'What grace is it to you?' 'What evidence have you that you are partakers of the grace of God? What reason can you give for your hope, that your persons and services are accepted? Mere nature can produce mutual affection between men of similar character, and a reciprocal intercourse of good offices; notwithstanding that they are in a state of enmity against God, and under the dominion of selfish passions; for they either gratify a natural instinctive inclination in this way, or they seek their own ease, interest, pleasure, or reputation, by such attachments and friendly actions, without regard to the glory, will, or favor of God. (35.) Hoping for nothing again.] (Notes, Deut. 15:4—16.) Or, expecting nothing from man in return; but trusting that God will make up your loss, if you do it in dependence on Him and in obedience to his command. Ye shall be the children, &c.] See on 1:32.

(28.) Bless.] 'Our Lord recommended something like the maxim of Solomon, "A soft answer turneth away wrath." Prov. 15:1. He exhorted his disciples not to suffer the violence of the wicked to make them forget the sanctity of their principles, or to compromise their character.'

(30.) 'The plain sense of the passage (however liable it may seem to misconception and abuse) is that given by Kuinoel: "Be disposed to grant an unreasonable request, and if any one shall wrongfully deprive thee of thy property, do not too severely require it back, whether by law or otherwise. Rather suffer it to be taken away, than think of revenge or private enmity." See on Matt. 5:39. seq. 42. The original Greek, translated ask in the latter clause of the verse, means to require, ask back, and severely demand one's right.' BLOOMFIELD.

Dr. A. Clarke thinks it probable, that this passage 'refers to the way in which the tax-gatherers and Roman soldiers used to spoil the people.'

'From the 27th to the 30th verse, our blessed Lord gives directions how to treat our enemies. 1. Wish them well. 2. Do them good. 3. Speak as well of them as possible. 4. Be an instrument of procuring them good from others: use your influence in their behalf. 5. Suffer patiently from their contempt and ill treatment. 6. Give up your goods, rather than lose your meekness and charity towards them. The retaliation of those who hearken not to their own passion, but to Christ, consists in doing more good than they receive evil. Ever since our blessed Savior suffered the Jews to take away his life, it is by his patience that we must regulate our own.' Quessel, in Dr. A. CLARKE.

"To make our neighbor purchase, in any way, the assistance which we give him, is to profit by his misery; and by laying him under obligations, which we expect him in some way or other to discharge, we increase his wretchedness under the pretence of relieving him."'

'The word translated receive is appropriated to express the receiving back of money. These words have a reference to a kind of benefit among the Greeks—excellently illustrated by Casaubon on Theophrastus. If any one, for instance, had lost a considerable part of his property by shipwreck, fire or any other calamity, it was not unusual for his friends to supply him with money, not to be paid back by any certain day, but when convenient. This, however, they scarcely would do, except to those who they had some hope might, (by a more prosperous turn of fortune,) some time or other, not only repay the money but return the favor.'

good to you, and return their kindnesses, it is from a common principle of custom, honor, and gratitude: and therefore that thank have you? What credit are you to the name of Christ? For sinners also, that know nothing of Christ, do even the same. But it becomes you to do something more, which sinners will not do, and which no principle of theirs can pretend to reach; you must render good for evil: not that any thanks are due to us, but then we are to our God for a name and a praise: and He will have the thanks.

We must be kind to those from whom we expect no manner of advantage, v. 35. It is meant of the rich lending to the poor a little money for their necessity, to buy daily bread, or to keep them out of prison; in such a case, we must lend, with a resolution not to demand interest for what we lend, as we may most justly from those that borrow money, to make purchases withal, or to trade with; but that is not all, we must lend, though we have reason to suspect that what we lend we lose; lend to those who are so poor, that it is not probable they will be able to pay us again. This precept will be best illustrated by that law of Moses, (Deut. 15: 7-10.) which obliges them to lend to a poor brother as much as he needed, though the year of release was at hand.

Here are two motives to this generous charity.

1. It will redound to our profit, v. 35. What is given, or laid out, or lent and lost on earth, from a true principle of charity, will be made up to us in the other world, unspeakably to our advantage. 'You shall not only be repaid, but rewarded, greatly rewarded; it will be said to you, Come, ye blessed, inherit the kingdom.'

2. It will redound to our honor; for herein

we shall resemble God in his goodness, which is the greatest glory; 'Ye shall be the children of the Highest; shall be owned by Him as his children, being like Him. It is the glory of God, that He is kind to the unthankful and to the evil; bestows the gifts of common providence even on the worst of men, who are every day provoking Him, and rebelling against Him, and using those very gifts to his dishonour. Hence He infers, (v. 36.) Be merciful, as your Father is merciful; this explains Matt. 5:48. Be perfect as your Father is perfect. Imitate your Father in those things that are his brightest perfections. Those that are merciful, as God is merciful, even to the evil and the unthankful, are perfect, as God is perfect; so He is pleased graciously to accept it, though infinitely falling short. Charity is called the bond of perfectness, Col. 3:14. This should strongly engage us to be merciful, even to such as have been injurious to us; not only that God is so to others, but that He is so to us, though we have been, and are, evil and unthankful; it is of his mercies that we are not consumed.

V. 37-49. All these sayings we had before in Matthew; some of them, ch. 7. others in other places; they were sayings that Christ often used. Grotius thinks we need not be critical here in seeking for the coherence: they are golden sentences, like Solomon's proverbs, or parables. Let us observe here,

1. We ought to be very candid in our censures of others, because we need grains of allowance ourselves, v. 37. Exercise toward others the charity which thinks no evil, which bears all things, believes and hopes all things; and then others will exercise that charity toward you. They that are merciful to other people's names, shall find others merciful to theirs.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 27-36. We should be careful not to leaven, with moroseness or resentment, our profession or preaching of the truth of God: and the bolder and more decided we are in his cause, the more pliant and passive we ought to be in our own. (Rom. 15: 1-3.) We should in many things recede quietly from our due, and meekly submit to injuries and provocations: at the same time we ought to persevere in 'doing to others, as we would they should do to us,' and in unwearied acts of kindness to the most perverse and ungrateful of our enemies. Such a conduct will evince us to be 'the children of the Highest,' and insure from Him a large and gracious recompense: it also will prove the superior excellency of our doctrines above all other systems, and the efficacy of the sanctifying grace on which we profess to depend. Whereas, if Christians love those alone who love them, and do good to such as do good to them, in what are their religion and principles discriminated from those of heathens, who do the same? Let us then 'do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again;' and let us aim to be merciful to the miserable and the guilty, even according to the mercy of our heavenly Father to us, poor, perishing sinners. (P. O. Matt. 5: 33-48. Rom. 12: 17-21.)

SCOTT.

(35.) Love your enemies. [This is the most sublime precept ever delivered to man: a false religion durst not give a precept of this nature, because, without supernatural influx, it will be forever impracticable. In these words of our blessed Lord, we see the tenderness, sincerity, extent, disinterestedness, pattern, and issue of the love of God dwelling in man: a religion, which has for its foundation the union of God and man in the same person, and the death of this august Being for his enemies: which consists on earth in a reconciliation of the Creator with his creatures, and which is to subsist in heaven only in the union of the members with the Head: could such a religion as this ever tolerate hatred in the soul of man, even to his most inveterate foe?]

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Hoping for nothing again. [Several commentators follow the Syriac and Arabic versions, which express the sense thus: 'Do not put off any one's hope, by being too rigid to the borrower;' but many more equally eminent vindicate the common version.]

Ed.

'Lend cheerfully, without fearing the loss of what shall be bestowed. It often happens that, even contrary to appearances, the loan is thankfully returned by the borrower; but should it not be, remember, (and let this silence all your doubts,) that God chargeth Himself with what you give from love to Him, and love to your neighbor. He is the poor man's surety.'

CAMPBELL.

Children of the Highest. [Rather, "dear and acceptable to God," or you will be like unto God. So a rabbinical writer, cited by Schoettgen.]

BLOOMFIELD.

(36.) Be ye, &c. as your Father, &c. [Let us not presume to call God our Father, if we do not labor to resemble Him: nor dare to challenge the peculiar honor and privileges of Christ's disciples, if we do not distinguish ourselves from others by the charity of our tempers, and the usefulness of our lives, as well as by the articles of our faith, and the forms of our worship.]

Verses 37, 38.

(Notes Matt. 7: 1, 2. Rom. 14: 2-4.) Those who are kind and liberal to others from evangelical motives, and according to the rules of God's Word, commonly meet with much unexpected favor and kindness from individuals of their brethren, and often from strangers; which tend to counterbalance the enmity, ingratitude, and contempt of the world at large; and as the Lord has all hearts in his hands, this may confidently be expected by those, who lay themselves out in doing good for his sake. On the contrary, they who are harsh, unmerciful, unforgiving, or negligent, in their conduct to others, may expect similar treatment both from God and man. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 5: 7, 2, 2; 4, 15. 18: 21-35. Jam. 2: 8-13.)

SCOTT

(37.) Judge not. [How great is the goodness of God in being so willing to put our own judgment into our hands as to engage Him to enter into judgment with us; provided we do not usurp the right which belongs solely to Him, in reference to others.] Dr. A. CLARKE.

Forgive, &c. [Forgive others their offences; and if you do it from a truly religious principle, you shall also be forgiven, &c. This sense must be supposed, to make it consistent with those passages in which love to God and faith in Christ, as well as other branches of the Christian temper, are insisted upon as so absolutely necessary, that without them the greatest lenity and indulgence to our fellow-creatures cannot give us a claim to the promises of pardon and salvation.]

DODDRIDGE.

'The mercy and compassion which God recommends, extend to the forgiving of all the injuries we have received, or can receive. To imitate in this the mercy of God, is not a mere counsel; since it is proposed as a necessary mean, in order to receive mercy. What man has to forgive in man is almost nothing; man's debt to God is infinite. And who acts in this matter as if he wished to receive mercy at the hands of God? The spirit of revenge is equally destitute of faith as a reason.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

'Though the forgiveness of injuries is doubtless included in the precept, it ought not to be limited to this meaning. The original word translated forgive, implies equally discharging from captivity, from prison, from debt.

CAMPBELL.

(38.) [There is here a reference both to dry measures and to measures of liquids. The whole appears to have been a proverbial expression among the Jews, to denote, metaphorically, abundant and extravagant liberality. 'There were,' says Buxtorf, 'among the Jews, measures of various sorts, overflowing, abraded, heaped up, pressed shaken, covered,' &c. With us, the bushel is heaped up, but not pressed down or shaken together, and then abraded, or the chaff is cut off with a lath.]

BLOOMFIELD.

Give, and it shall be given. [“Christian charity will make no difficulty in giving that, which eternal truth promises to restore. Let us give, neither out of mere human generosity, nor out of vanity, nor from interest, but for the sake of God, if we would have Him give to us as we count. There is no such thing as true, unmixed generosity, but in God only; because there is none but He who receives no advantage from his gifts, and because He engages Himself to pay these debts of his creatures with an excessive interest. So great is the goodness of God, that when He might have absolutely commanded us to give to our neighbor, He vouchsafes to invite us to this duty by the prospect of a reward, and to impute that to us as a desert, which He has a right to exact of good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal, it shall be measured to you again.

39 And he spake a parable unto them, ^a Can the blind lead the blind? ^b shall they not both fall into the ditch?

40 The ^adisciple is not above his master: but every one ^a that is perfect shall be as his master.

41 And ^a why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, ^b but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye?

42 Either how canst thou say to thy brother, Brother, let me pull out the mote that is in thine eye, when thou thyself beholdest not the beam that is in thine own eye? ^a Thou hypocrite, ^a cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote that is in thy Brother's eye.

43 For ^a a good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.

2. If we are of a giving and a forgiving spirit, we shall ourselves reap the benefit of it. They that forgive others, others will forgive. They that forgive others' trespasses against them, God will forgive them their trespasses against Him. And He will be no less mindful of the liberal that devise liberal things, v. 38. God, in his providence, will recompense it to you; it is lent to Him, and He is not unwrighteous to forget it, (Heb. 6: 10.) but will pay it again. Men shall return it into your own bosom; for God often makes use of men as instruments, not only of his avenging, but of his rewarding justice. If we in a right manner give to others, when they need, God will incline the hearts of others to give to us, when we need, and to give liberally. They that sow plentifully, shall reap plentifully. Whom God recompenses, He abundantly recompenses.

3. We must expect to be dealt with ourselves as we deal with others, v. 38. Those that deal hardly with others, must acknowledge, as Adoni-bezek did, (Judg. 1: 7.) that God is righteous, if others deal hardly with them; but they that deal kindly with others, have reason to hope that, when they have occasion, God will raise them up friends who will deal kindly with them. Providence does not always go by this rule, because the full and exact retributions are reserved for another world; yet, ordinarily, it observes a proportion sufficient to deter us from all acts of rigor, and to encourage us in all acts of beneficence.

4. Those who put themselves under the guidance of the ignorant and erroneous, are likely to perish with them, v. 39. Can the Pharisees who are blinded with pride, prejudice, and bigotry, lead the blind people into the right way? Those that are led by the common opinion, course, and custom of this world, are themselves blind, and are led by the blind, and will perish with the world that sits in darkness. Those that ignorantly, and at a venture, follow the multitude to do evil, follow the blind in the broad way that leads the many to destruction.

5. Christ's followers can expect no better treatment in the world than He had, v. 40. Let them not promise themselves more honor or pleasure; nor aim at worldly pomp and grandeur which He always declined; nor affect that power in secular things, which He would not assume; but every one that would show himself perfect, an established disciple, let Him be as his Master, dead to the world, and every thing in it; let him live a life of labor and self-denial, and make himself a servant of all; let him stoop, and toil, and do all the good he can, and then he will be a complete disciple.

6. Those who take on them to rebuke and reform others, are concerned to look to it, that they be themselves blameless, and harmless, and without rebuke, v. 41, 42. Those with a very ill grace censure the faults of others who are not aware of their own faults. Those are altogether unfit to help to reform others whose reforming charity doth not begin at home. Those therefore who would be servicable to the souls of others, must first make it appear that they are solicitous about their own souls. To help to pull the mote out of our brother's eye, is a good work, but we must qualify ourselves for it by beginning with ourselves; and our reforming of our own lives may, by the influence of example, contribute to others' reforming theirs.

7. We may expect that men's words and actions will be as they are, as are their hearts and their principles.

(1.) The heart is the tree, and the words and actions are fruit, according to the nature of the tree, v. 43, 44. If a man be really a good man, have a principle of grace in his heart, and the prevailing bent and bias of the soul be toward God and heaven; though he may not do you all the good he should, yet he will not in any material instance do you hurt. If he cannot reform ill manners, he will not corrupt good manners. If the fruit that a man brings forth be corrupt, if his devotion tend to debase the mind and conversation, if his conversation be vicious, if he be a drunkard or fornicator, a swearer or liar, if he be in any instance unjust or uncharitable, his fruit is corrupt, and you may be sure that he is not a good tree. On the other hand a corrupt tree doth not bring forth good fruit though it may bring forth green leaves, v. 44. You may, if you please, stick figs upon thorns, and hang a bunch of grapes upon a bramble, but they neither are, nor can be, the natural product of the trees; so neither can you expect any good conduct from those who have justly a bad character. If the fruit be good, you may conclude that the tree is so; if the conversation be holy, heavenly, and regular, though you cannot infallibly know the heart, yet you may charitably hope that that is upright with God; for every tree is known by its own fruit. But the vile person will speak villany; (Isa. 32: 6.) and the experience of the moderns herein agrees with the proverb of the ancients, that wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, 1 Sam. 24: 13.

(2.) The heart is the treasure, the words and actions the produce from that treasure, v. 45. This we had, Matt. 12: 34, 35. The reigning love of God and Christ in the heart denominates a man a good man; it is a good treasure in the heart, which enriches a man for the benefit of others; out of such a good treasure a man may bring forth that which is good; but where the love of the world and the flesh reign, the heart is an evil treasure in the heart, out of which an us by the title of his sovereignty over our persons and estates." Men live in such a state of social union as renders mutual help necessary; and as self-interest, pride, and other corrupt passions, mingle themselves ordinarily in their commerce, they cannot fail of offending one another. In civil society, men must, in order to taste a little tranquillity, resolve to bear something from their neighbors; they must suffer, pardon, and give up many things; without doing which, they must live in such a state of continual agitation, as will render life itself insupportable. Without this giving and forgiving spirit, there will be nothing in civil society, and even in Christian congregations, but divisions, evil surmisings, injurious discourses, outrages, anger, vengeance, and, in a word, a total dissolution of the mystical body of Christ. Thus our interest in both worlds calls loudly upon us to give and to forgive."

Dr. A. CLARKE. Into your bosom. ^a Into your lap. Here is an evident reference to the mantles which the Jews wore, into which a considerable quantity of corn might be received. Compare Ruth 3: 15. 2 Kings 4: 39. Neh 5: 13. Prov. 16: 33.

"Almost all the ancient nations, and particularly those of the East, wore long, wide, and loose garments; and when about to carry any thing away that their hands could not contain, they used a fold in the osom of their robe, nearly in the same way that women in this country use their aprons. The word 'bosom', or 'lap'," frequently occurs in the sense in the best and purest Greek writers." HARMER.

Verses 38-41.

"Skillful instructors destroy themselves and others: for as the scholar is, so will the disciple be." BEAN. It cannot be expected that the scholar will excel his teacher; but the complete disciple will be as his teacher, not wiser or better. If, therefore, men follow blind guides, in their religious inquiries, they must continue in ignorance, or be lulled into error: so that it is of the greatest importance for us to take care on what teachers we attend; lest our greatest diligence, and highest attainment, should leave us short of the saving knowledge of God and of ourselves. Some, however, explain the latter verse to mean, that the genuine disciple of Christ would be like Him, and be prepared to endure the cross for his sake; yet the former is the more obvious interpretation, and more suited to the context. (Marg. Ref.-Matt. 15: 12-14.) (40.) Perfect. [See on Matt. 21: 16. SCOTT.]

(40.) Doddridge paraphrases thus: 'There is little reason to hope that, under their [men's] instruction, you should be wiser and better than they: for it is, you know, a common proverb, that the scholar is not above his teacher; but all that can be reasonably expected is, that every one who is a finished [scholar] should come up to him, who teaches him; and it is this that he will principally aim at, to be as his master. Yet, on the other hand, I would not have you be forward in blaming them, [your teachers,] or any other, while you neglect a due regulation of your own temper and conduct; for why dost thou look at the little mote,' &c. and at v. 43. 'Till thou shalt thus reform thyself, there is not much to be expected from thine endeavor to reform others for as there is no good tree,' &c.

44 For every tree is known by his own fruit: ⁵for of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble-bush gather they ^{*}grapes.

45 A ⁶good man out of the good ⁷treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; ⁸and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil: ⁹for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh.

46 ¶ And ¹⁰why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?

47 Whosoever ¹¹cometh to me, ¹²and heareth my sayings, ¹³and doeth them, I will shew you to whom he is like.

48 He is like a man which built an house, and digged deep, ¹⁴and laid the foundation on a ¹⁵rock: and when ¹⁶the flood arose, the stream beat vehemently upon that house, and could not shake it; for it was founded upon a rock.

49 But ¹⁷he that heareth and doeth not, is like a man that without a foundation built an house upon the earth; ¹⁸against which evil man is continually bringing forth that which is evil; and by what is brought forth, you may know what is in the heart, as you may know what is in the vessel, water or wine, by what is drawn out from it, John 2: 8. Of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks; what the mouth ordinarily speaks, speaks with relish and delight, generally agrees with what is innermost and uppermost in the heart; He that speaks of the earth, is earthly, John 3: 31. Not but that a good man may possibly drop a bad word, and a wicked man make use of a good word to serve a bad turn; but, for the most part, the heart is as the words are, pain or serious; it therefore concerns us to get our hearts filled, not only with good, but with abundance of it.

8. It is not enough to hear the sayings of Christ, but we must do them; not enough to profess relation to Him, as his servants, but we must make conscience of obeying Him.

It is putting an affront upon Him, to call Him Lord, Lord, as if we were wholly at his command, and had devoted ourselves to his service, if we do not make conscience of conforming to his will, and serving the interests of his kingdom. We do but mock Christ, as they that in scorn said, Hail, King of the Jews, if we call Him ever so often, Lord, Lord, and yet walk in the way of our own hearts, and in the sight of our own eyes. Why do we call Him Lord, Lord, in prayer, (compare Matt. 7: 21, 22,) if we do not obey his commands. He that turns away his ear from hearing the law, his prayer shall be an abomination.

It is putting a cheat on ourselves, if we think that a bare profession of religion will save us, that hearing the sayings of Christ will bring us to heaven, without doing them. This He illustrates by a similitude, (p. 47—49.) which shows, the stream did beat vehemently, ^{*}and immediately it fell; and ¹⁹the ruin of that house was great.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 37—49. To avoid giving needless offence, we should carefully abstain from all rash and rigorous decisions about men's motives, state and character. Our great business is to judge ourselves; and not to judge another's servants, who must stand or fall to their own Master. (Notes, Rom. 14: 2—4. 10: 12.) We should never be backward to forgive, as we hope to be forgiven by God for Christ's sake: and we may rest satisfied that we shall not be losers in the event, by the most liberal and abundant kindness to others, according to our measure of ability and opportunity: for it shall assuredly be 'measured to us, by the same measure with which we mete to others,' whether that be large or scanty.—These extensive precepts, as well as the evangelical principles connected with them, are overlooked or explained away by 'blind guides,' of whom every one ought to beware; for they are falling into the ditch together with their followers, in great multitudes, continually, on every side of us. And as 'the disciple is not above his Master,' let us be indeed the disciples of Christ alone, that we may grow up into conformity to Him, till at length we become 'perfect even as He is perfect.' Let us also seek to subdue our own evil tempers, and break off our sins, before we set up for censors or reformers of others; lest Jesus rebuke our officiousness, and put us to shame. In vain do we call Christ 'Lord, Lord,' or even call on Him to rescue us from condemnation, if we do not the things which He says. May we then wisely come to Him, hear his words, and 'do them,' that we may with diligence 'dig deep,' to lay the foundation of our hope on a Rock. Thus, when unbelievers of every name shall be driven away, with all their presumptuous confidences, into everlasting ruin, we shall have 'a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' (P. O. Matt. 7: 13—29.)

SCOTT.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 7: 21—27.) How large a proportion of professed Christians, of all parties and creeds, fall under condemnation, when judged by this most solemn and unpeppery interesting passage! 'Weighed in this balance, they are found wanting.' They 'call Christ Lord, Lord, and do not the things which He says.' They hear, and do not. Nay, immense numbers, of jarring sentiments in other respects, agree in this, to make the mercy of God published in the Gospel, a plea for neglecting strict obedience; and an encouragement, not to repent, but to continue in impotence, provided they be not grossly immoral! If, say they, 'we are to be judged by the law, we should be condemned, no doubt; but God is merciful, Christ came to save sinners, we are Christians, and under the new covenant; and there is no need to be so strict, or to disquiet ourselves about the event.' (Jam. 2: 8—13.) This countless multitude, who exclaim vehemently against the supposed antinomian tendency of the doctrines of grace, and of the antinomian principles of some that profess to believe them, are themselves practical antinomians. They sin on, because God is merciful, and habitually neglect self-denying obedience, because Jesus came to 'save us from our sins' (Rom. 4: 1, 2.) This will most awfully appear 'at the day of judgment; and the question, with which the passage begins, will suffice to stop the mouths of millions, and to leave them silent in darkness and despair.' (Rom. 3: 19, 20.)

(46.) To maintain the consistency of this verse with the preceding, Doddridge thus paraphrases: 'Yet, remember, it is not merely by men's words that their character will finally be judged; especially, that it will not be determined by a few pious and devotional forms of speech: for why do ye call Me, Lord, Lord, if, in your practice, ye are regardless of my will, and do not the things which I say?' &c.

Ed.

(48.) 'The moral here inculcated is, that the study of piety should not be superficial, but a principle well founded and deeply rooted in the heart, so as to resist the assaults of passion, temptation, &c.' GROSVENOR.

(49.) 'May these beautiful, striking, repeated admonitions, which our Savior gives us of the vanity of every profession which does not influence practice, be attended with reverence and fear! We are building for eternity; may we never grudge the time and labor of a most serious inquiry into the great, fundamental principles of religion. May we discover the sure foundation, and raise upon it a structure which shall stand fair and glorious, when hypocrites are swept away in the everlasting ruin.'

JUDITH DUM.

CHAP. VII.

Jesus commends the faith, and heals the servant of a centurion, 1-10. He raises a widow's son at Nain, 11-17. He sends back the messengers of John the Baptist, with an account of his miracles, 18-23; bears testimony to John, 24-30; and exposes the perverseness of the people respecting both John and himself, 31-37. He is entertained by a Pharisee, 38. A woman of prodigious bad character washes and anoints his feet, 37-39. He justifies to the Pharisee his conduct towards her by a parable; and shows that she loved him, and that her many sins were pardoned, 40-50.

NOW when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, he entered into Capernaum.

2 And a certain centurion's servant, who was dear unto him, was sick, and ready to die.

3 And when he heard of Jesus, he sent unto him the elders of the Jews, beseeching him that he would come and heal his servant.

4 And when they came to Jesus, they besought him instantly, saying, That he was worthy for whom he should do this:

5 For he loveth our nation, and he hath built us a synagogue.

6 Then Jesus went with them. And when he was now not far from the house, the centurion sent friends to him, saying unto him, Lord, trouble not thyself; for I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof:

7 Wherefore neither thought I myself worthy to come unto thee: but say in a word, and my servant shall be healed.

8 For I also am a man set under authority

CHAP. VII. v. 1-10. This story differs from the account we had of the same event, Matt. 8: 5, &c. There, the centurion came to Christ, but here, he sent to Him, first some of the elders of the Jews, (v. 3.) and afterward some other friends, v. 6. But the centurion might be said to do what he did by his proxies; as a man takes possession by his attorney. But it is probable that the centurion himself came at last, when Christ said to him, (Matt. 8: 13.) As thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee.

This miracle is here said to have been wrought by our Lord Jesus, when He had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, v. 1. What Christ said, He said publicly; whoever would, might come, and hear Him; In secret have I said nothing, John 18: 20. Now to give an undeniable proof of the authority of his preaching word, He here gives an incontestable proof of the power and efficacy of his healing word. He that had such a commanding empire in the kingdom of nature, as that He could command away diseases, no doubt has such a sovereignty in the kingdom of grace, as to enjoin duties displeasing to flesh and blood, and bind, under the highest penalties, to the observance of them. This miracle was wrought in Capernaum, where most of Christ's mighty works were done, Matt. 11: 23. Now observe,

1. The centurion's sick servant was dear to his master, v. 2. It was the praise of the servant, that he had recommended himself to his master's esteem and love. Servants should study to endear themselves to their masters. It was likewise the praise of the master, that, when he had a good servant, he knew how to value him. Many masters think it favor enough to the best of servants, not to rate them, and beat them, and be cruel to them, whereas they ought to be kind to them, and tender of them, and solicitous for their welfare and comfort.

2. The master, when he heard of Jesus, was for making application to Him, v. 3. Masters ought to take particular care of their servants when they are sick, and not to neglect them. This centurion begged that Christ would come, and heal his servant. We may now, by faithful and fervent prayer, apply ourselves to Christ in heaven, and ought to do so, when sickness is in our families; for Christ is still the great Physician.

3. Out of respect to Christ, he sent some of the elders of the Jews to represent the case, and solicit for him, because he being an uncircumcised Gentile, and Christ a prophet, he thought Christ would not care to converse with him: thus he acknowledged the Jews to be the favorites of heaven,—not sending ordinary Jews neither, but elders, persons in authority, that by the dignity of the messengers he might honor Him to whom they were sent;—Balak and princes to Balaam.

4. The elders were hearty intercessors; they besought Him instantly, (v. 4.) were very urgent with Him, pleading for the centurion, that which he would never have pleaded for himself! That he was worthy. If any Gentile was qualified to receive such a favor, surely he was. The centurion said, I am not so much as worthy of a visit; (Matt. 8: 8.) but the elders thought him worthy of the cure; thus honor shall uphold the humble in spirit. Let another man praise thee, and not thy own mouth. But what they insisted on in particular, was, that, though a Gentile, he was a hearty well-wisher to the Jewish nation and religion, v. 5.

Probably, he had read the Old Testament, whence it was easy to advance to a very high esteem of the Jewish nation, as favored by Heaven above all people. Note, Even conquerors, and those in power, ought to keep up an affection for the conquered, and those they have power over. By building a new synagogue, he testified his veneration for the God of Israel, his belief of his being the one only living and true God, and his desire, like that of Darius, to have an interest in the prayers of God's Israel, Ezra 6: 10. Note, Building places of meeting for religious worship, is a very good work, is an instance of love to God and his people; and those who do good works of that kind, are worthy of double honor.

5. Jesus Christ was very ready to show kindness to the centurion, v. 6. Is He the Savior of the Jews only? Is He not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also, Rom. 3: 29. The centurion did not think himself worthy to visit Christ; (v. 7.) yet Christ thought him worthy to be visited by Him: for, those that humble themselves shall be exalted.

6. The centurion, when he heard that Christ was doing him the honor to come to his house, gave further proofs both of his humility and of his faith. Thus the graces of the saints are quickened by Christ's approaches toward them; he sends friends, to meet Him, expressing his sense of his unworthiness, and his confidence in Christ. He knew how to honor a prophet of God, though He was despised and rejected of men. 'I know there is no occasion, Thou canst cure my servant without coming under my roof, by that almighty power from which no thought can be withholden.' So far was he from Naa-man's fancy, that He should come to him, and stand, and strike his hand over the patient, and so recover him, 2 Kings 5: 11. He illustrates his faith by a comparison taken from his own profession, and is confident that Christ can as easily command away the distemper, as he can command any of his soldiers to go on an

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. v. 1-10. (Notes, and P. O. Matt. 8: 5-13.) 'Thus is Christ said to have "preached peace" to the Ephesians, which personally He did not try by his apostles. Notwithstanding, Luke, willing to add one evidence more of the centurion's humility, from the reason of his not aving personally unto Christ, chooses rather to set it down exactly as it was, in each circumstance, than only in brief as "Matthew had done." Hammond—"The centurion's liberal affection for the worshippers of the true God, shown in building them a synagogue at his own expense, is also added by Luke, as what had peculiarly tended to soften the prejudices of the Jews, and to conciliate their favor towards him." And he himself has built the synagogue for us.' The favor shown an officer in the army, by which the conquerors held the nation in subjection; and the earnestness, with which the elders pleaded the cause of an uncircumcised Gentile, is not the least wonderful circumstance in the narrative. It attests in the strongest manner the excellency of his character, and shows the power of persevering goodness, and kind endeavor, to overcome the prejudices of those who witness them, and share the benefit. (5.) Hath built us a synagogue. He hath built the synagogue for us; probably there was only one at Capernaum.

(3.) 'It is pleasant to think of this good centurion, who, amidst all the temptations of a military life, retained the principles, not only of liberality and humanity, but of piety too, and, probably amidst the rail-lery of his irreligious and idolatrous brethren, had the courage to frequent and even to build a synagogue. Surely his devotion did not enervate, but rather invigorate and establish his valor; nor did he find himself less dutifully regarded by the soldiers under his command, for this parental tenderness to his afflicted servant, which brought him thus humbly to petition Christ in his favor. Such may our officers be! and we may hope that the hosts of heaven will with pleasure cover their heads in the day of battle, and obedient troops be formed, by their example and their care, to the discipline of virtue as well as of war.'

Do. BRIDGE.

(5.) 'We see the force of real goodness to conquer the most inveterate prejudices; the elders of the Jews at Capernaum turn petitioners for a Gentile, for a Roman centurion; so may we disarm the virulence of a party spirit, and conciliate the friendship of those who otherwise might have their eyes upon us for evil.'

(6.) Neither thought I myself worthy. 'He that thus humbleth himself shall be exalted,' (Luke 14: 14.) nor do we ever stand in the praise of Christ, than when we see ourselves undeserving even of his notice.'

(7.) 'Behold an instance of faith in a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, by which their unbelief was condemned! O that the virtues of heathens may not another day rise up to our condemnation, notwithstanding a higher profession, and much other advantage!'

rity, having under me soldiers; and I say unto *one, *Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this and he doeth it.

9 When Jesus heard these things, *he marvelled at him, and turned him about, and said unto the people that followed him, I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, *not in Israel.

10 And they that were sent, returning to the house, *found the servant whole that had been sick.

11 ¶ And it came to pass the day after, that *he went into a city called Nain: and many of his disciples went with him, and much people.

12 Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, *the only son of his mother, and she was *a widow: *and much people of the city was with her.

13 And when the Lord saw her, *he had compassion on her, and said unto her, *Weep not.

14 And he came and touched the *bier: and they that bare him stood still. And he errand, v. 8. Christ has a sovereign power over all the creatures and all their actions, and can change the course of nature as He pleases, can rectify its disorders, and repair its decays in human bodies, for all power is given to Him.

7. Our Lord Jesus was well pleased with the centurion's faith, and the more surprised at it, because he was a Gentile; and the centurion's faith having thus honored Christ, see how Christ honored that; (v. 9.) as one amazed, He said, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. Note, Christ will have those that follow Him, to observe and take notice of the great examples of faith, that are sometimes set before them, especially when any such are found among those that do not follow Christ so closely as they do, in profession; that we may be shamed, by the strength of their faith, out of the weaknesses and waverings of ours.

8. The cure was presently and perfectly wrought; (v. 10.) They that were sent, knew they had their errand, and therefore went back, and found the servant well, and under no remains at all of his distemper. Christ will take cognizance of the distressed case of poor servants, and be ready to relieve them, for there is no respect of persons with Him. Nor are the Gentiles excluded from the benefit of his grace; nay, this was a specimen of that much greater faith which would be found among the Gentiles, when the Gospel would be published, than among the Jews.

V. 11—13. We have here the story of a widow's son at Nain, which Matthew and Mark make no mention of; only in the general, Matthew records it, in Christ's answer to the disciples of John, that the dead were raised up, Matt. 11: 5.

Observe,

I. Where, and when, this miracle was wrought. It was the next day after He had cured the centurion's servant, v. 11. Christ was doing good every day, and never had cause to complain that he had lost a day. It was done at the gate of a small city, or town, called Nain, not far from Capernaum; probably, the same with a city called Nais, which Jerome speaks of.

II. Who were the witnesses of it; it is as well attested as can be, for it was done in the sight of two crowds of people, v. 11, 12. Thus there were a sufficient number to attest the truth of this miracle, for it was a greater proof of Christ's divine authority than his healing of diseases, for by no power of nature, or any means, can the dead be raised.

III. How it was wrought by our Lord Jesus.

1. The person raised to life was a young man. That he was really dead, was universally agreed; there could be no collusion in the case, for Christ was entering into the town, and had not seen him till now that He met him upon the bier. He was carried out of the city, for the Jews' burying-places were without their cities, and at some distance from them. This young man was the only son of his mother, and she a widow. She depended on him to be the staff of her old age, but he proves a broken reed; every man at his best estate is so. How numerous, how various, how very calamitous, are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world. What a vale of tears is it! What a Bochim, a place of weepers! We may well think now deep the sorrow of this poor mother was for her only son; it is used, to express the greatest grief; (Zech. 12: 10.) it was the deeper in that she was a widow; broken with breach upon breach, and a full end made of her comforts. Much people of the city was with her, by condoling with her loss, to comfort her.

2. Christ showed both his pity and his power, in raising him to life, that He might give a specimen of both, which shine so bright in man's redemption.

(1.) See how tender his compassions are toward the afflicted; v. 13. Here was no application made to Him for her, not so much as that He would speak some words of comfort to her, but purely from the goodness of his nature, He was troubled for her. The case was piteous, and He looked on it with pity; He said unto her, Weep not. Note, Christ has a concern for mourners, for the miserable, and often prevents them with the blessings of his goodness. He undertook the work of our redemption and salvation, in his love and in his pity, Isa. 63: 9. What a pleasing idea does this give us of his compassion, and of the multitude of his tender mercies, which may be very comfortable to us when at any time we are in sorrow! Verses 11—17.

It does not appear that our Lord ever went to Nain, except on this occasion. It is supposed to have been distant about twelve or thirteen miles from Capernaum; and He seems to have taken this journey, on purpose to perform the compassionate miracle here recorded. (Marg. Ref. t—c.) The evangelist has left us to conceive of the emotions of her heart on this occasion, to which no words could possibly do justice; but he informs us, that an awe and fear of the divine power of Jesus fell on the spectators; and that they "glorified God" for his mercy, and thanked Him for having "visited his people," and raised up such a Prophet among them. (Marg. Ref. d—h.—Notes, Mark 5: 35—43. v. 41—43. John 11: 46. Acts 9: 36—43.) But though the rumor of this extraordinary miracle spread even to Judea, and through all the adjacent regions, yet we do not find that any one expected a similar miracle in the case of Jairus' daughter. (Note, Mark 5: 22—34.) What can exceed the beautiful simplicity of these verses? In particular, that simple, yet touching enumeration, which occurs in the twelfth verse, is a pure classical beauty. Common writers either overlook such circumstances, and fail to arrange them in the delicate order which gives them their effect; or they dwell so much on them, as to excite weariness and disgust. A similar instance occurs in the contrast towards the close of this chapter. (44—46.) Few minds are so acute in their perceptions, as thus to catch every circumstance which properly enters into a parallel, or a contrast, and to exclude all fanciful agreements and oppositions; and few who catch them can thus exhibit them without parade. This clearness of conception, united with such simple and unembarrassed communication, is, I conceive, true classical excellence. Luke particularly abounds in these instances. Those petulant critics, who spurn him away from a comparison with Xenophon, can support their sentence only by maintaining that his Greek is not Attic. The walk to Emmaus may challenge a comparison with any work of any master. Luke leaves the mind full of pictures, produced, not by height of coloring, but by exquisite and entirely natural description. Thus it is especially with the first two chapters of this Gospel, and the first chapters of the Acts of the Apostles.

These paint themselves, on the fancy and memory, on every 'persual.' SCOTT.

(12.) Carried out.] 'The Jews always buried their dead without the city, except those of the family of David. No burying-places should be tolerated within cities or towns; much less in or about churches and chapels. This custom is excessively injurious. Schoettgen says, "Others were accustomed to bury their dead without the city: We Christians, not only bury them within our cities, but receive them into our churches; hence many nearly lose their lives through the noxious effluvia." Both the Jews and other people,' says Rosenmueller, 'had their burying-places without the city; and this the health of the public requires, which is greatly injured by the effluvia from the graves.' From long observation I can attest that churches and chapels situated in grave-yards, and those especially, within whose walls the dead are interred, are perfectly unwholesome; and many, by attending such places, are shortening their passage to the house appointed for the living. The gas which is disengaged from putrid flesh, and particularly from a human body, is not only unfriendly to, but destructive of animal life. Superstition first introduced a practice, which self-interest and covetousness continue to maintain.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

'Among the Jews, a child under a month old was carried out in the bosom of a person; if a full month, in a little coffin which they carried in their arms; one of a twelve month old was carried in a little coffin on the shoulder; and one of three years old on a bier, or bed; for litter, without any other covering than a cloth, Adam.') In this manner was this corpse carried out. According to the age of persons was the company that attended them to the grave. An infant, not a month old, was buried by one woman and two men. If a month old, by men and women; and whoever was carried out on a bier or bed, many mourned for him. Persons well known were accompanied by great numbers. It was looked upon as an act of kindness and mercy, to follow a corpse to the grave; and it was forbidden to do any work at the time a dead man was buried, even one of the common people.' GILL.

in their sorrows with this, that Christ pities them. Christ said, Weep not; and He could give her a reason for it, which no one else could: 'Weep not for a dead son, for he shall presently become a living one.' This was a reason peculiar to her case; yet there is a reason common to all that sleep in Jesus, which is of equal force against inordinate and excessive grief for their death—that they shall rise again, shall rise in glory; and therefore we must not sorrow, as those that have no hope, 1 Thess. 4:13. Let Rachel, that weeps for her children, refrain her eyes from tears, for there is hope in thine end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border, Jer. 31:17. And let our passion at such a time be checked and calmed by the consideration of Christ's compassion.

(2.) See how triumphant his commands are, over even death itself; (v. 14.) He came and touched the bier, or coffin, hereby intimating to the bearers, that they should not proceed; He had something to say to the dead young man: Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom; (Job 33:24.) they that bare him stood still, and, probably, let down the bier, and opened the coffin; and then with solemnity, as one that had authority, and to whom belonged the issues from death, He said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. It was no absurdity for Christ to bid him arise, when a power went along with that word, to put life into him. The gospel-call to all people, to young people particularly, is, 'Arise, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you light and life.' Christ's dominion over death was evidenced by the immediate effect of his word; (v. 15.) He that was dead, sat up. Have we grace from Christ? Let us show it. Another evidence of life was, that he began to speak; whenever Christ gives us spiritual life, He opens the lips in prayer and praise. And, lastly, He would not oblige this young man to go along with Him, as his disciple, much less as a trophy or show to get honor by, but delivered him to his mother, to attend her as became dutiful son; for Christ's miracles were miracles of mercy; and a great act of mercy this was to this widow; now she was comforted, according to the time in which she had been afflicted, and much more, for she could now look on this son as a partial favorite of heaven, with more pleas. than if he had not died.

IV. What influence it had on the people; (v. 16.) it frightened them all, to see a dead man start up alive out of his coffin in the open street at the command of a man; they were all struck with wonder at it, and glorified God. The Lord and his goodness, as well as the Lord and his greatness, are to be feared. The inference they drew from it was, 'A great Prophet is risen up among us, the great Prophet that we have been long looking for; doubtless, He is one divinely inspired, who can thus breathe life into the dead; and in Him God hath visited his people, to redeem them, as was expected,' Luke 1:68. This would be life from the dead, indeed, to all them that waited for the Consolation of Israel. When dead souls are thus raised to spiritual life, by a divine power going along with the Gospel, we must glorify God, and lock on it as a gracious visit to his people. The report of this miracle was carried, 1. In general, all the country over; (v. 17.) through all Judea, which lay a great way off, and all Galilee, which was the region round about; yet few believed in Him, and gave up themselves to Him. Many

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. The grace of God is communicated to some of every rank in the community; and, where it prevails, it influences men to a conscientious and affectionate performance of the various duties of their several relations in domestic life. When masters and servants behave properly, in their respective situations, from the fear of God, they become dear to each other. (Note, Gen. 35:8. P. O. 1—15.)—Those who love the Lord will love his people also, and will be disposed to employ their wealth or influence in promoting his worship; and such as are most worthy, in the opinion of competent judges, will most honor Christ, and be most sensible of their own unworthiness.—When we have received benefits which we are unable to return, justice, as well as gratitude, requires us to beseech the Lord very earnestly in behalf of our benefactors, especially when they are under trials and afflictions; and we are most likely to obtain the greatest favors from Him, when we are most sensible that we do not deserve the least. To Him all things are alike easy, and He never fails to answer the expectation of that faith, which honors his power and love.—Our blessed Redeemer's heart is susceptible of pity, on account of all the distresses to which we are exposed. The weeping widow, and bereaved parent, are the peculiar objects of his compassionate regard; and, though He no longer restores their deceased relatives, yet the power which formerly effected this, can now repair every breach, dry up every tear, and cause every bleeding heart to rejoice. While many, therefore, glory in a worthless sensibility, or weep over imaginary woe with an unmeaning sympathy, and leave real misery to pine in neglect, let the Christian joyfully copy the compassion of his Lord, and endeavor to soothe the aching heart, to relieve the indigent, and to comfort the afflicted. In this way, he will most reasonably hope for comfort, under the troubles of life, and in the hour of death, from the stroke of which no period of age, or vigor of health, can secure him; and thus he may also look forward with joyful expectation to the time, when the Redeemer's powerful voice shall call forth all that are in the graves, either to 'the resurrection of life, or to the resurrection of damnation.' (Notes, John 5:25—27. 11:20—27.)—All the displays of the glorious power and majesty of the Lord, should make us fear coming short of his salvation; and all his kindness to us, or to others, should excite us to glorify Him, especially for 'visiting his people' and raising up a great Redeemer among them.

SCOTT.

(15.) 'He went from Capernaum to Nain, still on the same blessed errand, to do good to the bodies and the souls of men. Oh that our lives might be such a circle of virtues and graces! Of Him may we also learn the most engaging manner of conferring benefits; that lovely mixture of freedom and tenderness, which heightens the sweetness, and doubles the value of every favor! But, O gracious Redeemer, how impotent is our pity when compared with thine! with thine, which could call back lamented children from the grave, and turn the sorrows of a weeping parent into a torrent of joy! We are sometimes ready fondly to say, "O that Thou hadst been near when the darlings of our hearts were snatched away from us, and we left in the dust!" But Thou indeed wast near; for Thou hast the keys of death and the unseen world! And this we know, that if our beloved children are sleeping in Thee, thy voice shall at length awaken them; and Thou wilt deliver them to us, to die no more; and wilt thyself graciously take part in that mutual and lasting joy, which Thou shalt give to us and to them.'

Verses 18—35.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 11:1—19. (18.) John.] 'John, from the prison, sends his unbelieving disciples to Christ Himself, to be confirmed; that, hearing and seeing Him, they might by Him be instructed, from whom they had otherwise fled, out of a preposterous emulation.' Beza. (21.) In that same, &c. What a view this verse gives us of the number and variety of our Lord's miracles! The word rendered 'gave,' seems to express how highly gratifying the gift of sight was to those who had been blind, and in what a gracious and kind manner our Lord bestowed it, as taking pleasure in imparting so welcome a gift. (23.) Blessed! He adds this, to correct the preposterous emulation of John's disciples, who envied the honor of Jesus, as eclipsing that of John; but again, lest any should suppose that He meant to censure John himself, He subjoins a commendation of his office, which He places in the middle between the prophets and his own coming. (28.) The predictions of the prophets are compared with John's pointing out Christ to the people; and that again with the exhibition given of Him in the Gospel. At the same time it is shown, that as much as the second discovery excelled the first, so much did 'the third excel the second. Beza. (29, 30.) And all, &c.' It is not evident, whether these verses are a continuation of Christ's discourse, or the evangelist's remark on the effects produced by it; our translation favors the latter supposition, yet the most approved expositors incline to the former. If they were the words of Christ, they called the attention of his hearers to the effects produced by John's ministry. The common people, and even the publicans, and others of bad moral character, had been induced by it 'to justify God'; for they acknowledged the justice of the punishment, which was denounced against them for their sins; and their need of repentance, forgiveness, and a change of heart and life; and, professing these things, they had received his baptism, and had regarded, in some measure, his testimony to Jesus as the promised Messiah. But the Pharisees and scribes generally rejected his ministry, and were not baptized by him; and thus they rendered 'the counsel of God,' in sending him to prepare the way of Christ, of none effect, as far as they were concerned; and they despised the warnings and denunciation which John addressed to them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i.—Note, Matt. 21:28—32.) Hence the people might infer that their pride and hypocrisy were more adverse to spiritual religion, than the ignorance or profligacy of others, or even of the publicans; that they might be expected to be the inveterate enemies to Jesus, whose forerunner John was; and that all must be cautioned not to follow such blind guides. If, however, we understand the passage, as the words of the evangelist, it implies, that the common people, and even the publicans, approved of Christ's honorable testimony to John, and expressed themselves to be well satisfied with the pies of John shewed him of all these things.

19 And John calling unto him ^{two} of his disciples, sent them to Jesus, saying, 'Art thou he that should come? or look we for another?'

20 When the men were come unto him, they said, John Baptist hath sent us unto thee, saying, Art thou he that should come? or look we for another?'

21 And in that same hour he cured many of their infirmities and ^{plagues}, and of evil spirits: and unto many that were blind he gave sight.

have the rumor of Christ's Gospel in their ears, that have not the savor and relish of it in their souls. 2. In particular, it was carefully brought to John Baptist, who was now in prison; v. 18. His disciples came, and gave him an account of all things, that he might know that though he was bound, yet the Word of the Lord was not bound; God's work was going on, though he was laid aside.

V. 19-35. All this discourse concerning John Baptist, occasioned by his sending to ask whether He was the Messiah, or no, we had, much as it is here related, Matt. 11: 2-19.

I. We have here John Baptist's message to Christ, and the return He made to it. Observe,

1. The great question is, whether Jesus be He that should come to redeem and save sinners, or whether we are to look for another, v. 19, 20. We are sure that God has promised a Savior, an anointed Savior, and that what He has promised He will perform in its season; but is this Jesus that promised Messiah? If so, we will receive Him, and look for no other; but if not, we will continue our expectations, and, though He tarry, wait for Him.

2. John Baptist himself, or at least his disciples, wanted to be confirmed in this matter; for Christ had not yet publicly declared Himself to be indeed the Christ, nay, He would not have his disciples, who knew Him to be so, to speak of it, till the proofs of his being so were completed in his resurrection. The great men of the Jewish church had not owned Him, nor had He gained any interest that was like to set Him on the throne of his father David. Nothing of that power and grandeur was to be seen about Him, in which it was expected the Messiah would appear. Therefore it is not strange that they should ask, Art Thou the Messiah? not doubting but that if He were not, He would direct them what other to look for.

3. Christ left it to his own works to tell who, and what He was, and to prove it. While John's messengers were with Him, He wrought many miraculous cures, v. 21. He multiplied the cures, that there might be no ground left to suspect a fraud. And then, (v. 22.) He bid them go tell John what they had seen. And he and they might easily argue, or even the common people, (John 7: 31.) When Christ cometh, will He do more miracles than these, which this man has done? These cures which they saw Him work, were not only confirmations of his commission, but explications of it. The Messiah must come to cure a diseased world, to give light and sight to them that sit in darkness, and to restrain and conquer evil spirits; you see that Jesus does this, and therefore must conclude, 'This is He, and look for no other.' To his miracles in the kingdom of nature He adds this in the kingdom of grace, (v. 22.) To the poor the Gospel is preached; which they knew was to be done by the Messiah, for He was anointed to preach the Gospel to the meek, (Isa.

61: 1.) and to save the souls of the poor and needy, Ps. 72: 13. Judge, therefore, whether you can look for any other that will more fully answer the characters of the Messiah, and the great intentions of his coming.

4. He gave them an intimation of the danger people were in of being prejudiced against Him, notwithstanding these evident proofs of his being the Messiah, v. 23. We are here in a state of trial and probation; and it is agreeable to such a state, that, as there are sufficient arguments, to confirm the truth to those that are honest and impartial in searching after it, and have their minds prepared to receive it, so there should be also objections, to cloud the truth to those that are careless, worldly, and sensual; Christ's education at Nazareth, his residence at Galilee, the meanness of his family and relations, his poverty, and the despicableness of his followers—these and the like were stumbling-blocks to many, which all the miracles He wrought could not help them over. He is blessed, for he is wise, humble, and well disposed, that is not overcome by these prejudices. It is a sign that God has blessed him, for it is by his grace that he is helped over these stumbling stones; and he shall be blessed indeed, blessed in Christ.

II. We have here the high encomium Christ gave of John Baptist, after his messengers were departed, (v. 24.) to make the people sensible of the advantages they had enjoyed in John's ministry, and were deprived of by his imprisonment. Let them now consider, who that was, about whom there had been so much talk, and such a great and general amazement. 'Come,' saith Christ, 'I will tell you.'

He was a man of unshaken self-consistency: a man of steadiness and constancy; not a reed shaken with the wind, first one way, then another; not fickle as a reed, but firm as a rock.

He was a man of unparalleled self-denial; a great example of mortification and contempt of the world; not a man clothed in soft raiment, nor one that lived delicately; (v. 25.) but, on the contrary, lived in a wilderness, and was clad and fed accordingly, one that brought under the body, and kept it in subjection.

He was a prophet, had his commission and instructions immediately from God, and not of man, or by man. He was by birth a priest but that is never taken notice of; for his glory, as a prophet, eclipsed the honor of his priesthood; nay, he was more, he was much more than a prophet, (v. 26.) than any of the prophets of the Old Testament, for they spake of Christ as at a distance, he spake of Him as at the door.

He was the harbinger and forerunner of the Messiah, and was so prophesied of in the Old Testament; v. 27. (Mal. 3: 1.) Behold I send my messenger before thy face. Before He sent the Master Himself, He sent a messenger, to give notice of his coming, and prepare people to receive Him. Had the Messiah been to appear dom, justice, and goodness of God, displayed in that dispensation; to which they were the more inclined, as they had been baptized of John. But the Pharisees and scribes, who in general had refused his baptism, were displeased with our Lord's testimony to him, as it implied a severe censure on their conduct; (Note, Matt. 21: 23-27.) and thus they persisted in their opposition to the counsel of God, to their own great loss and danger; proving themselves to be none of 'wisdom's children,' by all of whom her appointments are justified and approved (25.)—In rejecting John's baptism, they are said to 'reject the counsel of God towards them;' that is, his gracious design of calling them by him to that repentance, which could alone exempt them from the wrath to come; and by that refusal declared they approved not of God's counsel, as just and righteous, in calling such unamiable persons as they were, and such zealots for the law, to repentance, that so they might escape the ruin threatened by John. For thus Eleazar, one of them, speaks, after the destruction of the Jews, that though all the rest of the Jews perished, we alone expected to be preserved, as we were not sinned against God, nor been guilty of any fault, and who were teachers to others. Christ tells us, that they 'were confident in themselves, that they were righteous;' and represents them by the 'elder son,' saying, 'I never transgressed at any time thy commandment.' (15: 29.) They therefore judged it an incongruous thing, to call such righteous persons to repentance; and threaten them with ruin who were so dear to God. But the publicans and common people were conscious to themselves of sins, sufficient to expose them to divine judgments; and therefore they approved of this counsel God sent to them by his messenger; and declared him righteous, both in calling them to repentance, and threatening his judgments if they did 'neglect it.' Wholly.—It is probable, that many of the scribes and Pharisees who came to John, hearing his exhortations and warnings, declined his baptism, or at least that the rest of the body stood aloof from him. (Note, Matt. 3: 7-10.)

(19.) And John, &c. sent unto Jesus, &c. 'It has been thought by some that John, in thus sending to Jesus, was seeking satisfaction on his own account, whether Jesus was the Messiah; and that our Lord meant to caution him against doubting it, when He said, Happy is he that is not offended in Me. But, considering what clear evidence John had before received by a miraculous sign from heaven, and what express and repeated testimonies he himself had borne to Jesus, I cannot imagine this to have been the case, but must think it to be in behalf of his disciples that he sought further satisfaction.' DODDRIDGE. (21.) Infirmities and plagues. 'Luke mentions here diseases, or ill habits of body, sores or lamenesses, and evil spirits; from whence we may conclude, that evil spirits are reckoned by him (who speaks of distempers more accurately than the other evangelists) as things different from any disorders of the body, included in the two former words.' Ep. PEARCE.

(22.) Tell John, &c. 'Nothing could be more apposite, natural and convincing, than such an answer as this, which took its rise from what Christ was then doing, and rested on the most apparent testimony of God Himself in astonishing miracles, to which they knew their master made no pretences; (see John 10: 41.) miracles of so beneficent a nature, that no austerities of a retired life were by any means comparable to them, and miracles receiving an additional lustre from their being foretold by a prophet many ages before, and even by Isaiah, the prophet by whom John himself was so particularly described.' DODDRIDGE. (23.) And blessed is he, &c. 'This was intended as an awful admonition to the disciples of John, and contains a strong intimation, that their final happiness would be determined by the regards they should pay to Him.'

24 ¶ And when the messengers of John were departed, he began to speak unto the people concerning John, "What went ye out into the wilderness for to see? A reed shaken with the wind?"

25 But what went ye out for to see? "A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold, they which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately, are in king's courts."

26 But what went ye out for to see? "A prophet? Yea, I say unto you, and much more than a prophet."

27 This is he of whom it is written, "Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee."

28 For I say unto you, "Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist: but he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he."

29 And all the people that heard him, and the pharisees, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John.

30 But the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him.

31 ¶ And the Lord said, "Whereunto then shall I liken the men of this generation? and to what are they like?"

32 They are like unto children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept."

33 For John the Baptist came neither eating as a temporal Prince, under which character the carnal Jews expected Him, his messenger would have appeared, either in the pomp of a general, or the gaiety of a herald at arms; but it was a previous indication, plain enough, of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, that the messenger He sent before Him to prepare his way, did it by preaching repentance, and reformation of men's hearts and lives; certainly that kingdom was not of this world, which was thus ushered in.

He was, on this account, so great, that really there was not a greater prophet than he. Prophets were more honorable than kings and princes, and John was the greatest of all the prophets; the country was not sensible what a valuable, what an invaluable man it had in it, when John Baptist went about preaching and baptizing. And yet the least gospel-minister, that has obtained mercy of the Lord, to be skillful and faithful in his work; or the meanest of the apostles, and first preachers of the Gospel, being employed under a more excellent dispensation, are in a more honorable office than John Baptist. Those, therefore, who live under the gospel-dispensation, have so much the more to answer for.

III. We have here the just censure of the men of that generation, who were not wrought upon by the ministry either of John Baptist or of Jesus Christ Himself.

1. Christ here shows what contempt was put on John Baptist, while he was preaching and baptizing. (1.) Those who showed him any respect, were but ordinary people; who in the eye of the gay, were rather a disgrace than a credit to him; (v. 29.) the people indeed, the vulgar herd, of whom it was said, This people who knows not the law, are cursed; (John 7:49.) and the publicans, men of ill fame, as being generally men of bad morals, or taken to be so, these became his disciples; and these, though glorious monuments of divine grace, yet did not magnify John in the eye of the world; but by their repentance and reformation they justified God, in appointing such a one as John Baptist to be the forerunner of the Messiah; they hereby made it to appear that it was the best method that could be taken, for it was not in vain to them, whatever it was to others. (2.) The great men of their church and nation, that would have done him some credit in the eye of the world, did him all the dishonor they could; they heard him indeed, but they were not baptized of him; v. 30. God, sending that messenger among them, designed their salvation, and had they closed with the counsel of God, they had been made forever; but they would not comply with it, and it was to their ruin; they came short of the benefit intended them, and by refusing that discipline which was to fit them for the kingdom of the Messiah, shut themselves out of it; nay, they not only excluded themselves, but hindered others, and stood in their way.

2. He here shows the strange perverseness of the men of that generation, in their avails and prejudices both against John and Christ.

(1.) They made but a jesting matter of the ing bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, "He hath a devil."

34 The Son of man is come eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold, a gluttonous man, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners!

methods God took to do them good, v. 31. "What can I think of, absurd enough to represent them by? They are like children; (v. 32.) as full of play as they can hold; as if God were but in jest with them, in all the methods He takes to do them good; they turn it all off with a banter, and are no more affected with it than with a piece of pagantry." This is the ruin of multitudes, they can never persuade themselves to be serious in the concerns of their souls; old men sitting in the sanhedrim, were but as children sitting in the market-place, and no more affected with the things that belong to their everlasting peace, than people are with children's play. O the amazing stupidity and vanity of the blind and ungodly world! The Lord awakes them out of their security.

(2.) They still found something or other to carp at.

[1.] John Baptist was a reserved, austere man, lived much in solitude, and ought to have been admired for being such a humble, sober, self-denying man, and hearkened to as a man of thought and contemplation; but this, which was his praise, was turned to his reproach; ye say, "He has a devil;" he is a melancholy man, he is possessed.

[2.] Our Lord Jesus was of a more free and open conversation; (v. 34.) He would go and dine with Pharisees, though He knew they did not care for Him; and with publicans, though He knew they were no credit to Him: in hopes of doing them good, He conversed with them familiarly. By this it appears that the ministers of Christ may be of very different temper and dispositions, very different ways of preaching and living, and yet all good and useful; diversity of gifts, but each given to profit withal; therefore none must make themselves a standard to all others, nor judge hardly of those that do not do just as they do. John Baptist bore witness to Christ, and Christ applauded John Baptist, though they were the reverse of each other in their way of living. But the common enemies of them both reproached them both. The very same men that had represented John as crazed in his intellects, because he came neither eating nor drinking, represented our Lord Jesus as corrupt in his morals, because He came eating and drinking, v. 34. Ill-will never speaks well. See the malice of wicked people, and how they put the worst construction on every thing they meet with in the Gospel, and in the preachers and professors of it; and hereby they think to diminish them, but really destroy themselves.

Lastly, He shows that, notwithstanding this, God will be glorified in the salvation of a chosen remnant; v. 35. There are those who are given to wisdom, as her children, and they shall be brought, by the grace of God, to submit to wisdom's conduct and government, and thereby to justify wisdom's ways in bringing them to that submission; for to them they are effectual, and thereby appear well chosen. Wisdom's children are herein unanimous, one and all, they have all a complacency in the methods of grace which divine wisdom takes, and think never the worse of them for their being ridiculed by some.

V. 36-50. When and where this took place, does not appear; this evangelist does not observe order of time, so much as the other evangelists do; but it comes in here, on occasion of Christ's being reproached as a Friend of publicans and sinners, to show that it was only for their good, that He conversed with them; and that those whom He admitted near Him, were reformed, or in a hopeful way to be so. Who this woman was, that here testified so great an affection to Christ, does not appear; it is commonly said to be Mary Magdalene, but I find no ground in Scripture for it; she is described (ch. 8: 2. and Mark 16: 9.) to be one of whom Christ had cast seven devils; but that is not mentioned here; and therefore it is probable that it was not she.

Now observe here,

I. The civil entertainment which a Pharisee gave to Christ, and his gracious acceptance of that entertainment, v. 36. It appears this Pharisee did not believe in Christ, for he will not own Him to be a Prophet, (v. 39.) and yet our Lord Jesus accepted his invitation, that they might see He took the same liberty with Pharisees that He did with publicans, in hopes of doing them good. And those may venture further into the society of such as are prejudiced against Christ, and his religion, who have wisdom and grace sufficient to instruct and argue with them, than others may.

II. The great respect which a poor penitent sinner showed Him, when He was at meat in the Pharisee's house. It was a woman in the city, that was a sinner, a Gentile, a harlot, I doubt, known to be so, and infamous; she knew

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 18-35. Ministers ought to be peculiarly earnest in 'preaching the glad tidings of salvation to the poor,' and in seeking a blessing on their doctrine; that all may see its salutary effects, in the sober, righteous and godly lives of those who favor it.—Every individual should inquire into his own motives in going to hear the Word of God, and ask himself whether he derives any benefit from it; for the true minister is a messenger sent by the Lord Jesus, to prepare the way before Him, and to bring sinners to receive and obey Him. While numbers are offended with the Gospel, and, from perverse prejudices of diverse kinds, 'reject the counsel of God against themselves,' may we study to approve ourselves to be 'the children of wisdom,' by attending to the instructions of the sacred oracles, and adorning those mysteries and dispensations, which proud infidels and Pharisees deride and blaspheme. (P. O. Matt. 11: 1-24.)

SCOTT.

(35.) Of all her children. 'Rather, by all her children; i. e. all who are truly wise and religious, must needs approve of this beautiful variety in the conduct of Providence.' Donnan.

'Or, "the children of wisdom," by a natural metaphor, may signify "the many good effects which result from her;" all the graces and virtues of a truly good Christian may be considered as her progeny. Two MSS. and some versions have "works," instead of "children." If this interpretation should not be thought admissible, we may understand by the children of wisdom, "her disciples;" in the same manner as the "sons of the prophets" (1 Kings 20: 35. 2 Kings 2: 3, 5.) mean those who studied, or who had been brought up in their schools.'

HEWLETT.

Verse 36. This man seems to have been considerably impressed with what he had seen and heard; but his prejudices were strong, and he was yet in suspense whether Jesus was, or was not, a prophet. It is probable, therefore, that he invited Him to his house, in order the more narrowly to observe and scrutinize all his words and actions; and he seems to have had others about him in the same state of mind. (49. Notes, 11: 37, 38. 14: 1-6.) Our Lord, however, was always ready to show a friendly and considerate disposition, and to embrace every occasion of doing good; He therefore accepted the invitation, and having entered his house, he immediately sat down to meat; or, reclined on the couch, according to the custom of the Jews at that time. For the Pharisee, as it appears, considering Jesus as a poor man, and having no proper sense of his real excellency and dignity, did not show Him any of the customary tokens of respect or affection. (44-46.)

Verses 37-39.

There is no scriptural proof that this was Mary Magdalene. Mary Magdalene, or Mary of Magdala, is spoken of, rather as one, who had been remarkably afflicted, than peculiarly wicked. (Note, Mark 16: 9-11.) This woman, however, having heard our Lord's instructions with great attention, had been led to deep conviction and unfeigned repentance; and, being thus prepared to receive the truth, she seems to have believed Him to be the promised Messiah, a spiritual Redeemer, the Savior of sinners. She therefore longed to hear more of his convincing and encouraging instructions, and also to express love and gratitude to Him; and, in the fulness of her heart, she followed Him into the Pharisee's house, having taken with her an alabaster-box of valuable ointment, which probably she had been accustomed before to use for far other purposes. Coming thus behind Him as He reclined at meat, his presence and conversation so affected her, with a remembrance of her former sins, and with a sense of his grace and mercy, that she wept abundantly; and, as his feet were bare, (his sandals having been put off,) she rained tears plentifully upon them, wiping them at the same time with her neglected, dishevelled hair; and kissing them, in the most humble, respectful, and affectionate manner, she anointed them with the ointment. But the Pharisee, instead of reflecting in these tokens of her repentance, confined his thoughts entirely to her former scandalous character, and began to form a disadvantageous opinion of Jesus, because He allowed such a woman to approach Him. (Notes, 15: 1, 2. 18: 9-14. Je. 65: 3-7. Matt. 9: 10-13.) It is most surprising that many persons, (among whom have been several remarkable for learning and diligent investigation,) should have supposed that Luke here records the same event, which the other evangelists relate, concerning Mary, the sister of Lazarus. (Notes, Matt. 26: 6-13. Mark 14: 3-9. John 12: 1-8.) 'This woman was "a woman" of that city; "Nain" or Capernaum, the only cities here mentioned; whereas Mary, the sister of Lazarus, was of the village of Bethany. After the colation, which is not styled a supper, our Lord "went through every city and village, preaching the kingdom of God;" (8: 1.) whereas, after He raised Lazarus, "Jesus walked no more openly." (John 11: 54.) And lastly, Mary's unction was made for Christ's interment, and but six days before his last passover, when He continued in Bethany and Jerusalem. (Mark 11: 11.) Whittby. 'Thus was in one of the Pharisees' houses, not in Simon the leper's, nor to Bethany. The Pharisee objected against Christ for this; but not Judas, or one of the disciples; and the objection was not the unnecessary expense, as there, but that Christ would let a sinner be so kind to Him, if He knew it; or if He did not, that He was no prophet. And then the difference between Christ and Simon, is far distant from that in the 'other gospels, of anointing Him for his burial; which also contains 'another circumstance in it, that that of Mary's was immediately before his death, Judas going out immediately to betray Him.' Hammond. To this it may be added, that it is hardly conceivable, a supper should have been made for Jesus, after Lazarus was raised from the dead, at which Lazarus was a guest, and Martha waited, and which was evidently done in honor of Christ; while the person who entertained the company doubted of his being a prophet, because the sister of Lazarus his guest, and of Martha who waited, was permitted to touch Him. And it is equally inconceivable that the Jews should throng to the house of 'Martha and Mary, to comfort them concerning their brother,' if the character of Mary had been so infamous, that it was enough to induce suspicion against One, who was so eminent for his miracles and doctrine, that He permitted her to touch Him. There is every reason to think, that Mary, the sister of Lazarus and Martha, was, like her brother and sister, in all respects, a person of approved character, even among such as did not receive Jesus as the Messiah; and though the circumstances of the alabaster-box, the anointing of our Lord's feet, and wiping them with her hair, and 'the leper' being called Simon, as well as 'the Pharisee,' seem at first glance to give some plausibility to the opinion; yet the more carefully the connection of the narrative, the time, the place, the discourse, the woman's motive, the commendation bestowed on each, and indeed the whole account, is considered, the more complete must be the reader's conviction, that two entirely different persons and two distinct transactions are intended. The apostle records, that Mary anointed Christ's 'feet; but Luke never intimates, that this woman anointed 'his head,' as two evangelists do of Mary. This was more suited to the respectful and affectionate freedom of one long honored with the Savior's friendship, than with the weeping, trembling diffidence of a new convert, whose life had been notoriously scandalous. (37.) A sinner.' (34, 39. 5: 8. 13: 2. 15: 10. 18: 13.—See on Matt. 9: 10.) The word commonly marks a person of immoral character, and is seldom used for a truly penitent, believing, and justified person, except by the person himself in humble confession.

SCOTT.

(37.) A woman. 'The same, as affirmed by many, with Mary Magdalene. (Luke 8: 2.) and Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, John 11. Yet the best modern critics maintain that these were three different persons; Deyling having, as is generally acknowledged, proved, satisfactorily, from the Gospel history, wherever Mary Magdalene is mentioned, that she and Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, were two entirely distinct and different persons; and that the woman here mentioned (who had been a sinner) was entirely distinct and different from both; inasmuch as she differs from the sister of Lazarus in name, country, manners and situation in life; and from Mary Magdalene, in that the one was of Nain, (in Issachar, see note, verse 11.) but the other a harlot from Magdala, a city in the half-tribe of Manasseh, beyond Jordan. The history seems to differ from that recorded in Matt. 26: 6. Mark 14: 3. and John 12: 1; but, not to mention other things, what Luke relates here (in verses 37-50.) is by no means suitable to Mary, the sister of Lazarus, who was well known to Christ, and who had not come accidentally, but had been invited, (John 12: 2. made Him a supper.) And that Mary Magdalene was not the woman here spoken of, is evident from Luke 8: 2.'

'A mere heathen, who dwelt in this city, (probably Capernaum) who through the ministry of Christ had been before this converted to God, and came now to give this public testimony of her gratitude to her gracious Deliverer from the darkness and guilt of sin. For this sense of the original word, namely, that it signifies heathen or Gentile, see Matt. 9: 10, 11, 13, 11: 19, and 26: 45. 'The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners, i. e. is delivered into the hands of the heathen, viz. the Romans.' It is likely, the grand subject of the self-righteous Pharisee's complaint was, her being a heathen. As those who were touched by such, contracted legal defilement, he could not believe that Christ was a conscientious observer of the law; seen: He permitted her to touch Him, knowing who she was; or if He did not know that she was a heathen, it was a proof that He was no prophet, (v. 39.) and consequently had not the discernment of spirits, which prophets were supposed to possess.'

which was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster-box of ointment, 38 And stood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment.

39 Now when the Pharisee, which had bidden him, saw it, he spake within himself, saying, ^bThis man, if he were a prophet, would have known who, and what manner of woman, ^cthis is that toucheth him; for she is a sinner.

40 And Jesus answering said unto him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And he saith, ^dMaster, say on.

41 There was a certain creditor which had two debtors; ^ethe one owed five hundred pence, ^fand the other fifty.

42 And ^gwhen they had nothing to pay, ^hhe frankly forgave them both. Tell me therefore, which of them will love him most?

(38.) Stood at his feet behind Him. 'In taking their meals, the Eastern people recline on one side, the loins and knees being bent to make the more room. The feet of each person were turned outwards behind him. This is the meaning of standing behind at his feet.'

To wash his feet. 'As the Jews wore nothing like our shoes, (their being a mere sole bound about the foot and ankle with thongs. See cut. Matt. 10: 10.) their feet being so much exposed, had frequent need of washing, and this they ordinarily did before taking their meals.'

Kissed his feet. 'With affectionate tenderness, or kissed them again and again, which is the true force of the original word. The kiss was used in ancient times as the emblem of love, religious reverence, subjection and supplication. It has the meaning of supplication, in the way of adoration, accompanied with subjection, in 1 Kings 19: 18, whose mouths have not kissed Baal, and in Job 31: 27, My mouth hath not kissed my hand; I have paid no sort of adoration to false gods; and in Ps. 2: 12, Kiss the Son, lest He be angry,—close in with embrace affectionately the offers of mercy made unto you through Christ Jesus, lest He (the Lord) be angry with you, and be wroth; which commandment this woman seems to have obeyed both in the literal and spiritual sense. Kissing the feet was practised among the heathens to express subjection of spirit, and earnest supplication. Kissing the feet is a further proof that this person had been educated a heathen.'

It was also used as a mark of the deepest reverence and most profound humility. So Wetstein cites, among many others, Xenophon. 'Then they affectionately kissed Cyrus' hands and feet, shedding many tears, and at the same time showing signs of joy.' And Seneca: 'Cæsar gave wine to Pompey Pennus, whom he had pardoned, and then, on his returning thanks, presented his left foot for him to kiss.' Hence the custom of kissing the pope's feet. The evangelist indicates (Wetstein) that a greater honor was due to Christ than to the king of Persia; and therefore that He is not a mere man who gave his foot to be kissed, well knowing (as Christ must have done) that by the Greeks and Romans this honor was considered as equal to that which is paid to the Deity.'

'I took a lancet out of my pocket-book, put it into his hands, and told him, (as Persian) it was for himself. He looked at me, and at it, with his mouth open, as if he hardly comprehended the possibility of my parting with such a jewel. But when I repeated the words, it was that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, and, having been converted from her wicked course of life by his preaching, she came to acknowledge her obligations to Him, having no opportunity of doing it any other way, than by washing his feet, and anointing them with some sweet ointment that she brought with her for that purpose. The way of sitting at table then was such, that their feet were partly behind them; and this woman did the part of a maid-servant, whose office it was to wash the feet of the guests, (1 Sam. 25: 41.) and to prepare the ointments.

Now in what this good woman did, we may observe,

1. Her deep humiliation for sin; she stood behind Him weeping. Her face is now foul with weeping. We have reason to think she had before sorrowed for sin; but now, coming into the presence of Christ, the wound bled afresh and her sorrow renewed. Note, It well becomes penitents, in all their approaches to Christ, to renew their godly sorrow and shame for sin, when He is pacified, Ezek. 16: 63.

2. Her strong affection to the Lord Jesus; this was what our Lord Jesus took special notice of, that she loved much; v. 42, 47. She washed his feet, in token of her ready submission to the meanest office in which she might do Him honor. Nay, she washed them with her tears, tears of joy; she was in a transport, to find herself so near her Savior, whom her soul loved. She kissed his feet, as one unworthy of the kisses of his mouth, which the spouse coveted, Cant. 1: 2. It was a kiss of adoration as well as affection; She wiped them with her hair, as one entirely devoted to his honor; and she anointed his feet with the ointment; owning Him hereby to be the Messiah, the Anointed; she anointed his feet, in token of her consent to God's design in anointing his head with the oil of gladness. Note, All true penitents have a dear love to the Lord Jesus.

Verses 40-43. Whilst Simon imagined he had obtained a decisive proof that Jesus was not a prophet, our Lord answered to his inmost thoughts in such a manner as sufficiently evinced that He was far more than a prophet. (Notes, John 2: 23-25. 21: 15-17. 1 Cor 14: 20-25. v. 22-25. Heb. 4: 12, 13. Rev. 2: 20-23. v. 23.) Had He directly attacked the Pharisee upon the subject of his wicked and unreasonable pride, and unfeeling disdain of the poor weeping penitent, (as we should have been apt to do), he would probably have been only hardened and irritated by it; but the manner, in which Jesus addressed him, was admirably suited to convince, without affronting him. (Notes, Matt. 18: 23-35.) The longer men live in sin, the more advantages they abuse, and the more mischief they do, the greater is their actual guilt; yet pride, and ignorance of God, of the evil of sin, and of themselves, impose on many to think their debt small, when it is indeed very large. But the convictions, which spring from divine illumination, always lead men to consider themselves as great sinners; and when they attain to a comfortable sense of forgiveness, by the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus, their love and gratitude are proportioned to the degree of their humiliation. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5: 13-15. Eph. 3: 8.) (40.) Master, &c.] O teacher, speak. Considering the state of Simon's mind, this address seems not only hypocritical, but sarcastical.

(41.) A certain creditor.] 'It is plain, that, in this parable, our Lord means by creditor, God, and by the two debtors, Simon and the woman who was present. Simon, who had the light of the law, and whose, by his profession, was a Pharisee, was obliged to abstain from outward iniquity, might be considered as the debtor who owed only fifty pence. The woman, whom I have supposed to be a heathen, not having these advantages, having no rule to regulate her actions, and no curb on her evil propensities, may be considered as the debtor who owed five hundred pence. The circumstance, that both were alike insolvent, or that the religious Pharisee could no more pay his debt, than the heathen woman her five hundred, shows how, except that both were freely forgiven, both must finally perish.'

Dr A. CLARKE.

43 Simon answered and said, "I suppose that he to whom he forgave most. And he said unto him, "Thou hast rightly judged.

[Practical Observations.]

44 And he turned to the woman, and said unto Simon, "Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house: thou gavest me no water for my feet; but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head.

45 Thou gavest me no kiss; but this woman, since the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet.

46 Mine head with oil thou didst not anoint; but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment.

47 Wherefore, I say unto thee, her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much: but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little.

48 And he said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven.

49 And they that sat at meat with him began to say within themselves, "Who is this that forgiveth sins also?"

50 And he said to the woman, "Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace.

Now, in his answer,

1. He, by a parable, forces Simon to acknowledge, that the greater sinner this woman had been, the greater love she ought to show to Jesus Christ when her sins were pardoned; v. 41—43. From which, besides the answer to the Pharisee, we may learn the duty between debtor and creditor. The debtor, if he have any thing to pay, ought to make satisfaction to his creditor. No man can reckon that his own, or have any comfortable enjoyment of it, but that which is so when all his debts are paid. But if God in his providence hath disabled the debtor to pay his debt, the creditor ought not to be severe with him, nor to go to the utmost rigor of the law with him, but freely to forgive him. The law, stretched into rigor, becomes unjust. Let the unmerciful creditor read that parable, (Matt. 18: 23, &c.) and tremble; for they shall have judgment without mercy, that show no mercy. Yet, the debtor that has found his creditors merciful, ought to be very grateful to them; and if he cannot otherwise recompense them, ought to love them. Some insolvent debtors, instead of being grateful, are spiteful, and cannot give their creditors a good word, only because they complain; whereas losers may have leave to speak. But this parable speaks of God as the Creditor, (or rather of the Lord Jesus Himself, for He it is that forgives, and is beloved by the debtor,) and sinners are the debtors.

Now, sin is a debt, and sinners are debtors to God Almighty. As creatures, we owe a debt, a debt of obedience to the precept of the law, and for non-payment of that, as sinners, we become liable to the penalty. God has an action against us for the injury we have done Him, and the omission of our duty to Him.

Some are deeper in debt to God, by reason of sin, than others are, v. 41. The Pharisee was the less debtor, yet he a debtor too, which was more than he thought himself, but rather that God was his debtor, Luke 13: 10, 11. This woman, that had been a scandalous, notorious sinner, was the greater debtor. Some sinners are in themselves greater debtors than others; and some are so by reason of divers aggravating circumstances; having sinned most openly and scandalously, against greater light and knowledge, more convictions and warnings, and more mercies and means.

And, whether our debt be more or less, it is more than we are able to pay; They had nothing

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 36—43. Those who seek to do good to souls, must meekly bear with the perverseness of opposers, and avoid all affected moroseness; the better to gain access to sinners, and obtain a hearing from them.—None can perceive the preciousness of Christ, or the glory of the Gospel, except the broken-hearted. But while these cannot sufficiently express their self-abbhorrence, or their admiration of his grace, the self-sufficient will even think the worse of the Gospel for giving encouragement to them! and men of this character often feel a deeper enmity against Christ, and his disciples, than they choose to avow. But did they know the real state of mankind and of their own souls, they must perceive the folly and wickedness of their objections; for 'all,' without exception, 'have sinned, and come short of the glory of God.' (Notes, Rom. 3: 21—25, v. 21—23. Gal. 3: 10—14, 19—22.)—Who can perform one service, which is free from every defect or alloy of sin? Without free forgiveness, we can none of us escape the wrath to come; and this, our gracious Savior has procured by his atoning blood, that He might freely bestow it on every one who believes in Him.

Verses 44—50.

(Marg. Ref.—Gen. 29: 13. Notes, Gen. 18: 3—8, v. 4. Ps. 2: 10—12, v. 12.) Many expositors would render verse 47, 'Therefore she loved much,' though they allow this use of the Greek participle to be very uncommon. But there seems no occasion for the alteration; and, in fact, no indisputable instance of its being used in this sense has ever been produced. Her love was not the cause of her forgiveness, which is ascribed to her faith, (50.) but it was an evidence of it; for it proved the sincerity of her repentance and faith in Christ, from which her forgiveness might with certainty be inferred. (Notes, Matt. 10: 37—39, John 21: 15—17, 1 Cor. 16: 22—24, v. 22, 2 Cor. 5: 13—15, Eph. 6: 21—24, v. 24, 1 Pet. 1: 8, 7.) Indeed, if her love to Christ had arisen from the assurance that her sins were forgiven, there would have been no occasion for Him repeatedly to assure her that they were; but He pointed out the effects of her fervent love, both to comfort her drooping heart, and to silence her rigorous judges. The word, rendered 'wherefore,' signifies, on account of which, or for the sake of which, A, and seems at least to induce as much difficulty as that translation 'for.'—Thus our Lord intimated, that the Pharisees, forming such an erroneous estimate of their own character, could not properly value salvation by grace, or love the gracious Savior of lost sinners; and were it possible, that, in this state of mind, they should be pardoned, they could only 'love a little,' and give Him the formal, cool reception, that Simon had done: instead of showing, by every action, the fervent love and gratitude of this deeply-humbled penitent. It is plain, that our Lord addressed Simon, according to his own thoughts of himself, and not according to the real state of the case, when He seemed to allow that he 'loved a little.' This was frequently his manner; (Note, 15: 25—32.) and there was something in it very conciliating, though plain and faithful. He certainly did not treat all Pharisees alike, or pursue every one, whose heart was not right before God, with all that severity, which He expressed against those, who combined with their self-righteousness the most detestable hypocrisy and enormous wickedness. Some preachers and authors have perhaps too much overlooked this. (Notes, Matt. 9: 2—8, Mark 2: 3—12.) (50) Thy faith hath saved thee. Here these words must relate to eternal salvation. (Note, Acts 4: 5—12, v. 12.)

(44.) Thou givest Me no water. 'In this respect, Simon was sadly deficient in civil respect, whether this proceeded from forgetfulness or contempt. The custom of giving water to wash the guests' feet was very ancient. See instances in Gen. 18: 4, 21: 32, v. 19, 21: 1 Sam. 25: 41. In Hindoostan it is the custom, that when

How well was she paid for her pains and cost, when she was dismissed with this word from Christ, Thy sins are forgiven, and what an effectual prevention would this be of her return to sin again! Though some present quarrelled with Christ, in their own minds, for presuming to forgive sin, and pronounce sinners absolved, (v. 49.) as those had done, (Matt. 9:3.) yet He stood to what He had said; for as He had there proved that He had power to forgive sin, by curing the man sick of the palsy, and therefore would not here take notice of the cavil, so He would now show that He had pleasure in forgiving sin, and it was his delight: He loves to speak pardon and peace to penitents; (v. 50.) He said to the woman, Thy faith hath saved thee. This would confirm and double her comfort in the forgiveness of her sin, that she much; for it is plain, by the tenor of Christ's discourse, that her loving much was not the cause, but the effect of her pardon, and of her comfortable sense of it; for we love God because He first loved us: He did not forgive us because we first loved Him. 'But to whom little is forgiven, as is to thee, the same loved little, as thou dost.' Hereby He intimates to the Pharisee, that his love to Christ was so little, that He had reason to question whether he loved Him at all in sincerity; and, consequently, whether indeed his sins, though comparatively little, were forgiven him. Instead of grudging greater sinners the mercy they find with Christ, on their repentance, we should be stirred up by their example to examine ourselves, whether we be indeed forgiven, and do love Christ.

4. He silenced her fears, who, probably, was discouraged by the Pharisee's offence, and yet would not so far yield to the discouragement as to fly off. Christ said unto her, Thy sins are forgiven, v. 48. Note, The more we express our sorrow for sin, and our love to Christ, the clearer evidence we have of the forgiveness of our sins; for it is by the experience of a work of grace wrought in us, that we obtain the assurance of an act of grace, wrought for us.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 44-50. He who is convinced of his own great sinfulness, and expects pardon and salvation, as 'the gift of God in Jesus Christ,' will in proportion become humble, patient, contented, teachable and obedient. Thus it often happens, that 'the chief of sinners,' having been brought to repentance, and made joyful by a free forgiveness and salvation, become more zealous and active in obedience than other believers: 'they love much, because much hath been forgiven them;' and they labor much, because they love much. In the case of others, deep humiliation will always be connected with a proportionable love and willing obedience, when it is accompanied with a good hope that all their sins are pardoned. The scanty, formal services, therefore, of too many prove, either that they have no proper sense of their guilt, and no just views of the preciousness of Christ, and the redeemed sinner's obligations to Him; or that they 'love little,' because they suppose that 'little has been forgiven them.' But when a real and vigorous love to Christ, springing from sorrow for sin, and the hope of forgiveness through Him, is expressed by such methods as a man's situation admits of, we may from it safely infer, that his 'sins, though many, are forgiven;' and thus give him great encouragement, without in the least palliating his guilt: and was justified by her faith. All these expressions of sorrow for sin, and love to Christ, were the effects and products of faith; and therefore as faith, of all graces, doth most honor God, so Christ doth, of all graces, put most honor on faith. Note, They who know that their faith hath saved them, may go in peace, may go on their way rejoicing.

CHAP. VIII. v. 1-3. Most of this chapter is a repetition of divers passages of Christ's preaching and miracles, which we had before in Matthew and Mark; they are all of such weight, that they are worth repeating, and therefore they are repeated, that out of the mouth not only of two, but of three witnesses, every word may be established.

We are here told,

I. What Christ made the constant business of his life—it was preaching; in that work He was indefatigable, and went about doing good; (v. 1.) afterward—in the proper time or method. Christ took his work before Him, and went about it regularly; He observed a series, or order of business, so as that the end of one good work was the beginning of another. Now observe here,

1. Where He preached; He went about. He did not confine Himself to one place. He went about through every city, that none might plead ignorance. Hereby He set an example to his disciples; they must traverse the nations of the earth, as He did the cities of Israel. Nor did He confine Himself to the cities, but went into the villages, among the plain country-people, to preach to the inhabitants of the villages, Judg. 5: 11.

2. What He preached; the glad tidings of when the witnessing Spirit makes it evident to the believer's conscience, that he does indeed love Christ, he may know more certainly that 'his sins are forgiven,' than if an angel from heaven had told him so. Let who will object and murmur, Christ will assert his authority of thus forgiving sin, and of bidding the weeping penitent 'depart in peace,' as partaking of salvation through faith in his name.—But may not we with shame confess, that while we hope that our many and great offences are freely pardoned, we yet comparatively love but little? If this be the case, we should seek for more heart-affecting views of our own vileness, and of Christ's preciousness: we should 'give diligence to make our calling and election sure,' and strive to get deeper impressions of our obligations to Jesus, and expectations from Him: that we may stand at a greater distance from the proud spirit of the Pharisee; that we may more simply trust and rejoice in the Savior alone; and so be prepared to obey Him more zealously, and more cordially to recommend Him to our fellow-sinners on every side, and be made more meet for the society and songs of heaven. (Notes, and P. O. Rev. 5: 8-14. 7: 9-17.) superior enters the house of an inferior, the latter washes his feet, and gives him water to rinse his mouth before he eats.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(45.) I came in.] 'The evangelist so expressly tells us that she heard of Christ's being at dinner with the Pharisees where she came in, (v. 37.) that I make no doubt of following those copies which read, she came in, rather than those which our translation follows.'

DODDRIE.

(46.) My head with oil thou didst not anoint.] This anointing was as common among the Jews, as washing the face with water is among us. See Ruth 3: 3. 2 Sam. 12: 20. 14: 2. 2 Kings 4: 2. and Ps. 23: 5. where the author alludes to the Jewish manner of receiving and entertaining a guest. Thou preparest a table for me; anointest my head with oil; givest me an overflowing cup. See Matt. 5: 17.

(47.) For she loved much.] 'Or, therefore she loved much. In the common translation, her forgiveness is represented to be the consequence of her loving much, which is causing the tree to produce the root, and not the root the tree.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

'This parable of the debtors, (as Campbell observes,) clearly represents the gratuitous forgiveness as the cause of the love, not the love as the cause of the forgiveness. And this on the other hand, in v. 50. is ascribed to her faith. "This love, or gratitude, (says Markland,) could not be the cause, but was the effect, or consequence of her forgiveness; the cause was her faith. The papists indeed, (observes Wolf,) have, from this passage strenuously contended for love, as the meritorious cause of the remission of sins." But this is plainly contrary to the scope of the passage. I entirely assent to Doddridge, that however strenuously Clarus opposes this mode of interpretation, and notwithstanding the immense pains which Grotius has taken to find a sense in that which our translation follows, the connection evidently requires, that we should render the Greek particle used here, therefore, rather than for, or because. In this indeed, almost all the critics agree.'

BLOOMFIELD.

(50.) Go in peace.] 'Though peace of conscience be the inseparable consequence of the pardon of sin, yet here it seems to be used as a benediction or farewell; as if He had said, May goodness and mercy continue to follow thee! In this sense it is certainly used, Judg. 18: 6. 1 Sam. 1: 17. 20: 42. 29: 7. 2 Sam. 15: 9. Jam. 2: 16.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

'It was an affectionate form of dismissing those to whom a favor had been granted, especially (as we find) after healing; still more, of those who, as here, had received forgiveness of sins.'

BLOOMFIELD.

'There is an apparent propriety in the phrase here, considering what had happened to discompose the tender spirit of this humble penitent.'

CHAP. VIII. v. 1-3. (Marg. R^c—(2.) Mary, called Magdalene, &c.) Notes, 7: 37-39. Mark 16: 1-11. (3.) Joanna, &c.) Some have conjectured that 'Chiuza, Herod's steward;' was the nobleman, or courtier, whose son Jesus had healed. (Notes, John 4: 43-54.) Doubtless, it was by his consent that his wife accompanied Jesus, when journeying to preach the Gospel. As our Lord chose to be 'poor for our sakes,' and did not work miracles for his own support, these pious women, who had been under the greatest obligations to Him, in respect both to their souls and bodies, being also in good circumstances, were glad to communicate, from their substance, to the maintenance of Him and his disciples, as well as personally to attend Him; and He was pleased to stoop thus low, for an example to his servants and disciples in similar circumstances. It does not appear that any men shared this honor 'of ministering to Christ of their substance.'

3. Who were his attendants; the twelve were; not to preach if He were present, but to learn from Him what and how to preach hereafter, and, if occasion were, to be sent to places where He could not go. Happy were these his servants that heard his wisdom.

II. Whence He had the necessary supports of life; He lived on the kindness of his friends; there were certain women who frequently attended his ministry, that ministered to Him of their substance, v. 2, 3. Some of them are named; but there were many others, who were zealously affected to the doctrine of Christ, and thought themselves bound in justice to encourage it, having themselves found benefit, and in charity, hoping that many others might find benefit by it too.

They were such, for the most part, as had been Christ's patients, and were the monuments of his power and mercy; they had been healed by Him of evil spirits and infirmities. Some of them had been troubled in mind, had been melancholy, others of them afflicted in body, and He had been to them a powerful Healer. He is the Physician both of body and soul, and those who have been healed by Him, ought to study what they shall render to Him. We are bound in interest to attend Him, and in gratitude to serve Him and his Gospel.

One of them was Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils; a certain number for an uncertain. Some think she was one that had been very wicked, and then we may suppose her to be the woman that was a sinner, mentioned just before, ch. 7. Dr. Lightfoot, finding in some of the Talmudists' writings that Mary Magdalene signified Mary the plaiter of hair, thinks it applicable to her, she having been noted in the days of her iniquity and infamy, for that plaiting of hair, which is opposed to modest apparel, 1 Tim. 2:9. But though she had been an immodest woman, on her repentance and reformation she found mercy, and became a zealous disciple of Christ. Note, The greatest of sinners must not despair of pardon; and the worse any have been before their conversion, the more they should study to do for Christ after. Or rather, she was one that had been very melancholy, and then, probably, it was Mary the sister of Lazarus, who was a woman of a sorrowful spirit; who might have been originally of Magdala, but removed to Bethany. This Mary Magdalene was attending on Christ's cross and his sepulchre, and if she was not Mary the sister of Lazarus, either that particular friend and favorite of Christ's did not attend then, or the evangelists did not take notice of her, neither of which we can suppose; thus Dr. Lightfoot argues. Yet there is this to be objected against it, that Mary Magdalene is reckoned among the women that followed Jesus from Galilee (Matt. 27:55, 56.) whereas Mary the sister of Lazarus had her residence in Bethany.

Another of them was Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward. She had been a wife, (so some,) but was now a widow, and left in good circumstances; if she was now his wife, we have reason to think that her husband, though preferred in Herod's court, had received the Gospel, and was very willing that his wife should be both a hearer of Christ, and a contributor to Him.

There were many of them that ministered to Christ of their substance. It was an instance of the meanness of that condition to which our Savior humbled Himself, that He needed it, and his great humility and condescension, that He accepted it. Though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, and lived on alms. Let none say that they scorn to be beholden to the charity of their neighbors, when Providence has brought them into straits; but let them ask, and be thankful for it as a favor. Christ would rather be beholden to his known friends for a maintenance for Himself and his disciples, than be burdensome to strangers in the cities and villages whither He came to preach. Note, It is the duty of those who are taught in the Word, to communicate to them who teach them in all good things; and those who are herein liberal and cheerful, honor the Lord with their substance, and bring a blessing upon it.

V. 4-21. The former paragraph began with an account of Christ's industry in preaching; (v. 1.) this begins with an account of the people's industry in hearing, v. 4. There were those that would not stay till He came to them, nor think that they had heard enough when He left them, but met Him when He was coming toward them, and followed Him when He was going from them. Yet most had not zeal enough to bring them to Him, and therefore such is his wonderful condescension, that He will go to them; for He is found of those that sought Him not, Isa. 65: 1.

Here was, it seems, a vast concourse; (v. 4.) and He was as ready and willing to teach as they were to be taught. Now in these verses, we have,

I. Necessary and excellent rules and cautions for hearing the Word, in the parable of the sower, and the explanation and application of it, all which we had twice before more largely. When Christ had put forth this parable, I. The disciples were inquisitive concerning the meaning of it, v. 9. Note, We should covet earnestly to know the true intent, and full extent, of the word we hear, that we may be neither mistaken nor defective in our knowledge. 2. Christ made them sensible of what great advantage it was to them, that they had opportunity of acquainting themselves with the mystery and meaning of his word, which others had not; v. 10. Note, Those who would receive instruction from Christ, must know and consider what a privilege it is to be instructed

(2.) Out of whom came seven devils. 'Tis is supposed by Gregory to have been only a proverbial expression, to signify that she was a person of a very bad character, whom Jesus reclaimed; and M. L'Enfant advances the same interpretation, as agreeable to the Jewish style; but, as so much is spoken of dispossessions in the proper sense of the word by Luke, it is most natural to suppose this to be referred to here.

The number seven may here express the superlative degree.

(3.) Steward. 'Tis though the original word signifies sometimes the inspector or overseer of a province, and sometimes a tutor of children, yet here it seems to signify the overseer of Herod's domestic affairs; the steward of his household. Steward of the household was an officer in the king's palace by s. 24 of Henry VIII. The person is now entitled lord steward of the king's household, and the office is, I believe, more honorable and of more importance than when it was first created.

Ministered unto Him. 'Many of the best MSS. and versions have, (a them,) i. e. our Lord and the twelve apostles. This is unquestionably the true reading. Christ receives these assistances and ministrations, says Quenel, to honor poverty by subjecting Himself to it, to humble Himself in receiving from his creatures; that He may teach the ministers of the Gospel to depend on the providence of their heavenly Father; to make way for the gratitude of those He had healed; and that He might not be burdensome to the poor to whom He went to preach.' Dr. A. Clarke. May we not suppose also, that He intends by it a lesson of that universal charity required of us in his Gospel? Gal. 6: 10.

Verses 4-15. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 13: 3-23; Mark 4: 1-20.) (5.) It was trodden, &c. 'This seems to signify a great contempt of the divine seed.' Whithy. (12.) Believe, &c. The inseparable connection of faith with salvation, and of unbelief with damnation, is here strongly marked, and is considered as well known to the enemy of our souls. (2 Cor. 4: 3, 4.) (14.) Perfection. Whatever is by any means destroyed, before it arrives at its full growth, and before it is fit for use, is not brought to perfection; and all in religion, which comes short of fruitfulness in good works, according to the time and opportunities vouchsafed, is like the corn that withers before it be ripe. (23: 39-43.) (15.) Honest, &c. (Notes, Jer. 17: 9, 10. Ez. 17: 17-20. John 3: 3-8. Rom. 7: 18-21. 'From these words it is manifest that some good disposition of heart is requisite, to render the word truly and durably fruitful.' Whithy. This no man has by nature, but by grace only. 'God worketh in us to will and to do.' (Notes, John 1: 10-12. Acts 17: 10-15, v. 11, 12. Phil. 2: 12, 13. Jam. 1: 15-17.) 'O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed.' &c. Col. Even. Liturgy. (18.) Should believe and be saved. 'Last believing, i. e. and be saved.' (15.) With patience. (21: 19. Rom. 7: 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.)

And when he had said these things he cried, 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.'

9 And his disciples asked him, saying, 'What might this parable be?'

10 And he said, 'Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God; but to others in parables, "that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand."

11 Now the parable is this; 'The seed is the word of God.'

12 Those 'by the way-side are they that hear; 'then cometh the devil, and taketh away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved.'

13 They on the rock are they, which, when they hear, 'receive the word with joy; 'and these have no root, 'which or a while believe, and in time of temptation fall away.'

14 And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth, 'and are choked with cares, and riches, and pleasures of this life, 'and bring no fruit to perfection.'

15 But that on the good ground are they, which, 'in an honest and good heart, having heard the word, 'keep it, and 'bring forth fruit with patience.'

16 ¶ No man, 'when he hath lighted a candle, covereth it with a by Him, when others are left untaught. Happy are we, and forever indebted to free grace, if the same thing thus 'as a parable to others, is a plain truth to us, by which we are enlightened and governed, and into the mould of which we are delivered.'

Now from the parable itself, and the explanation of it, observe,

1. The heart of man is as soil to the seed of God's Word; it is capable of receiving it, and bringing forth the fruits of it; but unless that seed be sown in it, it will bring forth nothing valuable; our care therefore must be to bring the seed and the soil together. To what purpose have we the seed in the Scripture, if it be not sown? and to what purpose the soil in our own hearts, if it be not sown with that seed?

2. The success of the seed-time is very much according to the nature and temper of the soil, and as that is, or is not, disposed to receive the seed. The Word of God is to us, as we are, a savor of life unto life, or of death unto death.

3. The devil is a subtle, spiteful enemy, that makes it his business to hinder our profiting by the word of God. He takes the word out of the hearts of careless hearers, (p. 12.) lest they should believe and be saved; that is added here, to teach us, 1. That we cannot be saved unless we believe. The word of the Gospel will not be a saving word to us, unless it be mixed with faith. 2. That therefore the devil does all he can to keep us from believing, to make us not heed the word when we read and hear it; or, if we heed it for the present, to make us forget it again, and let it slip; (Heb. 2: 1.) or, if we remember it, to create prejudices in our minds against it, or direct our minds from it to something else; all, lest we should believe and be saved, lest we should believe and rejoice, while he believes and trembles.

4. Where the word of God is heard carelessly, there is commonly a contempt put upon it too. It is added here in the parable, that the seed which fell by the way-side, was trodden down, p. 5. They that willfully shut their ears against the word, do in effect trample it under their feet; they despise the commandment of the Lord.

5. Those on whom the word makes some impressions, but not deep and durable ones, will show their hypocrisy in a time of trial; as the seed sown upon the rock, where it gains no root, p. 13. These will 'for a while believe, a little while; their profession promises something, but in time of temptation they fall away from their good beginnings; whether the temptation arise from the smiles, or from the frowns, of the world, they are easily overcome by it.

6. The pleasures of this life are as dangerous and mischievous thorns to choke the good seed of the Word, as any other. That is added here, (p. 14.) which was not in the other evangelists. Those that are not entangled in the cares of this life, nor inveigled with the deceitfulness of riches, but boast that they are dead to them, may yet be kept from heaven by an affected indolence, and the love of ease and pleasure. The delights of sense may ruin the soul, even lawful delights, indulged, and too much delighted in.

7. It is not enough that the fruit be brought forth, but it must be brought to perfection, it must be fully ripened; if it be not, it is as if there was no fruit at all brought forth; for that which in Matthew and Mark is said to be unfruitful, is the same that here is said to bring forth none to perfection. Perseverance is necessary to the perfection of a work.

8. The good ground, which brings forth good fruit, is an honest and good heart, well disposed to receive instruction and commandment; (p. 19.) a heart free from sinful pollutions, and firmly fixed for God and duty, an upright heart, a tender heart, and a heart that trembles at the word, is an honest and good heart; which, having heard the word, understands it, (so in Matthew,) receives it, (so in Mark,) and keeps it, (so here,) as the soil not only receives, but keeps the seed; and the stomach not only receives, but keeps, the food or physic.

9. Where the word is well kept, there is fruit brought forth with patience; that also is added here; there must be both bearing patience, and waiting patience; patience, to suffer the tribulation and persecution which may arise because of the word; patience, to continue to the end in well-doing.

10. In consideration of all this, we ought to take heed how we hear; (p. 18.) take heed of those things that will hinder our profiting by the word we hear, watch over our hearts in hearing, and take heed lest they betray us; take heed lest we hear carelessly and slightly, lest, on any account, we entertain prejudices against the word we hear; and take heed to the frame of our spirits after we have heard the word, lest we lose what we have gained.

(10.) To others in parables.' A learned writer has endeavored to prove that Christ's use of parables was not in displeasure, but in tender condescension to their aversion to truths delivered in a less pleasing manner; but this is in effect supposing both Mark (4: 12), and Luke (8: 10) to have reported what our Lord says in a sense directly contrary to what He intended; for they say in so many words, it was that the multitude might not perceive nor understand; and it also makes Matthew 13: 12. both foreign and opposite to the purpose for which it was spoken. We must, therefore, submit to the difficulties which attended this natural interpretation; which are much lessened by considering that this happened after Christ had upbraided and threatened the neighboring places, (from whence doubtless the greatest part of the 'in Jude came') which was some time before this sermon. See Matt 11: 24-24. And it is not improbable, that the scribes and Pharisees, who had so vilely blasphemed Him this very morning, (Matt. 12: 24) might with an ill purpose have gathered a company of their associates and creatures about Christ to ensnare Him, which, if it were the case, will fully account for such a reserve. It signifies little to plead on the other side, that these parables are plain. Their being so to us, is no proof they were so to these hearers; and since the apostles themselves did not understand even that of the sower, it is no wonder if the rest were unintelligible to the careless and captious hearer.'

Unto you it is given, &c.] 'As a reward of your diligence, and desire to be informed, these things shall be explained unto you; but the rest shall be left in darkness, and shall have their voluntary ignorance punished with judicial ignorance.'

Dean STANHOPE.

(14.) Choked with cares.] 'So expressed, perhaps, to intimate the uneasy situation of the mind, while clogged and straitened with such intricate cares as these, and rendered as it were, unfit to receive the word, native air, and to delight itself with celestial and eternal objects. Choking arises from any thing which straitens the gullet, or windpipe, or so obstructs the passage of food or air. And thus young plants, or corn, may properly be said to be choked by thorns, which do not leave them room to grow; and the Word, which would exert its vital power and principle, is represented as choked, when thus pressed with secular cares prevailing in the mind.'

(15.) With patience.] 'Patience, in the ordinary acceptance, is a virtue merely passive, and consists in suffering evil with equanimity. The Greek word here implies much more; and though the sense now mentioned is not excluded, it generally denotes an active quality, to wit, constancy in purpose and practice. It corresponds exactly to what is with us called perseverance.'

(Notes, Matt. 13. 12. 25: 34-30, p. 29.) Whatever of natural genius, learning, wealth, authority, influence, religious knowledge, spiritual gifts, or even power of working miracles any man had; if he had not saving and sanctifying grace, he only seems to have it, and it will soon be torn from him. vesse, or putteth it under a bed; but setteth it on a candlestick, that they which enter in may see the light.

17 For ^{nothing} is secret, that shall not be made manifest; neither any thing hid, that shall not be known and come abroad.

18 Take heed therefore how ye hear: ^{for} whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, ^{from} him shall be taken even that which he ^{seemeth} to have.

19 ¶ Then ^{came} to him his mother and his brethren, and could not come to him for the press.

20 And it was told him by certain, which said, Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to see thee.

21 And he answered and said unto them, ^{My} mother and my brethren are these which hear the word of God, and do it.

22 ¶ Now it came to pass on a certain day, that he went into a ship with his disciples; and he said unto them, ^{Let} us go over unto the other side of the lake. And they launched forth.

23 But as they sailed, ^{he} fell asleep: and ^{came} down a storm of wind on the lake; and they were filled with water, and were in jeopardy.

24 And they came to him, and awoke him, saying, Master, master, we perish. Then ^{he} arose and rebuked the wind, and the raging of the water; and they ceased, and there was a calm.

II. Needful instructions given to those that are appointed to preach the Word, and to those also that have heard it.

1. Those that have received the gift, must minister the same. Ministers that have the dispensing of the Gospel committed to them, people that have profited by the word, and are thereby qualified to profit others, must look upon themselves as lighted candles: ministers must in solemn authoritative preaching, and people in brotherly familiar discourse, diffuse their light; a candle must not be covered, v. 16. Ministers and Christians are to be lights in the world, holding forth the word of life; their light must shine before men, they must not only be good, but do good.

2. We must expect that what is now done in secret, and from unseen springs, will shortly be manifested and made known, v. 17. What is committed to you in secret, should be made manifest by you; for your Master did not give you talents to be buried, but to be traded with. Let that which is now hid, be made known; for if it be not manifested by you, it will be manifested against you, will be produced in evidence of your treachery.

3. The gifts we have, will either be continued to us, or taken from us, according as we do, or do not, make use of them for the glory of God, and the edification of our brethren; (v. 19.) he that hath gifts, and doeth good with them, shall have more; he that buries his talent, shall lose it. From him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath, so it is in Mark; that which he seemeth to have, so it is in Luke. Note, The grace that is lost, was but seeming grace, was never true. Men do but seem to have what they do not use, and shows of religion will be lost and forfeited; they went out from us, because they were not of us, 1 John 2:19. Let us see to it that we have grace in sincerity, the root of the matter in us; that is a good part, which shall never be taken away from those that have it.

III. Great encouragement given to those that prove themselves faithful hearers of the word, by being doers of the work, in a particular instance of Christ's respect to his disciples, in preferring them even before his nearest relations; (v. 19—21.) which we had twice before. Observe, 1. What crowding there was after Christ; there was no coming near for the throng of people that attended Him. 2. Some of his nearest kindred were least solicitous to hear Him preach. Instead of getting within, desiring to hear Him, they stood without, desiring to see Him; designing nothing but to interrupt Him, and oblige Him to break off. 3. Jesus Christ would rather be busy at his work, than conversing with his friends. He would not leave his preaching, to speak with his mother and his brethren, for it was his meat and drink to be so employed. 4. Christ is pleased to own those as his nearest and dearest relations, that hear the word of God, and do it; they are to Him more than his mother and brethren.

(18.) Take heed therefore how ye hear. 'Take heed that you attend to my words; for they must be listened to studiously and with diligence since they are symbolical and sublime, and not spoken at random, or by chance.'

'Every advantage bestowed on us by Providence, and religious instruction especially, is a trust, of which we must hereafter give account. We should therefore hear the words of eternal life with attention, impartiality, and seriousness of heart, mixed with faith; not a mere historical persuasion of the truth of the Gospel, though with this we are to begin; but a deep sense of the need of God's mercy promised in it; a thankful acceptance of the terms on which that mercy is offered; and an humble reliance on a crucified Savior for pardon, grace, and strength.'

SEEMETH TO HAVE. 'Matthew and Mark have, "which he hath." The best critics therefore agree in thinking that there is here a redundancy of the Greek word translated "seemeth," examples of which are given by Kypke, Munth, Kuinoel, and others. But in most of the passages which they cite, we may, on close examination, find some meaning in this word; and I am inclined to think, that Luke here intended to express something more than is found in Matthew and Mark; though it turns upon a distinction perhaps too refined for common apprehension.'

Verses 19—21. (Marg. Ref.—11:27. 28. Matt. 12:46—50. Mark 3:31—35.) 'This might be intended as an awful intimation of some of his near relations, to take heed how they indulged that rebellion, which so long after prevailed in their minds.' Doddridge. (John 7:8—10.)

(20.) To see that he. 'The antecedent is not forth; consequent, "to see," for to "converse with;" examples of which are produced by Wolf, Wetstein, and Kypke. So Theodoret says, "It is not Atticism,"' BLOOMFIELD.

25 And he said unto them, ^aWhere is your faith? And they ^bbeing afraid, wondered, saying one to another, What manner of man is this? for he commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him.

[Practical Observations.]

26 ¶ And they arrived at ^cthe country of the Gadarenes, which is over against Galilee.

27 And when he went forth to land, there ^dmet him out of the city a certain man which had devils a long time, ^eand wore no clothes, neither abode in ^fany house, ^gbut in the tombs.

28 When he saw Jesus, ^hhe cried out, and fell down before him, and with a loud voice said, ⁱWhat have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God most high? ^jI beseech thee torment me not.

29 (For he had ^kcommanded the unclean spirit to come out of the man. For oftentimes it had ^lcaught him, and he was kept bound with chains, and in fetters; and he brake the bands, and are discouraged, if second causes frown on them; a little thing disheartens them; and where is their faith then? (2.) They give Him the glory of his power; They, being afraid, wondered. Those that had feared the storm, now that the danger was over, with good reason feared Him that had stilled it; and said, What manner of man is this? They might as well have said, Who is a God like unto Thee? For it is God's prerogative, to still the noise of the sea, the noise of the waves, Ps. 65: 7.

II. His power over the devil, the prince of the power of the air. Presently after the winds were stilled, they were brought to their desired haven; (v. 26, 27.) and soon, as they went ashore, He met with that which was his business over.

We may learn a great deal from this story concerning this world of infernal, malignant spirits, which, though not working now ordinarily, in the same way as here, yet we are all concerned, at all times, to stand on our guard against.

1. They are very numerous. They that had taken possession of this one man, called themselves Legion; (v. 30.) he had had devils a long time, v. 27. But perhaps those that had been long in possession of him, on some foresight of our Savior's coming, finding they could not prevent it by the storm, sent for recruits, intending a decisive battle, and hoping now to be too hard for Him that had cast out so many unclean spirits, and either were, or at least would be thought to be, a legion of them, and now, at least, to be a victorious legion.

2. They have an inveterate enmity to man, and all his conveniences and comforts. This man, being under their influence, wore no clothes, neither abode in any house, v. 27. Nay, and because man has a natural dread of the habitations of the dead, they forced this man to abide in the tombs, to make him so much the more a terror to himself, and to all about him, so that his soul had as much cause as ever any man's was driven of the devil into the wilderness.)

30 And Jesus asked him, saying, What is thy name? And he said, ^mLegion: be-had, to be weary of his life, and to choose slighting and death rather.

3. They are very strong, fierce, and unruly, and hate and scorn to be restrained, v. 29. Note, Those that are ungovernable by any other, thereby show that they are under Satan's government; and this is the language of those that are so, even concerning God and Christ their best friends, Let us break their bands in sunder. He was driven of the devil; those that are under Christ's government, are sweetly lea with the cords of a man, and the bands of love; those that are under the devil's government, are furiously driven.

4. They are much enraged against our Lord Jesus, and have a great dread and horror of Him. When the man whom they had possession of, and who spake as they would have him saw Jesus, he roared out as one in an agony, and fell down before Him, to deprecate his wrath, and owned Him to be the Son of God, most high, that was infinitely above him, and too hard for him; but protested against having any league or confederacy with Him; (which might sufficiently have silenced the blasphemous cavils of the scribes and Pharisees;) What have I to do with Thee? The devils have neither inclination to serve Christ, nor expectation to receive benefit by Him, but dread his power and wrath. They do not say, I beseech Thee, save me, but only, Torment me not. See whose language they speak, that have only a dread of hell as a place of torment, but no desire of heaven as a place of holiness and love.

5. They are perfectly at the command, and under the power, of our Lord Jesus, and they knew it, v. 31. O what a comfort is this to the Lord's people, that all the powers of darkness are under the check and control of the Lord Jesus! He has them all in a chain. He can send them into the deep, to their own place, the place of their torment, when He pleaseth.

6. They delight in doing mischief. When

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-25. The ministers of Christ should copy his assiduity and earnestness in preaching, and submit to any hardship or degradation in outward circumstances, which may conduce to the success of the Gospel; and those who have profited by their labors, ought to use their substance in supporting his indigent servants and disciples, as occasion may require, and according to their ability. In this way, as well as in many others, they may bring forth fruit with patience, and evince that the grace of God has indeed made their hearts honest and good, and disposed them to receive the good seed of His Word, preparatory to a glorious harvest. Indeed we should aim, by every method, to discriminate our character and conduct from those of careless hearers, of superficial and temporary professors, and of such as are choked with the cares, riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection. (P. O. Matt. 13: 1-23.) It is not enough for us, 'not to hold the truth in unrighteousness;' we should 'hold forth the word of life,' and shine in our several circles, as a lighted candle in the room, for the benefit of all around. (Phil. 2: 14-18.) Thus professing and recommending the truths of the Gospel, we shall receive more and more from our gracious God; while many 'who seem to have' knowledge, abilities and possessions, not having had grace to make a proper use of them, will shortly be deprived of all; and their poverty, folly and worthlessness, which were before kept secret, made known to the whole world. Happy are they, 'who hear the word of God, and keep it!' Every storm which arises, every peril that dismay them, will tend to excite their fervent prayers; and their Lord will awake for their help and deliverance. Yet, at times, even true believers seem to have mislaid their faith, they have so many anxious fears about the event, even when in the path of duty, concerning which alone we ought to be solicitous. (P. O. Matt. 8: 23-27. 12: 38-50. Mark 4: 1-25.) SCOTT.

(Matt. 8: 28-34. Mark 5: 1-20.) (31.) The deep.] 'The abyss, the prison, in which many of those fallen spirits are detained; and to which some, who may, like those, have been permitted for a while to range at large, are sometimes, by divine justice and power, remanded.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. p.) 'The first request of the devil to Christ was, "I beseech Thee, torment me not." "Art Thou come to torment me before my time?" (Matt. 8: 29.) expressing the devil's fear that he should presently be cast into the chains of hell, and confined to those torments, which he thought belonged not to him till the day of judgment; and the next was, in plain words, not to send him into hell.' Hammond. (Marg. Ref. i. o.) (32.) He suffered them.] But why did Christ grant this to them? Partly to show Himself the sovereign Lord of all; partly to punish the Gadarenes for their manifest contempt of the divine law; and finally to show the folly of ungodly men, in preferring their filthy swine to their own salvation.' Beza.

(26.) They arrived at.] 'They sailed unto.' (36.) Healed.] 'Was delivered,' or 'saved.' The man was rescued by superior power from the legion of evil spirits; and was merely healed of a disease. (39.) Published.] 'Preaching' or 'proclaiming as a herald the whole city.' Gadara was one of the cities of Decapolis, part of which lay on the one side, and part on the other side, of the sea of Tiberias. Gadara suffered great extremities from the Romans under the command of Vespasian.

(27.) Man of the city.] 'The import here evidently is, "a man belonging to the city," not a "man coming from the city."'

(28.) 'Jesus, Thou Son of God, the most High.' 'The words, Jesus and God, are both omitted here by several MSS. They were contained in a summary way to acknowledge his power, but it is probable they did not pronounce names of such dreadful import to themselves. In the parallel passage, (Mar. 8: 29.) Griesbach omits the word Jesus, on the authority of several MSS. of the greatest antiquity and respectability; besides some versio, is, and several of the fathers.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.
(30.) Legion.] 'There is no need of concluding that the number of evil spirits was exactly the same with that of a Roman legion, which was now upward of six thousand. It was a phrase that was often made use of to express a great number. It is observable that Luke here adds, that many demons were entered into him, so that it is evident he thought it not a mere fancy, but a real possession.'

JODDIDGE.

31 And ^a they besought him that he would not command them to go out into ^b the deep.

32 And there was there an herd of many swine feeding on the mountain: and they besought him that he would suffer them to enter into them. And ^c he suffered them.

33 Then went the devils out of the man, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the lake, and were choked.

34 When they that fed them saw what was done, ^d they fled, and went and told it in the city, and in the country.

35 Then they went out to see what was done; and came to Jesus, ^e and found the man, out of whom the devils were departed, ^f sitting at the feet of Jesus, ^g clothed, and in his right mind: and they were afraid.

36 They also which saw ^h it told them by what means he that was possessed of the devils was healed.

37 Then the whole multitude of the country of the Gadarenes round about, ⁱ besought him to depart from them: for they were taken with great fear. ^j And he went up into the ship, and returned back again.

38 Now the man, out of whom the devils were departed, ^k besought him that he might go with him:

they found they must quit their hold of this poor man, they begged they might take possession of a herd of swine, v. 32. When the devil at first brought man into a miserable state, he brought a curse likewise on the whole creation, and that became subject to enmity. And here, as an instance of that extensive enmity of his, when he could not destroy the man, he would destroy the swine. If he cannot hurt men in their bodies, he will hurt them in their goods, which sometimes proves a great temptation to them, to draw them from Christ, as here. Christ suffered them to enter into the swine, to convince the country what mischief the devil could do in it, if He should suffer him, v. 32, 33. It is a miracle of mercy, if those whom Satan possesses, are not brought to destruction and perdition. This, and other instances, show that that roaring lion and red dragon seeks what and whom he may devour.

7. When the devil's power is broken in any soul, that soul recovers itself, and returns into a right frame; which supposes that those whom Satan gets possession of, are put out of the possession of themselves, v. 35. While he was under the devil's power, he was ready to fly in the face of Jesus; but now he sits at his feet, which is a sign that he is come to his right mind. If God have possession of us, He preserves us to the government and enjoyment of ourselves; but if Satan have possession of us, he robs us of both. Let his power therefore in our souls be overturned, and let Him come, whose right our hearts are, and let us give them Him; for we are never more our own, than when we are his.

Let us see now what was the effect of this miracle, of casting the legion of devils out of this man.

(1.) What effect it had on the people of that country, who had lost their swine by it. The swine-herds went, and sold it both in city and country, (v. 34.) perhaps with a design to incense the people against Christ; they told by what means he that was possessed of the devils, was healed, (v. 36.) that it was by sending the devils into the swine, as if Christ could not have delivered the man out of their hands, but by delivering the swine into them. The people came out, to see what was done, and to inquire into it; and they were afraid, (v. 35.) were taken with great fear, (v. 37.) were surprised and amazed, and knew not what to say; but they but Jesus sent him away, ^a saying,

39 Return to thine own house, and shew how great things God hath done unto thee. And he went his way, ^b and published throughout the whole city how great things Jesus had done to him.

40 ¶ And it came to thought more of the destruction of the swine than of the deliverance of their poor afflicted neighbor, and of the country from the terror of his frenzy; therefore the whole multitude besought Christ to depart from them, for fear He should bring some other judgment on them, whereas indeed none need be afraid of Christ, that are willing to forsake their sins, and give up themselves to Him. But Christ took them at their word, v. 37. Those lose their Savior, and their hopes in Him, that love their swine better.

(2.) What effect it had on the poor man who had recovered himself by it. He desired Christ's company as much as others dreaded it; he besought Christ that he might be with Him, as others were, that had been healed by Him of evil spirits and infirmities; (v. 2.) that Christ might be to him a Protector and Teacher, and that he might be to Christ for a name and a praise. He was loath to stay among those rude and brutish Gadarenes. O gather not my soul with these sinners! But Christ would not take him along with Him, but sent him home, to publish, among those that knew him, the great things that God had done for him, that so he might be a blessing to his country, as he had been a burden to it. We must sometimes deny ourselves the satisfaction even of spiritual benefits and comforts, to gain an opportunity of being serviceable to the souls of others. Perhaps Christ knew that, when the resentment of the loss of their swine was a little over, they would be better disposed to consider the miracle, and therefore left the man among them to be a standing monument, and a monitor to them of it.

V. 40—56. Christ was driven away by the Gadarenes: but the Galileans, as He returned, gladly received Him, v. 40. If some will not accept Christ's favors, others will. If the Gadarenes be not gathered, yet there are many, among whom Christ shall be glorious. When Christ returned, He found fresh work to do in the place whence He came. They that will lay out themselves to do good, shall never want occasion for it. The wanting you have always with you.

We have here two miracles interwoven, as they were in Matthew and Mark—the raising of Jairus' daughter to life, and the cure of the woman that had an issue of blood, as He was going in a crowd to Jairus' house.

pass, that when Jesus returned, ^a the people gladly received him; for they were all ^b waiting for him.

Verses 40—56

(Marg. Ref.—Notes, Mark 9: 13—26. Mark 5: 21—43.) (42.) One only daughter.] This affecting circumstance is not mentioned by the other evangelists. (7: 11—17.) (43.) Neither could be healed, &c.] The extreme distress to which several of those, who were healed by our Lord, had been previously reduced, and the length of time during which they had suffered, are frequently noted by the sacred writers both to illustrate his tender compassion of our miseries, and our desperate condition as sinners, without his most gracious and powerful interposition. (Marg. Ref.) (54.) All out, &c.] All the multitude; all but the apostles and the parents of the damsel. (55.) He spirit, &c.] This expression, thus used of one before dead, strongly implies, that at death the immortal soul exists separately, but returns and is reunited to the body, when raised from the dead. (Note, 1 Kings 17: 21, 22.) Commanded, &c.] The life of the damsel, though restored by miracle, was to be preserved in the usual manner. This showed, that she was recovered to health also; and that she wanted food, which during her extreme illness had not been the case. SCOT.

(40.) Gladly received.] This is the proper import of the Greek word; therefore our translators needed not to have put gladly in italics, as though it were not expressed in the text. Raphaelus gives several proofs of this.

Dr. A. CLARK.

(31.) That He would send them out of the country.] 'It seems from Dan. 10: 13, 20. that different evil genii preside over distinct regions.'

DODDRIDGE.

Into the deep.] 'Or abyss, i. e. the Tartarus or jail of the demons. So 2 Pet. 2: 4. Apoc. 20: 1. So also Euripides, "the chasms of the abyss of Tartarus."'

BLOOMFIELD.

(32.) He suffered them.] 'The evils against this miracle are equally malicious and weak. Our Lord's permitting the evil spirits to enter into the swine was not properly sending them into those beasts; or if He had done it, the punishment to the owners would have been just; or had it been less apparently so, his extraordinary character as a prophet, and the proofs he gave of a divine co-operation, would have set him above our censure in an action, the full reasons of which we might not perfectly have known. But this solution is not necessary; for this action evidently appears both wise and gracious; inasmuch as it unanswerably demonstrated at once the malice of Satan and the extent of Christ's power over him. No miracles are more suspicious than pretended dispossessions, as there is so much room for collusion in them; but it was self-evident that a herd of swine could not be confederates in any fraud. Their death, therefore, in this instructive and convincing manner) was ten thousand times a greater blessing to mankind, than if they had been slain for food, as was intended.'

DODDRIDGE.

41 And, behold, there came a man named Jairus, and he was ^a ruler of the synagogue; and he fell down at Jesus' feet, and besought him that he would come into his house :

42 For he had ^a one only daughter, about twelve years of age, and she lay a dying. But as he went, the people thronged him.

43 And a woman ^a having an issue of blood ^a twelve years, which ^a had spent all her living upon physicians, neither could be healed of any,

44 Came behind him, and touched the border of his garment: and immediately her issue of blood stancheth.

45 And Jesus said, Who touched me? When all denied, Peter and they that were with him said, Master, the multitude throng thee, and press thee, and sayest thou, Who touched me?

46 And Jesus said, Somebody hath touched me: ^a for I perceive that virtue is gone out of me.

47 And when the woman saw that she was not hid, ^a she came trembling, and falling down before him, ^a she declared unto him before all the people, for what cause she had touched him, and how she was healed immediately.

Here is a public address made to Christ, by ^a ruler of the synagogue, whose name was Jairus, on the behalf of a little daughter of his, that was very ill, and, in the apprehension of all about her, lay a dying. This address was very humble and reverent; Jairus, though a ruler, fell down at Jesus' feet, as owning Him to be a Ruler above him. It was very importunate; he besought Him that He would come into his house; not having the faith, at least not having the thought, of the centurion, who desired Christ only to speak the healing word at a distance. But Christ complied with his request, and went with him; strong faith shall be applauded, and yet weak faith not rejected. In the houses where sickness and death are, it is very desirable to have the presence of Christ. When Christ was going, the people thronged Him; some out of curiosity to see Him, others out of an affection to Him. Let us not complain of a crowd, and a throng, and a hurry, as long as we are in the way of our duty, and doing good; but otherwise it is what every wise man will keep himself out of as much as he can.

II. A secret application made to Christ by a woman ill of a bloody issue, which had been the consumption both of her body, and of her purse too, v. 43. The nature of her disease was such, that she did not care to make a public complaint

48 And he said unto her, Daughter, be of good comfort: ^a thy faith hath made thee whole; ^a go in peace.

49 While ^a he yet spake, there cometh one from the ruler of the synagogue's house, saying to him, Thy daughter is dead; ^a trouble not the Master.

50 But when Jesus heard it, he answered him, saying, Fear not: ^a believe only, and she shall be made whole.

51 And when he came into the house, ^a he suffered no man to go in, ^a save Peter, and James, and John, and the father and the mother of the maiden.

52 And ^a all wept, and bewailed her; but he said, Weep not; of it; therefore she took this opportunity of coming to Christ in a crowd; and the more people were present, the more likely she thought it was that she should be concealed. Her faith was very strong; she doubted not but that ^a the touch of the hem of his garment she should derive from Him healing virtue, looking on Him to be such a full Fountain of mercies that she should steal a cure, and He not miss it. Thus many a poor soul is healed, and helped, and saved, by Christ, that is lost in a crowd, and that nobody takes notice of. The woman found an immediate change for the better, and that her disease was cured, v. 44. As believers have comfortable communion with Christ, so they have comfortable communications from Him—secretly meat to eat, that the world knows not of, and joy that a stranger does not intermeddle with.

III. A discovery of this secret cure, to the glory both of the Physician and the patient

Christ takes notice that there is a cure wrought, v. 46. Those that have been healed by virtue derived from Christ, must own it, for He knows it. He speaks of it here, not in a way of complaint, as if He were hereby either weakened or wronged, but in a way of complacency; it was his delight, that virtue was gone out of Him to do any good, and He did not she is not dead, but sleepeth.

53 And they ^a laughed him to scorn, ^a knowing that she was dead.

54 And ^a he put them all out, and ^a took her by the hand, and called, saying, ^a Maid, arise.

55 And ^a her spirit came again, and she arose straightway: ^a and he commanded to give her meat.

56 And her parents were astonished: but ^a he charged them that they should tell no man what was done.

(45.) Who touched Me? Not that He was ignorant who had touched Him, but that He might not be Himself the divulger of the miracle and that the woman, hearing the question, and drawing near, might testify the singular benefit she had received, and that, in consequence of her declaration, she might presently hear from his lips, that her faith had saved her; and that, by this mean, others might be excited to come and be healed of their disorders.

Epiphanius, by BULKLEY.

(46.) Virtue. Divine or miraculous power. This divine emanation did not proceed always from Christ, as necessarily as odors do from plants, for then all who touched Him must have been equally partakers of it. Of the many that touched Him, this woman, and none else, received this divine virtue; and why? Because she came in faith. Faith alone, attracts and receives the energetic influence of God at all times. There would be more miracles at least of spiritual healing, were there more faith among those who are called believers.

(47.) Trembling. She might dread our Lord's displeasure, perhaps, for having touched Him when she was under a legal impurity from her disease, as knowing that it was forbidden her to touch any one at that time; because whatever she touched became immediately unclean. Levit. 15:19, 25.

LAMY. In this story we observe a mixture of weakness and faith. She could not reasonably think to steal a cure, without the knowledge of him by whom it was wrought; or imagine a charm in the garment that Christ wore, could produce so glorious an effect, independent on his agency and will. Yet she acted as if she had thought thus; and a compassionate Redeemer commended her faith and excused her infirmity. Such candor should we exercise towards those in whom we find any thing amiss; and not despising the day of small things, but ready to encourage and support the weak, and to commend whatever good we may discover in them.

VERSES 51–55.

We have here a second instance of the power of Christ over death. In how majestic, and yet in how gentle a manner, does He address Himself to this admirable work! Daughter, I say unto thee, arise. And immediately she heard and obeyed. Thus shall He, with equal ease, call forth myriads of his saints, who now seem perished in the dust; and it may be said with regard to them also, in reference to that day, they are not dead, but sleep. The maiden of whom we have read, arose only to a dying life, which needed the support of food, and was in no respect more noble or more secure than that of other mortals: but we look for a better resurrection, in which all the infirmities of the body shall be left behind in the grave; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, Rev. 21:4. In expectation of this, let us restrain immoderate sorrow when our pious friends are taken away; let us not make too much ado on the occasion, nor allow ourselves to be thrown into the tumult of a passion, even when our children are stretched on the bed of death; but believing in Christ and governing ourselves by his precepts and maxims, let us in humble resignation, and submissive, though mournful silence, wait the issues of his providence and grace.

DODDRIIDGE.

(56.) He charged them that they should tell no man. This command does not apply to all ages, but only to that particular time when Herod was lying in wait to take away Christ's life. For though our Lord was not so ignorant of things, as to suffer his firmness and constancy to be overcome by the desire of life, yet He wished to finish his allotted career, and therefore avoided the snares laid to destroy Him before the appointed time.

CHAP. IX.

1. v. 1. "He sends forth the twelve apostles, 1-9. Herod desires to see Him, 7-9. The apostles return; Jesus re-enters with them, but the multitudes follow Him, 10, 11. He feeds them by miracle, 12-17. The different opinions concerning Him, and Peter's confession, 18-21. He foretells his death, and warns his disciples to prepare for self-denial and sufferings, 22-27. His transfiguration, 28-36. He heals a demoniac, 37-42; again foretells his death, 43-45; checks the ambitious disputes of his disciples, 46-48; will not allow them to forbid any, who 'cast out devils in his name,' 49, 50; reproves the fiery zeal of James and John against the Samaritans, who would not receive them, 51-56; and answers some, who were not disposed to follow Him unreservedly and immediately, 57-62.

THEN ^a he called his twelve disciples together, and ^b gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases.

2 And he sent them ^c to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick.

3 And he said unto them, "Take nothing for your journey, neither staves, nor scrip, neither bread, neither money; neither have ^d two coats apiece.

gave to the mourners. He means, as to her peculiar case, that she was not dead for good and all, but that she should now shortly be raised to life, so that it would be to her friends, as if she had been but a few hours asleep. But it is applicable to all that die in the Lord; therefore we should not sorrow for them, as those that have no hope, because death is but a sleep to them, not only as it is a rest from all the toils of the days of time, but as there will be a resurrection, a waking and rising again to all the glories of the days of eternity. This was a comfortable word. Yet they wickedly ridiculed it, and laughed Him to scorn for it; here was a pearl cast before swine. They were ignorant of the Scriptures of the Old Testament, who bantered it as an absurd thing to grudge it to the meaneast, they were as welcome to it as to the light and heat of the sun; nor had He the less virtue in Him for the going out of virtue from Him, for He is an overflowing Fountain.

The poor patient owns her case, and the benefit she had received, v. 47. Note, The consideration of this, that we cannot be hid from Christ, should engage us to pour out our hearts before Him, and to show before Him our sin, and all our trouble. She came trembling, and yet her faith saved her, v. 48. Note, There may be trembling, where yet there is saving faith. She declared before all the people, for what cause she had touched Him, because she believed that a touch would cure her, and it did so. Christ's patients should communicate their experiences to one another.

The great Physician confirms her cure, and sends her away with the comfort of it, v. 48. Jacob got the blessing from Isaac clandestinely, and by a wife; but when the fraud was discovered, Isaac ratified it designedly; it was obtained surreptitiously and under-hand, but it was secured and seconded above-board: so was the cure here. He is blessed, and she shall be blessed; so here, she is healed, and she shall be healed.

IV. An encouragement to Jairus, not to distrust the power of Christ, v. 49, 50. Note, Our faith in Christ, as well as our zeal for Him, should be bold and daring. They that are willing to do any thing for Him, may depend on his doing great things for them, above what they may either ask or think. When the patient is dead, there is no room for prayer, or the use of means; but here, though the child is dead, yet believe, and all shall be well. To call in the physician after death, is absurd; but not to call in Christ.

V. The preparatives for the raising of her to life again. 1. The choice Christ made of witnesses that should see the miracle wrought. A crowd followed Him, but He took none with Him but Peter, and James, and John; these three, with the parents, being a competent number to attest the truth of it. 2. The check He bid them not weep; for she is not dead, but asleep. He means, as to her peculiar case, that she was not dead for good and all, but that she should now shortly be raised to life, so that it would be to her friends, as if she had been but a few hours asleep. But it is applicable to all that die in the Lord; therefore we should not sorrow for them, as those that have no hope, because death is but a sleep to them, not only as it is a rest from all the toils of the days of time, but as there will be a resurrection, a waking and rising again to all the glories of the days of eternity. This was a comfortable word. Yet they wickedly ridiculed it, and laughed Him to scorn for it; here was a pearl cast before swine. They were ignorant of the Scriptures of the Old Testament, who bantered it as an absurd thing to call death a sleep; yet this good came out of that evil, that hereby the truth of the miracle was evinced, for they knew that she was dead, they were certain of it, and therefore nothing less than a divine power could restore her to life. We find not any answer that He made them; yet He soon explained Himself. But He put them all out; (v. 54.) they were unworthy to be the witnesses of this work of wonder; they who in the midst of their mourning were so merrily disposed, as to laugh at Him for what He said, would, it may be, have found something to laugh at in what He did, and therefore are justly shut out.

VI. Her return to life, v. 55. Thus the hand of Christ's grace goes along with the calls of his word, to make them effectual. Here that is expressed, which was only implied in the other evangelists, that her spirit came again; her soul returned again, to animate her body. This plainly proves, that the soul exists and acts in a state of separation from the body and therefore is immortal; that death does not extinguish this candle of the Lord, but takes it out of a dark lantern. It is not, as Grotius well observes, the temperament of the body, or any thing that dies with it; but something that subsists by itself, which, after death, is somewhere else than where the body is. Where the soul of this child was in this interval, we are not told; it was in the hand of the Father of spirits, to whom all souls at death return. When her spirit came again, she arose, and made it appear that she was alive, by her motion, as she did also by her appetite, for Christ commanded to give her meat. As babes new born, so those that are newly raised, desire spiritual food, that they may grow thereby. In the last verse, we need not wonder to find her parents astonished; but if that implies that they only were so, and not the other by-standers, who had laughed Christ to scorn, we may well wonder at their stupidity, which perhaps was the reason why Christ would not have it proclaimed, as well as to give an instance of his humility.

CHAP. IX. v. 1-9. We have here, I. The method Christ took to spread his Gospel. He had travelled about Himself, preaching and healing; but now He sent abroad his twelve disciples, who by this time were pretty well instructed in the nature of the present dispensation, and able to instruct others, and to preach the kingdom of God, as it was now about to be set up by the Messiah; to bring people acquainted with the spiritual nature and tendency of it, and to persuade them to come

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 26-56. Our own observation and experience may convince us, that the effects of sin, and of Satan's malice, fill the earth with misery: but let us advert to the varied displays of the Redeemer's power to counteract this fatal tendency. If He have delivered our souls from the power of the devil, and brought us 'to sit at his feet, in our right mind,' to hear his word, and to desire to be with Him, He will preserve us from falling again under the dominion of sin; He will remove or sanctify our bodily sicknesses, and give us the comfort of his forgiving love; He will support us under domestic afflictions, and do us good by them; He will deliver us from the fear of death, and at length make us 'more than conquerors' even over this 'king of terrors.' Let us then declare what great things our God and Savior has done for us; let us commit all our concerns into his hands, and apply to Him for help in all our difficulties; and let us endeavor to imitate his compassion and unwearied activity in doing good.—But, woe be to them who desire Jesus 'to depart from them,' through fear of worldly loss, or from love to sin! He will not stay with those who thus slight Him, and perhaps may return to them no more; for others are glad to receive Him; and none but Jesus can save them from the wrath of God, or the power of Satan; or give them effectual help in the time of trouble, 'in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment.' (P. O. Matt. 8:28-34. 9:18-26. Mark 5:1-43.)

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. v. 1-6. (Marg. Ref. 10:1-12. Matt. 10:1-15. Mark 6:7-13.) The apostles had both the power of working miracles, and authority over evil spirits, immediately given them by Christ Himself; in which was originally inherent, as One with the Father, as 'God manifest in the flesh,' as well as given to Him as our Mediator. (Matt. 28:18.) The miracles of mercy, wrought by them, proved their doctrine to be the word of God, and illustrated its benign and salutary tendency; and their holy doctrine, calling men to repent of sin and turn to God, and welcome the Savior promised in the Scriptures, demonstrated that their miracles were wrought by the power of God, whose Word they established. (Deut. 13:1-5. Matt. 12:25-30.) (4.) Thence, &c.] Remain in the same house, if convenient, till ye depart from that city.

(5.) Power and authority.] The reader will please to observe, 1. That Luke mentions both demons and diseases; therefore he was either mistaken, or demons and diseases are not the same. 2. The treatment of these two was not the same: the demons were to be cast out, the diseases to be healed.

(3.) Staves.] 'Staves were always used by travellers in those rocky countries, both to support them in slippery places, and defend them against assaults. So necessary in these countries was a staff, that it was a usual thing for persons, when they undertook long journeys, to take a spare staff with them, for fear one should fail. When Christ, therefore, sent forth his apostles, He ordered them not to take staves, but only one staff, without making provision of a spare one.'

HORNE.

Two coats apiece.] The Jews usually wore two garments. The outer one was the talith, on which was the zuzith, i. e. the borders, skirts, or fringes sewed on the talith. This was named by them also the kolbon of thread. The under garment was a kind of tunic of woolen, named the chalcik. Comparing the text with the same expression in Luke 3:11. 'he that hath two coats, let him give one,' &c. it may seem probable that the "two coats" are the chalcik and the talith worn at once; and that the poorer ranks in the hot climate of Judea were wont to go occasionally in the chalcik alone. Hence the Father does not scruple to enjoin him who weareth both to give his talith to the poor.

into the interests and measures of it. For the confirming of their doctrine, which it was new and surprising, and very different from what they had been taught by the scribes and Pharisees, and because so much depended on men's receiving or not receiving it, He empowered them to confirm it by miracles, v. 1, 2. Christ designed a total rout and ruin to the kingdom of darkness, and therefore gave them power over all devils. He authorized and appointed them likewise to cure diseases, and to heal the sick, which would make them welcome wherever they came, and not only convince people's judgments, but gain their affections.

This was their commission. Now observe, 1. What Christ directed them to do, in prosecution of this commission, at this time, when they were not to go far or be out long.

They must not be solicitous to recommend themselves to people's esteem by their outward appearance; they must go as they were, not change their clothes, nor so much as put on a pair of new shoes.

They must depend on Providence, and the kindness of their friends, to furnish them with what was convenient for them. They must not take with them either bread or money, and yet believe they should not want. Christ would not have his disciples shy of receiving the kindnesses of their friends, but rather to expect them. Yet Paul saw cause not to go by this rule, when he labored with his hands rather than be burdensome.

They must not change their lodgings, as suspecting that those who entertained them were weary of them; the ark is a guest that always pays well for its entertainment; (v. 4.) [†] Whosoever house ye enter into, there abide, that people may know where to find you; that your friends may know you are not backward to serve them, and your enemies may know you are not ashamed or afraid to face them; there abide, till you depart out of that city; stay with those you are used to.

They must put on authority, and speak warning to those who refused them, as well as comfort to those that received them, v. 5. [†] If there be any place that will not entertain you, if the magistrates deny you admission, and threaten to treat you as vagrants, leave them, do not force yourselves upon them, nor run yourselves into danger among them, but at the same time bind them over to the judgment of God for it; so that when they perish at last in their infidelity, their blood may be upon their own heads. [†] Shake off the dust of your feet, as much as to say, you abandon their city, and will have no more to do with them.

2. What they did, in prosecution of this commission; (v. 6.) They departed from their Master's presence; yet, having still his spiritual presence with them, and thus borne up in their work, they went through the towns, some or other of them, all the towns within the circuit appointed them; [†] preaching the Gospel, and healing every where; doing good like their Master, both to souls and bodies.

III. We have here Herod's perplexity and vexation at this. The deriving of Christ's power to those who were sent forth in his name, and acted by authority from Him, was an amazing and convincing proof of his being the Messiah, above any thing else; that He could not only work miracles Himself, but empower others to work miracles too; such mean, illiterate men as the apostles were, who had nothing else to recommend them, or to raise any expectations from them, but that they had been with Jesus, Acts 4:13. When the country sees such as those healing the sick in the name of Jesus, it gives an alarm. Now observe,

1. The various speculations it raised among the people, who, though they thought not rightly, yet could not but think honorably, of our Lord Jesus, and that He was an extraordinary person, one come from the other world; that either John Baptist, lately persecuted and slain for the cause of God, or one of the old prophets, persecuted and slain long since in that cause was risen again, to be recompensed for their sufferings by this honor put on them; or that Elias, who was taken alive to heaven in a fiery chariot, had appeared as an express from heaven, v. 7, 8.

2. The great perplexity it created in the mind of Herod; his guilty conscience flew in his face, and he was ready to conclude with them that John was risen from the dead. He thought he had got clear of him, but, it seems, he is mistaken; either John is come to life again, or here is another in his spirit and power, for God will never leave Himself without witness. [†] What shall I do now? saith Herod. [†] John have I beheaded, but who is this? Is He carrying on John's work, or is He come to avenge John's death? John baptized, but He doth not; John did no miracle, but He doth; and therefore appears more formidable than John. Note, Those who oppose God, will find themselves more and more embarrassed. However, he desired to see Him, whether He resembled John or no; but he might soon have been put out of his pain, if he would have but informed himself of that which thousands knew, that Jesus preached, and wrought miracles, a great while before John was beheaded, and therefore could not be John raised from the dead. He desired to see Him; and why did he not go and see Him? Probably because he thought it below him, either to go to Him, or to send for Him; he had enough of John Baptist, and cared not for having to do with any more such reprovers of sin. He desired to see Him, but we do not find that ever he did, till he saw Him at his bar, and then he and his men of war set Him at naught, Luke 23:11. Had he prosecuted his convictions now, and gone to see Him, who knows but a happy change might have been wrought in him? But, delaying it now, his heart was hardened, and when he did see Him, he was as much prejudiced against Him as any other.

V. 10-17. We have here, I. The account which the twelve gave their Master of the success of their ministry. [†] They were not long out; but when they returned, they told him all that they had done, that, if they had done any thing amiss, they might mend it next time.

II. Their retirement, for a little breathing; He took them, and went aside privately into a desert place, that they might have some relaxation from business, and not be always on the stretch. Note, He that hath appointed our man-servant and maid-servant to rest, would have his servants to rest too. Those in the most public stations, and that are most publicly useful, must sometimes go aside privately, both for the repose of their bodies, to recruit them, and for the furnishing of their minds by meditation for further public work.

III. The resort of the people to Him, and the kind reception He gave them. They followed Him, though in a desert place; for that is no desert where Christ is. And though they hereby disturbed the repose He designed here for Himself and his disciples yet He welcomed them, v. 11. Note, Pious zeal may excuse a

(Marg. Ref.—3:19, 20, Matt. 14:1-12, Mark 6:14-29.) Herod was perplexed and uneasy, at the report of Christ's miracles; and concurred in the opinion of those, who said that 'John was risen from the dead'; yet he desired to see Him, in order to ascertain the truth of this opinion, or in hopes to disprove a report which gave him much alarm. (13:31-33, 23:6-12.)

(S.) [†] Elias had appeared. [†] There was (says Rosenmueller) at that time an opinion, that, before the coming of the Messiah, one of the ancient prophets should return to life. They thought, therefore, that Jesus was one of those prophets, whose office it was to announce the advent of the Messiah as near at hand. T. This opinion a prophecy respecting the other Elias, who was to appear, had given occasion, which they so interpreted as to suppose that not only another Elias, but also another prophet, would come; inasmuch that the attention of the whole nation was fixed on that subject.

Verses 11-13. Observe five effects of Divine grace. 1. People are drawn to follow Him. 2. He kindly receives them. 3. He instructs them in the things of God. 4. He heals all their diseases. 5. He feeds their bodies and their souls. [†] Quesset, Reader! Jesus is the same to the present moment. Follow Him, and He will receive, instruct, heal, feed and save thy soul unto eternal life.

little rudeness; ^ldid with Christ, and should with us. Though they came unseasonably, yet Christ gave them what they came for. He spake unto them of the kingdom of God, of its laws by which they must be bound, and of its privileges with which they might be blessed. He healed them that had need of healing, and, in a sense of their need, made their application to Him. Though the disease was ever so inveterate, and incurable by the physicians, though the patients were ever so poor and mean, yet He healed them. There is healing in Christ for all that need it, whether for soul or body. Sometimes He sees that we need the sickness, for the good of our souls, more than the healing, for the ease of our bodies, and then we must be willing for a season, because there is need, to be in heaviness; but when He sees that we need healing, we shall have it. Death is his servant, to heal the saints of all diseases. He heals spiritual maladies by his graces, by his comforts, and has for each what their case calls for: relief for every exigence.

IV. The plentiful provision Christ made for the multitude that attended Him; with five loaves of bread and two fishes, He fed five thousand men. This narrative we had twice before, and shall meet with it again; it is the only miracle of our Savior's that is recorded by all the four evangelists.

Let us only observe out of it,

1. Those who diligently attend on Christ in the way of duty, and therein deny, or expose themselves, or are made to forget themselves, and their outward conveniences, by their zeal for God's house, are taken under his particular care, and may depend on Jehovah-jireh—The Lord will provide. He will not see those that fear Him, and serve Him faithfully, want any good thing.

2. Our Lord Jesus was of a free and generous spirit. His disciples said, Send them away, that they may get victuals; but Christ said, No, give ye them to eat; let what we have go as far as it will reach, and they are welcome to it. Thus He has taught both ministers and Christians to use hospitality without grudging, 1 Pet. 4:9. Those that have but a little, let them do what they can with that little, and that is the way to make it more. There is that scatters, and yet increases.

3. Jesus Christ has not only physic, but food, for all those that by faith apply themselves to Him: He not only cures the diseases of the soul, but relieves the necessity of it, and satisfies the desires of it. Christ has provided not only to save the soul from perishing by its diseases, but to nourish it unto life eternal, and strengthen it for all spiritual exercises.

4. All the gifts of Christ are to be received by the church in a regular, orderly manner; Make them sit down by fifties in a company. The number of each company is taken notice of here, (p. 14.) which Christ appointed for the better distribution of the meat, and the easier computation of the number of the guests.

5. When we are receiving our creature-comforts, we must look up to heaven; Christ did so, to teach us to do so. We must acknowledge that we receive them from God, and that we are unworthy to receive them; that we owe them all, and all the comfort we have in them, to the mediation of Christ, by whom the curse is removed, and the covenant of peace settled; that we depend on God's blessing upon them, to make them serviceable to us, and desire that blessing.

He blessed them. [That is, the loaves and fishes. He pronounced a blessing over them. For it was customary with the Hebrews, at every meal, previously to pronounce a prayer which commenced with the words, 'Blessed be God'; thus praising God, and returning thanks for the food and drink.]

Verses 19-27.

Matt. 16:13-23. Mark 8:27-33. 9:1. (20.) Whom say ye, &c. [Though the world fluctuates amidst various errors, the truth must not on that account be despised: but rather the knowledge of it should be the more diligently sought, and the profession of it made with the greatest constancy.] Beza. (23.) Deny himself. [Self-denial, among other things, requires us to renounce all those advantages, and risk all those sufferings, which arise from the favor or enmity of men. 'Although the yearning bowels of a tender mother, and the gray hairs of

6. The blessing of Christ will make a little to go a great way, and the little that the righteous man has, is better than the riches of many wicked, a dinner of herbs better than a stalled ox.]

7. Those whom Christ feeds, He fills; to whom He gives, He gives enough; as there is in Him enough for all, so there is enough for each. He replenishes every hungry soul, abundantly satisfies it with the goodness of his house. Here were fragments taken up, to assure us that in our Father's house there is bread enough, and to spare. We are not straitened, or stinted, in Him.]

V. 19-27. In these verses, we have one circumstance taken notice of, which we had not in the other evangelists—that Christ was alone praying, and his disciples with Him, when He entered into this discourse, v. 18. Though He had much public work to do, yet He found some time to be alone in private, for converse with Himself, and with his Father, and with his disciples; and when alone, He was praying. It is good for us to improve our solitude for devotion. When Christ was alone praying, his disciples were with Him; so that this was a family-prayer. Housekeepers ought to pray with their households, parents with their children, masters with their servants, teachers and tutors with their scholars and pupils. Christ prayed with them before He examined them, that they might be directed and encouraged to answer Him, by his prayers for them. Those we give instructions to, we should put up prayers for, and with. He discourses with them,

I. Concerning Himself; and inquires,

1. What the people said of Him. Christ knew better than they, but would have his disciples made sensible, by the mistakes of others concerning Him, how happy they were, that were led into the knowledge of the truth concerning Him. We should take notice of the ignorance and errors of others, that we may be the more thankful to Him who has manifested Himself to us, and not unto the world, and may pity them, and do what we can to help them, and to teach them better.

They tell Him what conjectures concerning Him they had heard in their converse with the common people. Ministers would know better how to suit their instructions to the case of ordinary people, if they did but converse more frequently and familiarly with them. The more conversant the physician is with his patient, the better he knows what to do for him. Some said that He was John Baptist, who was beheaded but the other day; others Elias, or one of the old prophets; any thing but what He was.

2. What they said of Him. 'We know that Thou art the Christ of God, the Anointed of God, the Messiah promised.' It is matter of unspeakable comfort to us, that our Lord Jesus is God's Anointed; for his being anointed signifies his being both appointed to, and qualified for his work.

Now one would have expected that Christ should have charged his disciples, to publish this truth to every one they met with; no, He straitly charged them to tell no man that thing as yet, because there is a time for all things. After his resurrection, which completed the proof of it, Peter made the temple ring with that, that God has made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ; (Acts 2:36.) but as yet the evidence was not ready to be summed up, and therefore it must be concealed; while it was so,

'an indulgent father, should be pleaded as motives to induce me to break the least command of the holy Jesus; though the authority of civil, natural, or ecclesiastical superiors should tempt me to do what Christ forbids; though authority should allure me with proffers of the highest honors or rewards, or endeavor to affright me with the severest menaces; yet if all these considerations should prevail with me to gratify myself and than, by doing that which my own conscience, and God's Word, assures me will be displeasing to my Savior, or opposite to his commands; it is evident that I regard myself, or them, more than I do my Savior, and therefore am unworthy of Him, and cannot be sincerely his disciple.' Whitby. This learned writer proceeds in the same energetic manner, to show particularly, how self-denial requires the same decision and firmness against solicitation, allurements, and upbraiding complaints, from wives, children, and other relations, where obedience to Christ is concerned; as well as to deny 19 They answering said, 'John the Baptist: but some say, Elias: and others say, That one of the old prophets is risen again.

20 He said unto them, But whom say ye that I am? Peter answering said, 'O The Christ of God.

21 And he straitly charged them, and commanded them to tell no man that thing;

22 Saying, 'The Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and chief priests, and scribes, and be slain, and be raised the third day.

23 And he said to them, all, 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.

24 For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it.

25 For what is a man advantaged, if he

we may conclude that the believing of it was not necessary to salvation.

II. Concerning his own sufferings and death. Now that his disciples were well established in the belief of his being the Christ, and able to bear it, He speaks of them expressly, and with great assurance, v. 22. It comes in as a reason why they must not yet preach that He was the Christ, because the wonders that would attend his death and resurrection, would be the most convincing proof of his being the Christ of God. It was by his exaltation to the right hand of the Father, that He was fully declared to be the Christ, and by the sending of the Spirit thereupon; (Acts 2: 33.) and therefore wait till that is done.

III. Concerning their sufferings for Him. So far must they be from thinking how to prevent his sufferings, that they must rather prepare for their own.

We must accustom ourselves to all instances of self-denial and patience, v. 23. This is the best preparative for martyrdom. We must live a life of self-denial, mortification, and contempt of the world; we must not indulge our ease and appetite, for then it will be hard to bear toil, and weariness, and want, for Christ. We are gain the whole world, and lose himself, or be cast away?

26 For whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels.

27 But I tell you of a truth, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the kingdom of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—27. The Lord Jesus is the Fountain of power and authority, to whom all creatures must in one way or other be subjected; and if He accompany his Word with efficacy, to deliver sinners from Satan's bondage, his ministers need not fear but He will procure them needful sustenance: and more they ought not to desire. They should always show a kind attention to the temporal comforts of mankind, while they seek their eternal salvation; and if they can, by ordinary means, do any thing to relieve the distresses and heal the diseases of those among whom they labor, it may help to promote the success of their ministry. But when truth and love, in this manner, go hand in hand, and the message of God is yet rejected and despised, it will leave men most inexcusable, and every circumstance will turn to a testimony against them. (P. O. Matt. 10: 1—15.)—The increase of faithful ministers, and the success of the Gospel, frequently cause great disquietude to those, who set themselves to oppose the cause of God; and they, who have shed innocent blood, will often have their guilt brought to remembrance, with renewed and increased terror and dismay, as long as they live; yea, except they truly repent, to all eternity. (Gen. 42: 21, 22.)—While the blessed Jesus consults the benefit and comfort of his disciples, and readily receives all who come to Him, healing their souls, and feeding them all with the 'Bread of life;' let us learn to communicate liberally to the necessities of our brethren, and even if poor ourselves, to share our mean and scanty morsel with those who are in more urgent and immediate want. By the blessing of God, a little will in this use of it go far, and we shall never by so doing be impoverished.—After our Lord's example also, ministers, parents, and heads of families should pray with, as well as for, those who are intrusted to their care; and their retired conversation should be attended by social devotions, which will often render it as profitable as public ordinances.—Those who are established in one important doctrine of the Gospel, will be prepared to understand others connected with it; and those truths which relate to the person, the sufferings, and the mediatorial kingdom of Christ, form the very substance or centre of true religion. In meditating on his crucifixion, and the glory which ensued, we shall best learn 'to deny ourselves and to bear our cross daily;' we shall thus be induced to renounce the friendship and venture the enmity of the world: we shall, in this glass, see the folly and madness of seeking the largest temporal advantages, with the hazard of losing ourselves and being cast away; and we shall get the victory over that foolish and wicked shame, which causes so very many to forsake and disobey Christ, against the convictions of our own consciences; though He has expressly declared, that 'He will be ashamed' of all such, 'when He shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels.' (P. O. Matt. 14: 6—21. 16: 21—28.)

This, as distinguished from 'the glory of the Father,' denotes the glory of Christ, as Mediator, exercising all divine perfections through the medium of his human nature, in accomplishing and perfecting the grand purposes of his incarnation. (Matt. 25: 31—33. John 5: 20—29. 1 Cor. 15: 20—23. 2 Thes. 1: 5—10. Rev. 20: 11—15.) (19.) One of the old prophets. 'Some prophet of the ancients,' v. 8. (Matt. 5: 21, 27, 33. Him and his followers obnoxious to the Romans, who would unreasonably look on such a profession as a claim to regal power, and utterly inconsistent with the rights of Caesar.'

(22.) Raised the third day. See on Luke 1: 59. 2: 21. Et. (25.) Or be cast away? Or receive spiritual damage. I have added the word spiritual, which I conceive to be necessarily implied. Because, if a man received only temporal damage in some respect or other, yet gaining the whole world must amply compensate him. But if he should receive spiritual damage—hurt to his soul in the smallest degree, the possession of the universe could not indemnify him. Earthly goods may repair earthly losses, but they cannot repair any breach that may be made in the peace or holiness of the soul.

world, and nations were brought to God triumph over the Gentile nations in their conversion, and over the Jewish nation in its destruction.

pleasure, in the world, by denying Christ, yet when, by so doing, we lose ourselves to all eternity, and are cast away at last, what good will our worldly gain do us? The soul is the man; and it is well or ill with us, according as it is well or ill with our souls. If they perish forever, it is certain that we are undone; the body cannot be happy, if the soul be miserable in the other world; but the soul may be happy, though the body be greatly afflicted and oppressed in this world. If a man be himself cast away, by the righteous sentence of Christ, whose cause and interest he has treacherously deserted; if it be adjudged a forfeiture of all his blessedness, and the forfeiture be taken, where is his gain? What is his hope?

We must therefore never be ashamed of Christ and his Gospel, nor of any disgrace or reproach that we may undergo for our faithful adherence to Him and it, v. 26. As Christ had, so his cause has, a state of humiliation and exaltation. They, and they only, that are willing to suffer with it, when it suffers, shall reign with it, when it reigns; those that cannot find in their hearts to share with it in its disgrace, shall certainly have no share with it in its triumphs. Observe here, how Christ, to support Himself and his followers under present disgraces, speaks magnificently of the lustre of his second coming, in prospect of which He endured the cross, despising the shame: 1. He shall come in his own glory. This was not mentioned in Matthew and Mark. He shall come in the glory of the Mediator, all that glory which the Father restored to Him, which He had with God before the worlds were, which He had deposited and put in pledge, as it were, for the accomplishing of his undertaking, and demanded up again, when He had gone through it: Now, O Father, glorify Thou Me, John 17:4, 5. He shall come in all that glory which the Father conferred on Him, when He set Him at his own right hand, and gave Him to be Head over all things to the church; in all the glory that is due to Him, as the Asserter of the glory of God, and the Author of the glory of all the saints. This is his own glory. 2. He shall come in his Father's glory. The Father will judge the world by Him, having committed all judgment to Him; and therefore will publicly own Him in the judgment, as the Brightness of his glory, and the express Image of his person. 3. He shall come in the glory of the holy angels. They shall all attend Him, and minister to Him, and add every thing they can to the lustre of his appearance. What a figure will the blessed Jesus make in that day! Did we believe it, we should never be ashamed of Him or his words now.

Lastly, To encourage them in suffering for Him, He assures them that the kingdom of God would now shortly be set up, notwithstanding the great opposition that was made to it, v. 27. 'Though the second coming of the Son of man is at a great distance, the kingdom of God shall come in its power in the present age, while some here present are alive.' They saw the kingdom of God, when the Spirit was poured out, when the Gospel was preached to all the world, and nations were brought to Christ by it; they saw the kingdom of God triumph over the Gentile nations in their conversion, and over the Jewish nation in its destruction.

V. 28-36. We have here the narrative of Christ's transfiguration, which was designed for a specimen of that glory of his, in which He will come to judge the world, and consequently an encouragement to his disciples, to suffer for Him, and never to be ashamed of Him. We had the account before, in Matthew and Mark, and it is well worthy to be repeated and reconsidered, for the confirmation of our faith in the Lord Jesus, and for the encouraging of our hopes and expectations concerning the glory reserved for all believers in the future state.

I. In one circumstance of the narrative, Luke seems to differ from the other two evangelists. They say it was six days after the foregoing sayings, Luke saith that it was about eight days after, that is, it was that day sevennight; six whole days intervening, and it was the eighth day. Some think it was in the night, because the disciples were sleepy, as in his agony, and in the night his appearance in splendor would be the more illustrious; if in the night, the computation of the time would be the more doubtful and uncertain; probably, in the night, between the seventh and eighth day, and so about eight days.

II. Divers circumstances are added and explained, which are very material.

We are here told that Christ was thus honored when He was praying; (v. 28, 29.) when Christ humbled Himself to pray, He was thus exalted. He knew before, that this was designed for Him at this time, and therefore seeks it by prayer. Christ Himself must ask the favors that were purposed for Him, and promised to Him; Ask of Me, and I will give thee, Ps. 2:8. And thus He intended to honor the duty of prayer, and to recommend it to us. It is a transfiguring, transforming duty; if our hearts be elevated and enlarged in it; so as in it to behold the glory of the Lord, we shall be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, 2 Cor. 3:18. By prayer, we fetch in the wisdom, grace, and joy, which make the face to shine.

Luke does not use the word transfigured, (which Matthew and Mark used), perhaps because it had been used so much in the Pagan theology, but makes use of a phrase equivalent, The fashion of his countenance was another thing from what it had been; his face shone far beyond what Moses' did, when He came down from the mount; and his raiment was white and glistering; or bright like lightning; so that He seemed to be arrayed all with light, to cover Himself with light as with a garment.

It was said in Matthew and Mark, that Moses and Elias appeared to them, here it is said they appeared in glory; to teach us, that saints departed are in glory, in a glorious state; they shine in glory; He being in glory, they appeared with Him in glory, as all the saints shall shortly do.

We are here told what was the subject of the discourse between Christ and them; They spake of his decease, which He should accomplish at Jerusalem—his exodus, his departure; that is, his death. The death of Christ is here called his exit, his going out, his leaving of the world. Moses and Elias spake of it to Him under that notion, to reconcile Him to it, and to make the foresight of it the more easy to his human nature. The death of the saints is their exodus, their departure out of the Egypt of this world, other critics, would render this text. Some here present shall not die till they see the Son of man going into his kingdom, that is, ascending to heaven, which the apostles did. See Acts 1:9. But it increases the difficulty to suppose both these uncommon senses of the words in question to occur together; nor will Luke 23:42. be allowed as an exact parallel. I choose therefore to adhere to our received version, which may include a reference to giving the Spirit and praying for the kingdom of God, but chiefly refers to that providential appearance of Christ for the destruction of Jerusalem, so often called the coming of the Son of man, (Matt. 24:3, 27, 30, 37.) and the day in which He shall be revealed. Luke 17:24, 26, 30. This sense is the more natural here, especially as our Lord's manner of speaking intimates that most of the company should be dead before the event referred to: yet his ascension happened in a few months after this.

5.) The subject of the conversation on the holy mount, mentioned only by this evangelist, shows that the atonement made by the death of Christ, was the great object to which Moses and the prophets, rightly understood, directed mankind. CAMPBELL.

34 While he thus spake, there came a cloud, and overshadowed them; and they feared as they entered into the cloud.

35 And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, 'This is my beloved Son; hear him.'

36 And when the voice was past, Jesus was found alone. And they kept it close, and told no man in those days any of those things which they had seen.

37 ¶ And it came to pass, that on the next day, when they were come down from the hill, much people met him.

38 And, behold, a man of the company cried out, saying, Master, I beseech thee, look upon my son; for he is mine only child:

39 And, lo, a spirit taketh him, and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruising him hardly departeth from him.

40 And I besought thy disciples to cast him out; and he crieth out.

41 And Jesus answering, said, 'O faith-their release out of a house of bondage. Some think the ascension of Christ is included here, for the departure of Israel out of Egypt was a departure in triumph, so was his when He went from earth to heaven. This departure of his He must accomplish, for thus it was determined in the counsel of God, and could not be altered. He must accomplish it at Jerusalem, though his residence was mostly in Galilee; for his most spiteful enemies were at Jerusalem, and there the sanhedrim sat, that took upon them to judge of prophets. Moses and Elias spake of this, to intimate that the sufferings of Christ, and his entrance into his glory, were what Moses and the prophets had spoken of; see Luke 24: 26, 27. 1 Pet. 1: 11. Our Lord Jesus, even in his transfiguration, was willing to discourse of his death and sufferings; to teach us, that meditations on death, are in a special manner seasonable when at any time we are advanced, lest we should be lifted up above measure. In our greatest glories on earth, let us remember that here we have no continuing city.

We are here told, which we were not before, that the disciples were heavy with sleep; (v. 22.) when the vision first began, Peter and James and John were drowsy; either it was late, or they were weary, or had been disturbed in their rest the night before; or perhaps a charming, composing air, or some sweet and melodious sounds, which disposed them to soft and gentle slumbers, were a preface to the vision; or perhaps it was owing to a sinful carelessness; when Christ was at prayer with them, they did not regard his prayer as they should have done, and to punish them for that, were left to sleep on now, when He began to be transfigured, and so slept an opportunity of seeing how that work of wonder was wrought. These three were now asleep, when Christ was in his glory, as afterwards they were, when He was in his agony; see the weakness and frailty of human nature, even in the best, and what need they have of the grace of God. Nothing could be more affecting to these disciples, one would think, than the glories and the agonies of their Master; and yet neither the one nor the other would serve to keep them awake. What need have we to pray to God for quickening grace, to make us not only alive, but lively? Yet that they might be competent witnesses of this sign from heaven, to those that demanded one, after a while they recovered themselves, and became perfectly awake; and then they took an exact view of all those glories, so that they were able to give a particular account, as we find one of them doth, of all that passed when they were with Christ in the holy mount, 2 Pet. 1: 17.

It is here observed, it was when Moses and Elias were now about to depart, that Peter said, Lord, it is good to be here, let us make three tabernacles. Thus we are often not sensible of the worth of our mercies, till we are about to lose them; nor do we covet and court their continuance, till they are on the departure. Peter said this, not knowing what he said. Those know not what they say, that talk of making tabernacles on earth for glorified saints in heaven, who have better mansions in the temple there, and long to return to them.

It is here added concerning the cloud that overshadowed them, that they feared as they entered into the cloud. This cloud was a token of God's more peculiar presence; it was in a cloud that God of old took possession of the tabernacle and temple, and when the cloud covered the tabernacle, Moses was not able to enter, (Exod. 40: 34, 35.) and when it filled the temple, the priests could not stand to minister by reason of it; (2 Chron. 5: 14.) such a cloud was this, and then no wonder that the disciples were afraid to enter into it. But never let any be afraid to enter into a cloud with Jesus Christ, for He will be sure to bring them safe through it.

The voice which came from heaven, is here, and in Mark, related not so fully as in Matthew; This is my beloved Son, hear Him: though these words, in whom I am well pleased, which we have both in Matthew and Peter, are not expressed, they are implied in that, This is my beloved Son; for, whom He loves, and, in whom He is well pleased, come all to one; we are accepted in the Beloved.

Lastly, The apostles are here said to have kept this vision private; they told no man in those days, reserving the discovery of it for another opportunity, when the evidences of Christ's being the Son of God were completed in the pouring out of the Spirit, and that doctrine was to be published to all the world. As there is a time to speak, so there is a time to keep silence. Every thing is beautiful and useful in its season.

V. 37-42. This passage of story in Matthew and Mark follows immediately on that of Christ's transfiguration, and his discourse with his disciples after it; but here it is said to be on the next day; which confirms the conjecture, that Christ was transfigured in the night, and, it should seem, though they did not make tabernacles, as Peter proposed, yet they found some shelter to repose themselves in all night, for it was not till next day, that they came down from the hill; and then He found things in some disorder among his disciples, though not so bad as Moses did when he came down from the mount. When wise and good men are in their beloved retirements, they would do well to consider whether they are not wanted in their public stations.

In this narrative, observe,

1. How forward the people were to receive Christ at his return to them; as it was foretold of Him, that to Him should the gathering of the people be.

2. How importunate the father of the lunatic child was with Christ for help for him; (v. 38.) I beseech Thee, look upon my son; a very modest request; one compassionate look from Christ is enough. Let us bring ourselves and our children to Christ, to be looked upon. His plea is, he is mine only child. They that have many children, may balance their affliction in one with their comfort in the rest; yet if it be an only child, that is a grief, the affliction in that may be balanced with the love of God in giving his only-begotten Son for us.

3. How deplorable the case of the child was, v. 39. He was under the power of an evil spirit, that took him; and diseases of that nature are (34.) 'I cannot think it probable that this only means that the cloud cast a shadow which fell upon them, but rather that it spread over the mountain; and probably it was the darkest part with which the spotles were enveloped, while the excellent glory, (2 Pet. 1: 17.) seemed much higher, and the rays of it were much tempered by that part of the cloudy veil between it and them. And thus we know that the Shechinah had appeared in former ages, particularly when it took possession of the tabernacle of Moses, (Ex. 40: 34, 35.) and the temple of Solomon, 1 Kings 8: 10, 11.'

Verses 37-44.

(Marg. Ref. a-n.—Matt. 17: 14-21. Mark 9: 14-29.) (38.) Mine only child. Luke alone particularly notices this circumstance, in a single word, yet in a manner suited to touch the heart, and awaken the most tender sympathy in the reader. (7: 11-17.) (39.) Lo, &c. 'And, behold, a spirit seizeth him, and suddenly the youth crieth out, and the spirit teareth him till he foameth, and bruising him, hardly departeth from him.' In this rendering, (which is literal, except as the proper nominative to each verb is added instead of the relative,) what the evil spirit, and what in consequence the youth did, are distinguished; and this is of considerable importance, in order to show more clearly that it was a real possession. (43.) The mighty power, &c. Or, 'the majesty of God,' which was displayed by Jesus in this miracle, accordi g to what He says, 'He, that hath seen Je-hath seen the Father.' (44.) Sink deep, &c. Or, 'Place these things in your ears.' Let them still sound in your ears, and let no subsequent events cause you to forget them; for a very different scene will soon open.—We have no reason to promise ourselves tranquillity; seeing they, who at one time extol Christ, not long after crucify Him.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)

(38.) The symptoms of this boy's disorder are analogous to those of epilepsy. Hewlett. 'An epileptic fit suddenly affects a person, how ever employed, and precipitates him, deprived both of sensation and intellect, to the earth: for he does not seem to fall, but rather to be thrown down with some degree of violence, so that he is often bruised or wounded. In this situation he grinds his teeth, and foams at the mouth; the head is jerked from side to side, and frequently beaten against the ground; the arms and legs, the neck and back, stir become rigid, or are convulsed in various directions; the abdomen and hypochondria are swelled, and tense. After some time, the convulsive motions cease, and the patient appears almost lifeless; and at length, he returns to himself, complaining of head-ache, labour, giddiness, and confused vision.'

(39.) 'That the boy was epileptic, Kinneol thinks evident, from the description of the disorder. He is, indeed, called lunatic by Matthew, but by that name the Greeks often designated epileptic patients. Rosenm. [See note Matt. 17: 15.]

less and perverse generation! how long shall I be with you, and suffer you? Bring thy son hither.

42 And as he was yet a coming, the devil threw him down and tare him. And Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit, and healed the child, and delivered him again to his father.

43 And they were all amazed at the mighty power of God. But while they wondered every one at all things which Jesus did, he said unto his disciples, 44 Let these sayings sink down into your ears: for the Son of man shall be delivered into the hands of men.

45 But they understood not this saying, and it was hid from them, that they perceived it not: and they feared to ask him of that saying.

more frightful than such as arise merely from natural causes: when the fit seized him, without any warning given, he suddenly cried out, and many a time his shrieks had pierced the heart of his tender father. This malicious spirit tare him, and bruised him, and departed not from him, but with great difficulty, and a deadly gripe at parting. O the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! And what mischief doth Satan do, where he gets possession! But happy they that have access to Christ!

4. How defective the disciples were in their faith. Though Christ had given them power over unclean spirits, yet they could not cast out this evil spirit, v. 40. Either they distrusted the power they were to fetch in strength from, or the commission given to them, or they did not exert themselves in prayer as they ought; for this Christ reproved them. O faithless and perverse generation. Dr. [S.] Clarke understands this as spoken to his disciples; 'Will ye be yet so faithless and full of distrust, that ye cannot execute the commission I have given you?'

5. How effectual the cure was, which Christ wrought on this child, v. 42. Christ can do that for us, which his disciples cannot; Jesus rebuked the unclean spirit, then when he raged most. One word from Christ healed the child; and it is here added, He delivered him again to his father. Note, When our children are recovered from sickness, we must receive them as life from the dead, and as when we first received them. It is comfortable to receive them from the hand of Christ again; 'Here, take this child, and be thankful; take it and bring it up for Me; take it, and do not set thy heart too much upon it.' With such cautions as these, parents should receive their children from Christ's hands, and then with comfort put them again into his hands.

V. 43-50. We may observe here,

I. The impression Christ's miracles made on all that beheld them, v. 43. Their wonder was universal; they wondered every one: the causes of it were universal; they wondered at all things which Jesus did; all his actions had something uncommon and surprising in them.

II. The notice Christ gave to his disciples of his approaching sufferings; (v. 24.) wicked men, men of the worst character shall be permitted to abuse Him at their pleasure. That is here implied, which is expressed by the other evangelists; They shall kill Him. But that which is peculiar here is, I. The connection of this with what goes next before, of the admiration of the people at beholding Christ's miracles, v. 43.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 23-45. To form some faint conception of the Redeemer's glory, now in heaven, and at his future appearance to judge the world, let us contemplate Him on the mount, when 'the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistening,' like the lightning. With this scene before our eyes, we may meditate with advantage on 'his decease which He accomplished at Jerusalem;' and thence follow Him with our thoughts to his present exaltation in heaven, where He is surrounded by his saints, who there appear with Him in glory, and expatiate in his praises. This may reconcile us to our present trials, and prepare us for the stroke of death; that we may go to behold and share that glory, one glimpse of which has sometimes made those favored with it to say, 'It is good for us to be here.' But we must now walk by faith, and hear obediently the words of the beloved Son of God; treasuring up every comfortable experience of his love, and every discovery of his majesty and excellency, to be our support in 'the days of darkness.' Thus we may maintain a successful conflict with the enemies of our souls; and in the exercise of a vigorous faith, hope to be instrumental in rescuing some of our fellow sinners from their destructive influence. But if we would be useful to others, we must seek to have our own minds delivered from every prejudice; and when we find ourselves unable to understand the words of Christ, we should not fear or neglect to ask Him, and to consult his more experienced servants, concerning them. (P. O. Matt. 17:1-13. Mark 9:1-13.)

SCOTT.

(41.) "How long shall I be with you," to the disciples, who are the "faithless generation;" "shall I suffer you," to the scribes, the "perverse generation," (Mark 9:19.) who were disputing with the disciples. This would never have been understood, had it not been the place in Mark; a thing not unusual in the Scriptures.

(44.) Let these sayings sink down into your ears. 'Or, put these words into your ears. To other words you may lend occasional attention—but to what concerns my sufferings and death, you must ever listen. Let them constantly occupy a place in your most serious meditations and reflections.'

Verse 45.

'They understood the words; but knew not how to reconcile them with their own traditions, that their Messiah should live forever, or

The disciples had a fond conceit of his temporal kingdom, and that He should reign; and they with Him, in secular pomp and power; and now they thought his mighty power would easily effect the thing, and his interest in the people, gained by his miracles, contribute to it; therefore Christ, who knew what was in their hearts, takes this occasion to tell them again, that so far from having men delivered into his hands, He must be delivered into the hands of men; so far from living in honor, He must die in disgrace; and that all his miracles, and his interest by them gained in the people, would not be able to prevent it. 2. The solemn preface with which it is introduced; 'Let these sayings sink down into your ears; take special notice of what I say, and mix faith with it; let not the notions you have of the temporal kingdom of the Messiah, stop your ears against it, nor make you unwilling to believe it. Admit what I say, and submit to it.' Let it sink down into your hearts; so the Syriac and Arabic. The word of Christ does us no good unless we let it sink down into our heads and hearts. 3. The unaccountable stupidity of the disciples, with reference to this prediction of Christ's sufferings. It was said in Mark, They understood not that saying; it was plain enough, but they would not understand it in the literal sense, because it agreed not with their notions; and they could not understand it in any other, and were afraid to ask Him, lest they should be undeceived, and awaked out of their pleasing dream; but it is here added, that it was hid from them, that they perceived it not. We cannot think that it was in mercy hid from them, lest they should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow at the prospect of it; but that it was a paradox, because they made it so to themselves.

III. The rebuke Christ gave his disciples for their disputing among themselves which should be greatest, v. 46-48. This passage we had before. But observe here,

1. Ambition of honor, and strife for superiority and precedence, are sins that most easily beset the disciples of our Lord Jesus, for which they deserve to be severely rebuked; they flow from corruptions, which they are highly concerned to subdue and mortify, v. 46. They that expect to be great in this world, commonly aim high, and nothing will serve them short of being greatest; this exposes them to a great deal of temptation and trouble, which they are safe from, that are content to be little, to be least, to be less than the least.

2. Jesus Christ is perfectly acquainted with

It was hid from them that they perceived it not. 'It was veiled to them that they might not apprehend it. The words are susceptible of either interpretation: yet the common signification of the original word rendered that, is, to the end that, though it frequently denotes no more than so that; it seems, as it stands here, to express something intentional. There is no impropriety in supposing that predictions were intentionally expressed so as not to be perfectly understood at the time; but so as to make an impression, which would secure their being remembered till the accomplishment should dispel every doubt.' Campbell. Certainly the translation here given is more literal than our version.

SCOTT.

(46.) There arose a reasoning. 'Or, more literally, a dispute—one inquired, and another answered, and so on.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

46 ¶ Then there arose a reasoning among them, which of them should be greatest.

47 And Jesus, perceiving the thought of their heart, took a child and set him by him,

48 And said unto them, "Whoever shall receive this child in my name, receiveth me: and whoever shall receive me, receiveth him that sent me: for he that is least among you all, the same shall be great."

49 And John answered and said, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbade him because he followed not with us.

50 And Jesus said unto him, "Forbid him not; for he that is not against us is for us."

51 ¶ And it came to pass, when the time was come that he the thoughts and intents of our hearts; (v. 47.) they are words to Him, whispers are loud cries. It is a good reason why we should keep up a strict government of our thoughts, because Christ takes a strict cognizance of them.

3. Christ will have his disciples aim at that honor which is to be obtained by a quiet and condescending humility, not at that which is to be obtained by a restless and aspiring ambition, v. 47. He always expressed a tenderness for little children, and He proposed this child to them for an example. Let them be in temper like it, humble and quiet, and easy to itself; let them not affect worldly pomp, or grandeur, or high titles, but be as dead to them as this child; let them bear no more malice to their rivals and competitors than this child did. Let them be willing to be the least, if that would contribute any thing to their usefulness, to stoop to the meanest office whereby they might do good. Let them assure themselves that this would recommend them to the esteem of their brethren, and likewise to the favor of Christ, who would take the kindnesses done to them as done to Himself; Whoever shall receive one such child, a preacher of the Gospel that is of such a disposition as this, he placeth his respect aright, and receiveth Me; and whoever receiveth Me in such a minister, receiveth Him that sent Me: and what greater honor can any man attain to in this world than to be received by men as a messenger of God and Christ, and to have God and Christ, own themselves received and welcomed in him? This honor have all the humble disciples of Jesus Christ, and thus they shall be truly great, that are least among men.

IV. The rebuke Christ gave his disciples for discouraging one, who, though not of their communion, nor one of the twelve, nor of the seventy, nor of those that ever associated with them, yet on occasional hearing of Christ, believed in Him, and made use of his name with faith and prayer, for the casting out of devils. Now, this man they would not let pray and preach, though to the honor of Christ, and the good of souls, because he did not follow Christ with them, but separated from their church, and was not or-derained as they were, nor gave them the right hand of fellowship. Now if ever any society of Christians in the world had reason to silence those that were not of their communion, the twelve disciples at this time had; and yet Christ chid them for what they did, and warned them not to do the like again, nor any that profess to be the successors of the apostles, v. 50 "You do well, to do as you do, but it doth not therefore follow, that he doeth ill, to do as he doeth, and that you do well to put him under an interdict, for he that is not against us is for us and therefore ought to be countenanced by us." We need not lose any of our friends, while we have so few, and so many enemies. Those may be found faithful followers of Christ, and, as such, may be accepted of Him, though they do not follow with us. See Mark 9:38, 39. O what a great deal of mischief to the church, even from those that boast of relation to Christ, and pretend to envy for his sake, would be prevented, if this passage of story were but duly considered!

V. 51—56. This passage of history we have not in the other evangelists, and it seems to come in here for the sake of its affinity with that next before, for in this also Christ rebuked his disciples, because they envied for his sake; for a spirit of bigotry and persecution is directly contrary to the spirit of Christ and Christianity.

Observe here, I. The readiness and resolution of our Lord Jesus, in prosecuting his great undertaking for our redemption and salvation. Of this we have an instance, v. 51. There was a time fixed for the sufferings and death of our Lord Jesus, and He knew when it was, yet so far was He from keeping out of the way, that then He appeared most publicly of all, and was most busy, knowing that his time was short. When He saw his death and sufferings approaching, He looked upon it as the time when He should be received up into glory, (1 Tim. 3:16.) even into the highest heavens, to be enthroned there. All good Christians may frame to themselves, the same notion of death, and call it their being received up, to be with Christ where He is; and when

(Marg. Ref.—Matt. 18:1—6. Mark 9:33—37, 41, 42.) 'Their words spoken among themselves, could not escape Him, who knew their thoughts, or reasonings.' (48.) The same shall be great. Or, 'greatest,' as some understand it; but indeed 'the least' true Christian 'shall be great,' above all the great ones of the earth, and equal to the angels in heaven. (20:36.)

Verses 49, 50.

(Marg. Ref.—Mark 33—40.) Forbid, &c. 'In extraordinary cases, we should not rashly either condemn, or approve.' Beza. This is an observation of no little importance; for on the one hand, precipitate and harsh condemnations of extraordinary appearances of a revival in religion, when it afterwards appears, that God was eminently prospering his Gospel, by those who followed not with these rash censurers, are very common; and so on the other, is an indiscriminate sanctioning of all that is done or observed on these occasions, as divine; when the event shows, that human infirmity and depravity, and Satan's artifice, in various ways, concurred to disgrace, if possible, and stop the good work of the Holy Spirit. To wait, to examine and observe, and impartially to distinguish between what is scriptural, and what is unscriptural, in these extraordinary events; and not to give an opinion, till the whole be maturely weighed, so as to leave but little danger, either of condemning the work of God, or of sanctioning the delusions of the devil, is a chief point of heavenly wisdom.

In. (49.) Casting out, &c. 'Probably this was a case of nothing resembling that of the sons of Sceva; (Acts 19:13—16,) and God might see reason now to grant that efficacy to their adjurations, which He afterwards denied, when the evidences of the Gospel were proposed so much more distinctly and fully, after the descent of the Spirit.'

Doctrines.

(50.) He that is not against us, is for us, &c. 'Our Lord had formerly said, (Matt. 12:30.) He that is not with Me, is against Me; thereby giving his hearers a just and necessary admonition, that, on the whole, the war between Him and Satan admitted of no neutrality, and that those who were indifferent to Him would finally be treated as his enemies. But here, in another view, He very consistently uses a different and seemingly opposite proverb, directing his followers to judge of men's characters in the most candid manner, and charitably to hope that they who did not oppose his cause, wished well to it. I cannot, with Mr. Baxter, think an express declaration of regard to Christ to have been necessary in the former case than now; but it is most obvious, that Christ requires us to be more rigorous in judging ourselves, than He allows us to be in judging each other.'

The evangelist seems, in the conclusion of this chapter, to have recorded several detached incidents of similar import, which occurred at different times; it is not therefore needful to conclude, that the remainder of his gospel relates to events which took place during Christ's last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, or subsequent to it. The expression here is very remarkable: 'When the time was come that He should be received up,' (Mark 16:19.) John 6:61, 61:16, 25—30, 17:4, 5,) which related to his ascension to his glory heaven. 'He steadfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalem.' (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes. Acts 20:22—24, 21:7—14.) 54.) Wilt Thou, &c. The Samaritans were indeed highly blamable; but their conduct was the effect rather of national prejudices and bigotry, than of determined enmity to the Word and worship of God; and though they refused to entertain Christ and his disciples, they did not attempt to persecute or murder them, according to the conduct of idolatrous Abaziah towards the prophet Elijah; so that there was no occasion for so terrible a judgment, either to vindicate the honor of God, or to secure his servants from their enemies. When the inhabitants of Nazareth behaved far worse to Jesus than these Samaritans did, the disciples had not thought of calling for miraculous judgment; (4:23—30,) but the Nazarenes, and others who slighted or injured Jesus, were Jews, and therefore the disciples were more disposed to bear it from them, than from the despised and detested Samaritans. They, whom the fire from heaven consumed at the word of Elijah, fell sacrifices to the justice of God, and their death greatly conduced to the benefit of Israel; whereas had these Samaritans been destroyed, they would have been sacrificed to the disciples' prejudices and resentment, and the consequences would have been injurious to both Jews and Samaritans. What our Lord said, against calling for fire from heaven upon the Samaritans, is still more forcibly conclusive against every kind and degree of persecution. The Samaritans were really schismatics and heretics, and they openly rejected Christ Himself. Whatever, therefore, has been urged, concerning the tendency of penalties and severities, to reclaim heretics and schismatics, or to prevent others from joining them, and to preserve the unity of the church, or the honor of its ministers; indeed, every topic, which persecutors, whether popish or protestant, have urged, or can urge, on this subject, is shown by our Lord's answer to be perfectly nugatory; and they who plead for the necessity of severe authority to promote religion, know not what manner of spirit they are of.' It is also to be considered, that it is our duty to appeal to God, and wait his decision, whether He will miraculously interpose, which was all that the apostles required; and another, and a widely different thing, indeed, to take the cause out of his hands, and to execute show^d be received up, ²he stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, 52 And ³sent messengers before his face: ⁴and they went and entered into a village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him.

53 And ⁵they did not receive him, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem.

54 And when his disciples, James and John, saw this, they said, Lord, ⁶wilt thou that we command^d fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did?

55 But he turned, and rebuked them, and said, ⁷Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of.

56 For ⁸the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. ⁹And the time of their being received up is at hand, lest them lift up their heads, knowing that their redemption draws nigh.

On this prospect of the joy set before Him, He steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem, the place where He was to suffer and die. He was fully determined to go, and to go, not as commonly He did, but through Samaria, directly to Jerusalem, because there now his business lay. He went cheerfully and courageously, though He knew the things which should befall Him there. He did not fail, nor was discouraged, but set his face as a flint, knowing that He should be not only justified, but glorified, Isa. 50: 7. How should this shame us out of our backwardness to do and suffer for Christ!

II. The rudeness of the Samaritans in a certain village, who would not receive Him, nor suffer Him to take refreshment among them. He sent messengers, some of his disciples, to take up lodgings; for He would not come, to give offence, or if they took any courage at the number of his followers. He would have been a generous Guest, and preached the Gospel to them, as He had done some time ago to another city of the Samaritans, John 4: 41. He would have been the greatest Blessing that ever came to their village, and yet they forbid Him entrance. Such treatment his Gospel and ministers have often met with. Now the reason was, because his face was as though He would go to Jerusalem; they observed He was directing his course that way. The great controversy between the Jews and the Samaritans was about the place of worship—whether Jerusalem or mount Gerizim near Sychar; see John 4: 20. And so hot was the controversy between them, that the Jews would have no dealings with the Samaritans, nor they with them, John 4: 9. Yet we may suppose they did not deny other Jews lodgings among them, for then Christ would not have attempted it; and it would have been a great way about for some of the Galileans to go to Jerusalem, any other way than through Samaria. But they were particularly incensed against Christ, who was a celebrated Teacher, for owning and adhering to the temple at Jerusalem, when the priests of that temple were such bitter enemies to Him, which, they hoped, would have driven Him to come and worship at their temple, and bring that into reputation; but when they saw that He would go forward to Jerusalem, notwithstanding this, they would not show Him the common civility, which, probably, they used formerly to show Him in his journey thither.

III. The resentment of James and John at this affront, v. 54. When these two heard this message, they were all in a flame presently, and nothing will serve them but Sodom's doom on this village; 'Lord,' say they, 'give us leave to command fire to come down from heaven, not to frighten them only, but to consume them.' Here indeed they showed, 1. A great confidence in the power they had received from Jesus; though this, had not been particularly mentioned in their commission, yet they could, with a word's speaking, fetch fire from heaven. Wilt Thou that we speak the word, and the thing will be done. 2. A great zeal for the honor of their Master; they took it very ill, and they could not think of it without indignation, that their Master, who did good wherever He came, should be thus slighted. 3. A submission, notwithstanding standing, to their Master's good-will and pleasure; they will not offer to do such a thing, unless Christ give leave; wilt Thou that we do it? 4. A regard to the examples of the prophets that were before them; it is doing as Elias did; (2 Kings 1: 10, 12,) so apt are we to misapply the examples of good men, and to think to justify ourselves by them in the irregular liberties we give ourselves, when the case is not parallel.

But though there was something right in what they said, yet there was much more amiss. This was not the first time, by a great many, that our Lord Jesus had been in the like manner affronted, witness the Nazarenes thrusting Him out of their city, and the Gadarenes desiring Him to depart out of their coast; and yet He never called for any judgment on them, but patiently put up with the injury. These were Samaritans, from whom better was not to be expected, and perhaps they had heard that Christ had forbidden his disciples to enter into any of the cities of the Samaritans, (Matt. 10: 6,) and therefore it was not so bad in them as in others, who knew more of Christ, and had received so many favors from Him. Perhaps some few only knew any thing of the matter, while many, if they had heard of Christ's being so near them, would have gone to meet Him, and welcomed Him; and must the whole town be laid in ashes for the wickedness of a few? Will they have the righteous destroyed with the wicked? Their Master had never yet on any occasion called for fire from heaven, nay, He had refused to give the Pharisees any sign from heaven when they demanded it: (Matt. 16: 1, 2,) and why should they think to introduce it? The example of Elias did not reach the case. Elijah was sent to display the terrors of the law, and to give proof of that; and to witness as a hold reprove against the idolatries and wickednesses of the court of Ahab, and it was agreeable enough to him to have his commission thus proved; but it is a dispensation of grace that is now to be introduced, to which such a terrible display of divine justice will not be at all agreeable. Archbishop Tillotson suggests, that their being now near Samaria, where Elijah called for fire from heaven, might help to put them in mind of it; but though the place was the same, the times were altered.

IV. The reproof He gave to James and John for their fiery, furious zeal; (v. 55.) as many as He loves, He rebukes and chastens, particularly for what they do, that is irregular and unbecoming them, under color of zeal for Him.

1. He shows them in particular their mistake, v. 55. 'Ye are not aware what an evil spirit and disposition ye are of; how much there is of pride and passion, and personal revenge, under this pretence of zeal for your Master.' Note, There may be much corruption lurking, nay stirring in the hearts of good people, and they themselves not be sensible of it. 'Ye do not consider what a good spirit, directly contrary to this, ye should be of.' Have you not been taught to love your enemies, to bless them that curse you—to call for grace, and not fire upon them?

vengeance on opposers, by the arm of man, and according to his sentence, without any possibility of certainly knowing, whether God does or does not approve what we are doing; one thing to call for fire from heaven and another to kindle fires on earth, to consume men branded as heretics. (2 Cor. 13: 7—10.)

(51.) 'Grotius,' says Bloomfield, 'here takes occasion to remark, that in this circumstance, as well as many others, is narrated by Luke without any regard to the order of time, the cause of which he conjectures to be as follows: When Luke had narrated two remarkable admissions of Christ, the one exhorting to avoid ambition, the other to eradicate envy, he thought it a suitable place for adding a third against revenge; and that it might be the better understood, he added the circumstances which led to the mention of it. So also the subsequent histories of the three men called by Christ must not be supposed to relate to one and the same time, but were thrown into one place, on account of the similitude of the subject, so that it might be readily and clearly understood what impediments would exist to the calling and profession of the Gospel. Having treated of which, Luke resumes the thread of the history at the calling of the apostles, (with which he had commenced the chapter,) and then subjoins the calling of other persons.'

Recor. 11: 49. 'I scruple not at all, with the most ancient versions, and the reality of critics, to follow the usual interpretation, which refers the ascension to Christ's ascension.'

(55.) 'The sons of Zebedee would be imitating what Elias did among the Samaritans. In name Boanerges, their dreams, it seems, are of lightnings and thunder, for death and destruction. But ye have seen, O sons of Zebedee, your Master anxious for the lives of men from the very bottom of his heart, and the lowers of his compassion, healing the sick, liberating demoniacs, raising the dead—and you are breathing slaughter and flames, and desire the destruction of the whole town, as Sodom was destroyed. Ye have not known, ye have not borne in mind, what spirit becomes the apostles of the Messiah.'

Spirit.] 'The word here used denotes mind, affection, sentiments, feelings. Almost all the ancient commentators take the words without an interrogation, "Ye know not by what state of mind ye are affected, and whither it would hurry you; it is a zeal not accompanied with knowledge, and therefore unworthy of my disciples." Many recent interpreters, however, as Rosenmueller, Schleusner, and Kuinoel, take the sentence interrogatively, thus, "Know ye not with what temper of mind ye ought, as my disciples, to be actuated? for I came," &c. This, however, seems somewhat harsh; and, upon the whole, I prefer the former interpretation.'

Ye are not now under the dispensation of bondage, terror, and death, but of love, liberty, and grace—a dispensation ushered in with a proclamation of peace on earth, and good-will toward men, to which you ought to accommodate yourselves, and not by such imprecations as these oppose yourselves.

2. He shows them the general design and tendency of his religion, v. 56. He designed to propagate his holy religion by love and sweetness, and every thing that is inviting and endearing, not by fire and sword, and blood and slaughter; by miracles of healing, not by plagues, and miracles of destruction, as Israel was brought out of Egypt. Christ came to slay all enmities, not to foster them. Those are certainly destitute of the spirit of the Gospel, that are for anathematizing and rooting out by violence and persecution all that are not of their mind and way, that cannot in conscience say as they say, and do as they do. Christ came not only to save men's souls, but to save their lives too; witness his many miracles of healing; by which, and a thousand other instances of beneficence, it appears that He would have his disciples to do good to all, to the utmost of their power, but hurt to none; to draw men into his church with the cords of a man, and the bands of love, but not think to drive men into it with a rod of violence, or the scourge of the tongue.

V. His retreat from this village. Christ would not only not punish them for their rudeness, but would not insist on his right of travelling the road; but quietly and peaceably went to another village, where they were not so stingy and bigoted, and there refreshed Himself, and went on his way. Note, When opposition is strong, it is wisdom to get out of the way of it, rather than to contend with it. If some be very rude, instead of revenging it, we should try whether others will not be more civil.

V. 57-62. We have here an account of three several persons that offered themselves to follow Christ, and the answers that Christ gave to each of them. The two former we had an account of, Matt. 19: 21.

I. Here is one that is extremely forward to follow Christ immediately, but seems to have been too rash, hasty, and inconsiderate, and not to have sitten down, and counted the cost.

1. He makes Christ a very large promise; (v. 57.) Lord, I will follow Thee whithersoever Thou goest. This must be the resolution of all that will be found Christ's disciples indeed; they follow the Lamb whithersoever He goes, (Rev. 14: 4.) though it be through fire and water, to prisons and deaths.

2. Christ gives him a necessary caution, not to promise himself great things in the world, nor following Him, but, on the contrary, to count upon poverty and meanness; for the Son of man has not where to lay his head.

We may look upon this, (1.) As setting forth the very low condition that our Lord Jesus was in, in this world. See what a depth of poverty our Lord Jesus submitted to for us, to increase the worth and merit of his satisfaction, and to purchase for us a larger allowance of grace, that we through his poverty might be rich, 2 Cor. 8: 9. He here calls Himself the Son of man, a Son of Adam, Partaker of flesh and blood. He glories in his condescension, not only to the meanness of our nature, but to the meanest condition in that nature, to testify his love to us, and to teach us a holy contempt of the world, and of the great things in it, and a continual regard to another world. Christ was thus poor, to sanctify and sweeten poverty to his people, the apostles had no certain dwelling-place, (1 Cor. 4: 11.) which they might the better bear, when they knew their Master had not; see 2 Sam. 11: 11. We may well be content to fare as Christ did. (2.) As proposing this to the consideration of those who intend to be his disciples. If we mean to follow Christ, we must lay aside the thoughts of great things in the world, and not reckon upon making any thing more than heaven by our religion, as we must resolve not to take up with any thing less. Let us not go about to compound the profession of Christianity with secular advantages; Christ has put them asunder, let us not think of joining them together; on the contrary, we must expect to enter into the kingdom of heaven through many tribulations, must deny ourselves, and take up our cross. Christ tells this man what he must count upon if he followed Him, to lie cold and uneasy, to fare hard, and live in contempt; if he could not submit to that, let him not pretend to follow Christ. This word sent him back, for aught that appears; but it will be no discouragement to any that know what there is in Christ and heaven to set in the scale against this.

II. Here is another, that seems resolved to follow Christ, but he begs a day, v. 59. To this man Christ first gave the call; He said to him, Follow Me. He that proposed the thing of himself, fled off when he heard of the difficulties that attended it; but this man to whom Christ gave a call, though he hesitated at first, yet, as it should seem, afterward yielded; so true was that of Christ, You have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you, John 15: 16. It is not o

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V 46-56. Alas! our reasonings and discussions (instead of being directed to mutual edification) are too often mere disputes, 'which of us should be the greatest.' This may be, and in general is, very speciously disguised; but applause, popularity and precedence are vastly too much aimed at, by professed Christians, and even by ministers; and a little child is Jesus' constant emblem, by which to teach us simplicity and humility: indeed, if we be his disciples, we need not be ambitious of further honor; for the least of the whole company of Believers, though insignificant among his brethren as an infant, and as much disregarded by them in all their concerns, is and shall be great, as a child and friend of God, an heir of heaven, and a future companion and compeer to the angels before the throne. 'Such honor have all his saints; and as every one, who, in any place or form, successfully preaches 'repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ,' is instrumental in bringing the slaves of Satan to partake of these glorious and everlasting privileges; surely we should be slow to forbid him, lest Christ rebuke us for our officiousness.—While we endure hardship in the work of the Lord, let us also look well to our own spirits. It is easy for us to say, 'Come, see my zeal for the Lord,' and obvious for us to think, that we are remarkably faithful in his cause; when, in fact, we are inflamed with resentment, impatient of contradiction, seeking our own honor, and doing great harm instead of good. (Jam. 1: 19-21. P. O. 19: 27. P. O. 3: 13-18.)—Fire and faggot can only prove the diabolical malice and cruelty of those who use them; and if the truth itself were supported by such means, it would reasonably become suspected of being from beneath. Yet many, who seem upon the whole to be upright, are led to indulge the same spirit in another way; and their sarcasms and calumnies against those who differ from them, with other bitter fruits of pride and resentment, too plainly show, that 'they know not what manner of spirit they are of.' Many controversial books, many religious conversations, nay, many sermons, demonstrate to the impartial judge, that very much indeed is wrong in the temper of the parties concerned; though they are not at all aware of it. (Ex. 20: 16.) It behoves us therefore to beg of the Lord, that He would convince us of our sin, and rather rebuke and chasten us, than leave us to indulge unchristian tempers; and thus to act contrary both to his precepts, his example, the end of his coming into the world, and the tendency of his holy religion. (P. O. Matt. 18: 1-6. Mark 9: 30-50.)

SCOTT.

(Marg. Ref.—Notes Matt. 8: 18-22.) Some of these incidents seem to have occurred early in our Lord's ministry; but the last we have not before met with. The desire of this person to go home, and bid farewell to his friends, and to settle his temporal concerns, before he attached himself to Christ as his constant follower, was no doubt the effect of a wavering and undetermined state of mind; Jesus therefore answered his request, by applying to his case a proverbial expression, which seems to have been frequently used. The proverb applies to the subjects, as well as to the ministers of 'the kingdom of God'; but the latter seem especially intended. (14: 28-33. 1 Kings 19: 19-21. Acts 13: 13-15. Jam. 1: 5-8.) (61.) bid farewell, &c. 'Not simply to bid farewell; but having given orders what thou wouldst have done, to dismiss any one, and bid him farewell.' Leigh

DODDRIKSE,

CHAP. X.

Jesus sent out seventy disciples, to work miracles and preach; and pronounced a woe against Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, 1-16. The seventy return with joy at their success; and Christ instructs them in what they should rejoice, 17-20. He forces the Father for revealing his Gospel; to the temple, who is declares his own personal and mediatorial authority and glory, 21-22; and the happiness of his disciples, 22-24. A lawyer inquires what he must do to inherit eternal life; and Jesus refers him to the law of God, 25-28; and shows him, by the example of a good Samaritan, who is his neighbor, 28-37. He commends Mary's attention to his doctrine, and reproves Martha, who was 'troubled about much serving,' 38-42.

AFTER these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before his face, into every city and place, whether he himself would come.

the dead to bury their dead, or none but those who are themselves aged and dying, who are as good as dead, and fit for no other service, yet thou hast other work to do; go thou, and preach the kingdom of God.' Not that Christ would have his followers or his ministers to be unnatural; our religion teaches us to be kind and good in every relation, to show piety at home, and to requite our parents. But we must not make these offices an excuse from our duty to God. If the nearest and dearest relation we have in the world, stand in our way to keep us from Christ, it is necessary that we have a zeal that will make us forget father and mother, as Levi did, Deut. 33: 9. This disciple was called to be a minister, and therefore must not entangle himself with the affairs of this world, 2 Tim. 2: 4. And it is a rule, That whenever Christ calls to any duty, we must not consult with flesh and blood, Gal. 1: 15, 16. No excuses must be admitted against a present obedience to the call of Christ.

III. Here is another that is willing to follow Christ, but must have a little time to talk with his friends about it.

Observe, 1. His request for a dispensation, v. 61. He said, 'Lord, I will follow Thee; I design no other, I am determined to do it; but let me first go bid them farewell that are at home.' This seemed reasonable; it was what Elijah desired when Elijah called him, Let me kiss my father and my mother; and it was allowed him: but the ministry of the gospel is preferable, and the service of it more urgent than that of the prophets; and therefore here it would not be allowed. Suffer me—Let me go, and set in order my household affairs, and give direction concerning them; so some understand it. Now that which was amiss in this, is, that he looked upon his following of Christ as a melancholy, troublesome, dangerous thing; and seemed to him: not willeth, and of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy, that giveth the call, and maketh it effectual, as to this man here. Observe,

1. The excuse he made. 'I have an aged father at home, who cannot live long, and will need me while he does live; let me go, and attend to him, until he is dead, and I have performed my last office of love to him, and then I will do any thing.' We may here see three temptations, by which we are in danger of being kept from following Christ; which therefore we should guard against. We are tempted to rest in a discipleship at large, in which we may be at a loose end, and not to come close, and give up ourselves to be strict and constant. We are tempted to defer the doing of that which we know to be our duty, and to put it off to some other time. When we have got clear of such a care and difficulty, when we have despatched such a business, raised an estate to such a pitch, then we will begin to think of being religious; and so we are cozened of all our time, by being cozened of the present time. We are tempted to think, that our duty to our relations will excuse us from our duty to Christ—a plausible excuse indeed; but the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof must be sought and minded in the first place.

2. Christ's answer to it, v. 60. 'Suppose (which is not likely) that there were none but thee, or none but those who are themselves aged and dying, who are as good as dead, and fit for no other service, yet thou hast other work to do; go thou, and preach the kingdom of God.' Not that Christ would have his followers or his ministers to be unnatural; our religion teaches us to be kind and good in every relation, to show piety at home, and to requite our parents. But we must not make these offices an excuse from our duty to God. If the nearest and dearest relation we have in the world, stand in our way to keep us from Christ, it is necessary that we have a zeal that will make us forget father and mother, as Levi did, Deut. 33: 9. This disciple was called to be a minister, and therefore must not entangle himself with the affairs of this world, 2 Tim. 2: 4. And it is a rule, That whenever Christ calls to any duty, we must not consult with flesh and blood, Gal. 1: 15, 16. No excuses must be admitted against a present obedience to the call of Christ.

III. Here is another that is willing to follow Christ, but must have a little time to talk with his friends about it.

Observe, 1. His request for a dispensation, v. 61. He said, 'Lord, I will follow Thee; I design no other, I am determined to do it; but let me first go bid them farewell that are at home.' This seemed reasonable; it was what Elijah desired when Elijah called him, Let me kiss my father and my mother; and it was allowed him: but the ministry of the gospel is preferable, and the service of it more urgent than that of the prophets; and therefore here it would not be allowed. Suffer me—Let me go, and set in order my household affairs, and give direction concerning them; so some understand it. Now that which was amiss in this, is, that he looked upon his following of Christ as a melancholy, troublesome, dangerous thing; and seemed to have his worldly concerns more upon his heart than he ought to have, hankering after his relations and family-concerns; so that he was willing to enter into a temptation from his purpose of following Christ. To go bid them farewell that were at home at his house, would be to expose himself to the strongest solicitations imaginable to alter his resolution, for they would all be against it, and would beg and pray that he would not leave them; now it was presumption in him to thrust himself into such a temptation. Those that resolve to walk with their Maker, and follow their Redeemer, must resolve that they will not so much as parley with their tempter.

2. The rebuke which Christ gave him for this request, v. 62. 'No man, having put his hand to the plough, and designing to make good work of his ploughing, will look back, or behind him, for then he makes balks, and the ground he ploughs is not fit to be sown; so thou, if thou hast designed to follow Me, and to reap the advantages of those that do so, if thou lookest back to a worldly life again, and hankerest after that, if thou lookest back, as Lot's wife did to Sodom, (which seems to be alluded to here,) thou art not fit for the kingdom of God: neither a soil fit to receive the good seed of the kingdom of God, if thou art thus ploughed by the halves, and not gone through with; nor a sower fit to scatter the good seed of the kingdom, if thou canst hold the plough no better.' Ploughing is in order to sowing. As those are not fit to be sown, whose fallow ground is not first broken up, so those are not fit to be employed in sowing, who know not how to break up the fallow ground, but, when they have laid their hand to the plough, on every occasion look back, and think of quitting it. Note, Those who begin with the work of God, must resolve to go on with it, or they will make nothing of it. Looking back inclines to drawing back, and drawing back is to perdition. Those are not fit for heaven, who, having set their faces heavenward, face about. But he, and he only, that endures to the end, shall be saved.

CHAP. X. v. 1-16. We have here the sending forth of seventy disciples, two and two, into divers parts of the country, to preach the Gospel, and to work miracles in those places which Christ Himself designed to visit, to make way for his entertainment. This is not taken notice of by the other evangelists; but the instructions here given them are much the same with those given to the twelve. Observe,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 57-62. In following Christ, we should count our cost: worldly riches and pleasures cannot reasonably be expected in his service, who, when on earth, 'had not where to lay his head;' and in that cause for which He shed his blood, we should be ready to renounce all secular interests, and to forego even relative comforts and endearments, that we may preach or promote the kingdom of God.—No man is fit for the ministry of the Gospel, whose eye and heart are fixed on worldly objects: for then he will either leave his work, or neglect it, or do it in an improper manner. This should be seriously laid to heart by all who intend to engage in that important service, as well as by those who are already employed in it. Many lay hold of this sacred function, while their affections are fixed on the riches, honors and pleasures of the world; nay, while they are scheming to render their ministry itself subservient to the gratification of avarice, ambition, or sensuality! But no one would employ a man to plough his lands, who neglected his work, or performed it in so heedless and unskilful a manner, as these men do their sacred services: as therefore they are not fit for the work of the kingdom of God on earth, they will assuredly not be found meet for the inheritance of the kingdom of God in heaven. (P. O. Matt. 8: 14-22.) SCOTT.

(57.) A certain man.] 'He was a scribe, Matt. 8: 19-22. It is probable this took place when Christ was at Capernaum.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(61.) Go and bid them farewell, &c.] 'Permit me first to settle the affairs of my family, and take my leave, &c. In this latitude, I doubt not, the phrase in the original is to be taken here. Intending to give up his possessions, he probably designed to order how they should be distributed among his friends. So Heinicus.' DODDRIDGE.

(62.) No man, &c.] 'Our Lord may use the phrase as a kind of proverbial expression for a careless, irascible person, who must be peculiarly unfit for the Christian ministry. How happy had it been for his church, had this lively admiration been regarded, without which it is impossible to divide, or rather direct, the word of truth aright, 2 Tim. 2: 15.' ID.

Plough.] 'The culture of the soil was at first very simple, being performed by no other instruments than sharp sticks. By these, the ground was loosened, until spades and shovels, and not long after, ploughs, were invented. All these implements were known in the time of Moses, Deut. 23: 13. Gen. 45: 6. Job 1: 14. The first plough was doubtless nothing more than a stout limb of a tree, from which projected another shortened and pointed limb; while at the further end of the lower branch was fastened a transverse yoke, to which the oxen were harnessed. A laet, a handle was added, by which the plough might be guided. It was necessary for the ploughman constantly and firmly to hold the handle of the plough, and, that no spot might remain untouched, to lean forward and fix his eyes steadily upon it.' JARN.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. v. 1-12. (3: 1-6.) The seventy disciples seem to have been intended as assistants to the apostles both at the present, and after our Lord's ascension. Many of the first preachers of the Gospel, no doubt, were of this company; but the traditions on this subject are little to be depended on. Some expositors conjecture that the evangelist himself was one of them; but this seems altogether unfounded. (Preface to this Gospel.) As an intimation of the still greater things, which would afterwards be wrought among them, he began by repeating an exhortation, which has been already explained. (Marg. Ref. e-1.—Matt. 9: 36-38.) He also ordered them 'to salute no man by the way;' that is, as their time was short and precious, and their work important, they must be altogether intent upon it; and not loiter or trifle, out of needless attention to ceremony or personal regards. (2 Kings 4: 29-31.) (6.) The son of peace.] (Eph. 2: 2. 1 Pet. 1: 14.) One who was disposed to welcome the message of peace, with which the seventy disciples were sent.

(1.) Other seventy.] 'Rather, seventy others—it seems to refer to the apostles previously chosen.' CAMPBELL.

I. Their number, seventy. As in the choice of twelve apostles, Christ had an eye to the twelve patriarchs, the twelve tribes, and the twelve princes of those tribes, so here He seems to have an eye to the seventy elders of Israel. So many went up with Moses and Aaron to the mount, and saw the glory of the God of Israel; (Exod. 24:1, 9,) and so many were afterward chosen to assist Moses in the government, in order to which the spirit of prophecy came unto them, Num. 11:24, 25. The twelve wells of water, and the seventy palm-trees that were at Elim, were a figure of the twelve apostles, and the seventy disciples, Exod. 15:27. They were seventy elders of the Jews, that were employed by Ptolemy, king of Egypt, in turning the Old Testament into Greek, whose translation is thence called the Septuagint. The great sanhedrim consisted of this number.

Now, these seventy, though they did not attend Christ so closely and constantly as the twelve did, yet were the constant hearers of his doctrine, and witnesses of his miracles, and believed in Him. They were those whom Peter speaks of as the men which accompanied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, and were part of the one hundred and twenty there spoken of, Acts 1:15, 21. Many of those that were the companions of the apostles, whom we read of in the Acts and the Epistles, we may suppose, were of these seventy disciples.

II. Their work and business: He sent them two and two, that they might strengthen and encourage one another. If one fall, the other will help to raise him up. He sent them, not to all the cities of Israel, as He did the twelve, but only to every city and place whither He Himself would come, (v. 1.) as his harbingers; and we must suppose, though it be not recorded, that Christ did soon after come to all those places whither He now sent them, though He could stay but a little while in a place. Two things they were ordered to do, the same that Christ did wherever He came; 1. They must heal the sick, (v. 9.) heal them in the name of Jesus, which would make people long to see Jesus, and ready to entertain Him. 2. They must publish the approach of the kingdom of God, its approach to them. 'Now is the day of your visitation, know and understand it.' It is good to be made sensible of our advantages and opportunities, that we may improve them. When the kingdom of God comes nigh us, it concerns us to go forth to meet it.

III. The instructions He gives them.

1. As to prayer, v. 2.

(1.) They must be duly affected with the necessities of the souls of men. They must look about, and see how great the harvest was, what abundance of people there were, that had at this time their expectations raised of the coming of the Messiah, and of his kingdom. There was corn ready to shed, and be lost, for want of hands to gather it in. Note. Ministers should apply themselves to their work, under a deep concern for precious souls, looking upon as the riches of this world, which ought to be secured for Christ. They must likewise be concerned that the laborers were so few. The Jewish teachers were indeed many, but not laborers; they did not gather in souls to God's kingdom, but to their own interest and party. Note. Those that are good ministers themselves, wish that there were more good ministers, for there is work for more. It is common for tradesmen not to care how few there are of their own trade; but Christ would have the laborers in his vineyard reckon it a matter of complaint when the laborers are few.

(2.) They must earnestly desire to receive their mission from God; that He would send them forth as laborers into his harvest, who is the Lord of the harvest, and that He would send others forth; for if God send them forth, they may hope He will go along with them and give them success. Let them therefore say, as the prophet, (Isa. 6:8.) Here am I, send me. It is desirable to receive our commission from God, and then we may go on boldly.

2. The expectation of trouble and persecution; v. 3. 'Your enemies will be as wolves bloody and cruel, and ready to pull you to pieces; in their threatenings and revilings, they will be as howling wolves to terrify you; in their persecutions of you, they will be as ravening wolves to tear you. But you must be as lambs, peaceable and patient, though made an easy prey of.' It would have been very hard thus to be sent forth as sheep among wolves, if He had not endured them with his spirit and courage.

3. Provisions. As to these, they must depend on God and their friends to provide what was convenient for them; 'Carry neither a purse for money, nor a scrip or knapsack for clothes or victuals, nor new shoes; (as before to the twelve, ch. 9:3.) and salute no man by the way.' This command Elisha gave his servant, when he sent him to see the Shunammite's dead child, 2 Kings 4:29. Not that Christ would have his ministers rude, morose, and unmannered; but they must go as men in haste, and not hinder or retard themselves with needless ceremonies or compliments. They must go as men of business, business that relates to another world, which they must be intent upon, and therefore must not entangle themselves with conversation about secular affairs.—You are a minister of the Word; attend to your office. They must go as serious men, and men in sorrow; it was the custom of mourners, in the first seven days of their mourning, not to salute any, Job 2:13. Christ was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and it was fit that by this and other signs his messengers should resemble Him, and show themselves affected with the calamities of mankind.

4. The good-will they must show to all, and their trust in God, who knows the heart, for success, v. 5, 6.

(1.) The charge given them was, Whatsoever house they entered into, they must say, Peace be to this house. Here, they are supposed to enter into private houses; not being admitted into the synagogues. And as their public preaching was driven into houses, so thither they carried it. Like their Master, wherever they visited, they preached from house to house, Acts 5:42. 20:20. Christ's church was at first very much a church in the house. They are instructed to say, 'Peace be to this house, to all under this roof, to this family, and to all that belong to it.' Peace be to you, was the common form of salutation among the Jews; but they must not use it in formality, but with solemnity; 'Salute no man by the way in compliment, but those into whose house ye enter, say to them, Peace be to you, with seriousness and in reality; for this is intended to be more than a compliment.' Christ's ministers go into all the world, to preach peace by Jesus Christ, and to invite men to come and take the benefit of it. We are to pray for peace to all. We must earnestly desire the salvation of those we preach to, and offer up those desires to God in prayer; and it may be well to let them know that we do thus pray for them, and bless them in the name of the Lord.

(2.) The success was different, according to the different disposition of those they preached and prayed for. According as the inhabitants are sons of peace or not, accordingly our peace will, or will not, rest upon the house.—The quality of the receiver determines the nature of the reception. [1.] 'You will meet with some (4.) Salute no man by the way. The originals were very exact in the observances of outward decorum; and we may collect from several passages in the Old and New Testaments, that their salutations and expressions of regard were extremely tedious and tiresome.

HORNE.

'Serious and taciturn as the natives of the East usually are, they grow talkative when they meet an acquaintance, and salute him. A mountain traveller relates the reciprocal salutations with those who return in the caravans. The questioning and salutation begins, and continues with the repetition of the same phrases: "How do you do? God be praised that you are come in peace! God give you peace! How fares it with you?" The higher the rank of the person returning, the longer does the salutation last.'

BURDER.

(6.) Son of peace. In Jewish style, a man who has any good or bad quality, is called the son of it, ch. 7:35. Matt. 11:19. Eph. 5:3. John 17:12. 2 Sam. 12:5.

kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

10 But into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, go your ways out into the streets of the same and say,

11 Even the very dust of your city, which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you: notwithstanding, be ye sure of this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you.

12 But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable in that day for Sodom, than for that city.

13 Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon which have been done in you, they had a great while ago repented, sitting in sackcloth and ashes.

14 But it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the judgment, than for you.

15 And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted to heaven, shalt be thrust down to hell.

16 He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me.

that are the sons of peace, that, by the operations of the divine grace, pursuant to the designations of the divine counsel, are ready to admit the word of the Gospel in the light and love of it, and have their hearts made as soft wax to receive the impressions of it. Those are qualified to receive the comforts of the Gospel, in whom there is a good work of grace wrought. And as to those, your peace shall find them out, and rest upon them, your prayers for them shall be heard, the promises of the Gospel shall be confirmed to them, the privileges of it conferred on them, and the fruit of both shall remain and continue with them; a good part that shall not be taken away. [2.] You will meet with others that are no ways disposed to hear or heed your message; whole houses that have not one son of peace in them. Now it is certain that our peace shall not come on them, they have no part nor lot in the matter; the blessing that rests on the sons of peace, shall never come on the sons of Belial, nor can any expect the blessings of the covenant, that will not come under the bonds of it. But it shall return to us again; that is, we shall have the comfort of having done our duty to God, and discharged our trust. Our prayers, like David's, shall return into our own bosom; (Ps. 35: 13.) and we shall have commission to go on in the work. Our peace shall return to us again, not only to be enjoyed by ourselves, but to be communicated to others, to the next we meet with, them that are sons of peace.

5. The reception of the kindnesses of those that did entertain them, and bid them welcome; (v. 7, 8.) 'Those that receive the Gospel, will receive you that preach it, and give you entertainment; you must not think to raise estates, but you may depend on a subsistence. And be not shy; suspect not your welcome, be not afraid of being troublesome, but eat and drink heartily such things as they give; for whatever kindness they show you, it is but a small return for the kindness you do them in bringing the glad tidings of peace; you will deserve it, for the laborer is worthy of his hire, the laborer in the work of the ministry is so, if he be indeed a laborer; and it is not an act of charity, but of justice, in them who are taught in the Word, to communicate to them that teach them.' Be not nice and curious in your diet; eat and drink such things as they give, (v. 7.) such things as are set before you, v. 8. Be thankful for plain food, and do not find fault, though it be not dressed according to art. It ill becomes Christ's disciples to be desirous of dainties. Probably, Christ here refers to the traditions of the elders about their meat, which were so many, that those who observed them, were extremely critical; you could hardly set a dish of meat before them, but there was some scruple or other concerning it; but Christ would not have them to regard those things; but eat what was given them, asking no question for conscience' sake.

6. The denunciation of the judgments of God against those who rejected them and their message; 'If you enter into a city, and they do not receive you, if there be none there disposed to hearken to your doctrine, leave them, v. 10. If they will not give you welcome into their houses, do you give them warning in their streets.' He orders them to do as (ch. 9: 5.) He had ordered the apostles to do; 'Say to them, not with rage, or scorn, or resentment, but with compassion to their poor, perishing souls, and a holy dread of the ruin which they are bringing on themselves, Even the dust of your city which cleaveth on us, we do wipe off against you, v. 11. From them we do not receive any kindnesses, be not beholden to them; it cost that prophet of the Lord dear, who accepted a meal's meat with a prophet in Bethel, 1 Kings 13:21, 22.' It shall be a witness for Christ's messengers, that they had been there according to their Master's order; tender and refusal were a discharge of their trust. But it shall be a witness against the recusants, that they would not give Christ's messengers any entertainment, no, not so much as water to wash their feet with, but they were forced to wipe off the dust. 'But tell them plainly, and bid them be sure of it, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. Here is a fair offer made you; if you have not the benefit of it, it is your own fault. The gospel is brought to your doors; if you shut your doors against it, your blood is on your own head. Now that the kingdom of God is come nigh to you, if you will not come up to it, and come into it, your sin will be inexcusable, and your condemnation intolerable.' Note, The fairer offers we have of grace and life by Christ, the more we shall have to answer for another day, if we slight these offers, v. 12. The Sodomites indeed rejected the warning given them by Lot; but rejecting the Gospel is a more heinous crime, and will be punished accordingly in that day; He means the day of judgment, (v. 14.) but calls it, by way of emphasis, that day, because it is the last and great day, the day when we must account for all the days of time, and have our state determined for the days of eternity.

On this occasion, the evangelist repeats,

(1.) The particular doom of those cities wherein most of Christ's mighty works were done, which we had, Matt. 11:20, &c. Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, all bordering on the sea of Galilee, where Christ was most conversant. [1.] They enjoyed greater privileges; Christ's mighty works were done in them, all gracious works, works of mercy. They were hereby exalted to heaven, not only dignified and honored, but put in a fair way of being happy—brought as near heaven as external means could bring them. [2.] God's design in favoring them thus, was to bring them to repentance and reformation of life; to sit in sackcloth and ashes, both in humiliation for the sins they had committed, and in humility, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. The ministry of the Gospel is intended to prepare men to receive Christ, as a Prince and a Savior; and He will surely come, in the power of his Spirit, to all places whither He sends his faithful servants.—The increase of laborers, in this blessed work, should excite us 'to pray the Lord of the harvest, to send forth' more and more: for they are very few hitherto, compared with the harvest of souls which shall in due time be gathered in all over the earth. (P. O. Matt. 9: 27—33.)—At Christ's command, we should go forth to preach his Gospel, depending on his power, and copying his example. While we sindinterestedly seek the peace and salvation of those to whom we are sent, we may conscientiously 'eat and drink such things as are set before us;' for the faithful minister is as justly entitled to a moderate subsistence, as the laborer is to his wages. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9: 6—18.)—If our message be obstinately rejected, we ought, in the most decided manner, to bear testimony against the opposers of it, and withdraw from them: for it is still true of all the faithful preachers of the Gospel, that 'he who heareth them, heareth Christ; and he who despiseth them, despiseth Christ, and ... the Father who sent Him.' (P. O. Matt. 10: 7—33. 11: 16—24.)

Marg. Ref.—Matt. 10: 40—42. John 12: 44—50. 1 Thea. 4: 6—8.) T. reject an ambassador, or to treat him with contempt, is an affront to the prince who commissioned and sent him, and whom he represents (2 Sam. 10: 3, 4. 2 Cor. 5: 18—21.) The apostles and seventy disciples were ambassadors and representatives of Christ: and they who rejected or despised them, in fact rejected and despised Him. Christ Himself was the Apostle of his Father, his Ambassador to men, and 'the Effulgency of his glory;' so that to reject or despise Him, was to reject and despise the Father that sent Him. The miraculous powers, exercised by these primitive messengers of Christ, rendered their case peculiar: but, in every age, Jesus 'is despised and rejected of men,' by contempt poured on his faithful and exemplary ministers; and, in despising Him, men show their contempt; if God, and all eternity against Him.

17 ¶ And the seventy returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name.

18 And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven.

19 Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall hurt you.

20 Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven.

21 In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight.

they speak of it with an air of exultation; Even the devils, those potent enemies, are subject to us. Note, The saints have no greater joy or satisfaction in any of their triumphs, than in those over Satan. If devils are subject to us, what can stand before us?

II. What acceptance they found with Him, and how He entertained this account.

1. He confirmed what they said, as agreeing with his own observation; (v. 18.) 'My heart and eye went along with you; I took notice of the success you had, and I saw Satan fall as lightning from heaven.' Note, Satan and his kingdom fell before the preaching of the Gospel. They triumphed in casting devils out of the bodies of people; but Christ, in the fall of the devil from his interest he has in the souls of men; which is called his power in high places, Eph. 6: 12. He foresees this to be but an earnest of the destroying of Satan's kingdom in the world, by the extirpating of idolatry, and the turning of the nations to the faith of Christ. Satan falls from heaven when he falls from the throne in men's hearts, Acts 26: 18. And Christ foresaw that the preaching of the Gospel, which would fly like lightning through the world, would, wherever it went, pull down Satan's kingdom. Now is the prince of this world cast out. Some have given another sense of this, as looking back to the fall of the angels, and designed for a caution to these disciples, lest their success should puff them up with pride; 'I saw angels turned into devils by pride; (that was the sin for which Satan was cast down from heaven, where he had been an angel of light; I saw it, and give you an intimation of it, lest you, being lifted up with pride, should fall into that condemnation of the devil, who fell by pride;' 1 Tim. 3: 6.

(2.) The general rule which Christ would go by, as to those to whom He sent his ministers; He will reckon Himself treated according as they treat his ministers, v. 16. What is done to the ambassador, is done, as it were, to the prince that sends him, v. 16. Note, Those who condemn the Christian religion, do in effect put a slight on natural religion, which it is perfective of. And they who despise the faithful ministers of Christ, who, though they do not hate and persecute them, yet think meanly of them, look scornfully at them, and turn their backs on their ministry, will be reckoned with as despisers of God and Christ.

V. 17-24. Christ sent forth the seventy disciples as He was going up to Jerusalem, to the feast of tabernacles, when He went up, not openly, but as it were in secret, (John 7: 10.) and Dr. Lightfoot thinks it was before his return from that feast, that they, or at least some of them, returned to Him. Now here we are told,

I. What account they gave Him of the success of their expedition, v. 17. The healing of the sick only was mentioned in their commission; (v. 19.) yet, no doubt, the casting out of devils was included, and in this they had wonderful success. 1. They give Christ the glory of this; It is through thy name. Note, All our victories over Satan are obtained by power derived from Jesus Christ, and He must have all the praise; if the work be done in his name, the honor is due to his name. 2. They entertain themselves with the comfort of it, they speak of it with an air of exultation; Even the devils, those potent enemies, are subject to us. Note, The saints have no greater joy or satisfaction in any of their triumphs, than in those over Satan. If devils are subject to us, what can stand before us?

II. What acceptance they found with Him, and how He entertained this account.

Satan falls from heaven when he falls from the throne in men's hearts, Acts 26: 18. And Christ foresaw that the preaching of the Gospel, which would fly like lightning through the world, would, wherever it went, pull down Satan's kingdom. Now is the prince of this world cast out. 2. He repeated, ratified, and enlarged their commission, v. 19. Note, To him that hath, and useth well what he hath, more shall be given. They had employed their power vigorously against Satan, and now Christ intrusts them with greater power. (1.) An offensive power, power to tread on serpents and scorpions, devils, malignant spirits, the old serpent; 'You shall bruise their heads in my name, (Gen. 3: 15.) and set your feet on their necks—' you shall tread on these lions and adders, and trample them under foot; (Ps. 91: 13.) and the kingdom of the Messiah shall be every where set up upon the ruins of the devil's kingdom; as the devils have now been subject to you, so they shall still be.' (2.) A defensive power; 'Nothing shall by any means hurt you; not serpents or scorpions; you shall be unhurt by the most venomous creatures,' as Paul was, (Acts 28: 5.) and as is promised, Mark 16: 18. 'If wicked men be as serpents to you, and you dwell among those scorpions, (as Ezek. 2: 6.) you may despise their rage; it needs not disturb you, for they have no power against you but what is given them from above; they may hiss, but they cannot hurt. You may play on the hole of the asp, for death itself shall not hurt or destroy,' Isa. 11: 8, 19. 25: 8.

3. He directed them to turn their joy into the right channel, v. 20. 'Do not rejoice in the subjection of the spirits to you, only as your honor, and the confirmation of your mission, but rather rejoice because you are chosen of God to eternal life, and are the children of God through faith.' Christ, who knew the counsels of God, could tell them, that their names were written in heaven, for they are written in the Lamb's book of life. All believers are, through grace, entitled to the inheritance of sons, and have received the adoption of sons, and the Spirit of adoption, which is the earnest of that inheritance; and so are enrolled among his family; now this is matter of joy, greater joy than casting out devils. Note, Power to become the children of God, is to be valued more than a power to work miracles: for we read of those who did in Christ's name cast out devils, as Judas did, and yet will be disowned by Christ in the great day; but they whose names are written in heaven, shall never perish; they are Christ's sheep, to whom He will give eternal life. Saving graces are more to be rejoiced in than spiritual gifts; holy love is a more excellent way, than speaking with tongues.

It does not appear, that our Lord expressly promised the seventy disciples the power of casting out unclean spirits. When, therefore, they returned to Him, (doubtless at a time and place appointed for them,) they told Him with a joyful surprise, that not only diseases, but even devils, had been 'subject to them through his name.' It cannot be supposed that Christ meant, (v. 20.) by special revelation, to inform all these seventy persons, that they were registered in heaven, as heirs of eternal life; and in general, none can know this of themselves, except by true evidences, which prove them to be 'born of the Spirit,' and truly converted. 'Here Woltzenius says, Christ cast out devils by a virtue residing in Himself; his disciples only in the name and by the power of the Lord. Seeing then this power accompanied them into all parts of the world, it is necessary that Christ's presence should be with them every where; now such a presence is a certain indication of the Deity. (1 Kings 8: 27. Ps. 139: 7. Jer. 23: 24. Am 9: 3.) Satan being spoiled of his dominions, may be said to "fall from heaven,"

'by a phrase familiar both to sacred and profane writers. So of "the fall of the king of Babylon, the prophet says, "How art thou fallen," from heaven, O Lucifer!" (Is. 14: 12.) Of the fall of the colleague of Antonius, Cicero says, "Thou hast pulled him down from heaven." And when Pompey was overthrown, he is said by him, to have fallen "from the stars." Whitty.

H: offered up a solemn thanksgiving to his Father, for employing such mean people as his disciples were, in such high and honorable services; (v. 21, 22.) this we had before, (Matt. 11: 25-27.) only here it is prefixed, that in that hour, viz. that in which He saw Satan fall, and heard of the good success of his ministers, in that hour Jesus rejoiced. Note, Nothing rejoices the heart of the Lord Jesus so much as the progress of the Gospel, by the conversion of souls to Christ. Christ's joy was a solid, substantial joy, an inward joy, He rejoiced in spirit; but, like deep waters, it made no noise; it was joy, that a stranger did not intermeddle with; before He applied Himself to thank his Father, He stirred up Himself to rejoice; for holy joy is the root and spring of thankful praise. Two things He gives thanks for:

(1.) For what was revealed by the Father through the Son; v. 21. In all our adorations of God, we must have an eye to Him, both as the Maker of heaven and earth, and as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in Him our Father. Now that which He gives thanks for is, [1.] That the counsels of God concerning man's reconciliation to Himself, were revealed to some of the children of men, who might be fit also to teach others. [2.] That they were revealed to babes, to men of mean parts and capacities, whose extraction and education had nothing in it promising, who were but children in understanding, till God, by his Spirit, elevated their faculties, and furnished them with this knowledge, and an ability to communicate it. We have reason to thank God, not so much for the honor He has hereby put on the babes, as for the honor He has hereby done Himself, in perfecting strength out of weakness. [3.] That, at the same time when He revealed them unto the babes, He hid them from the philosophers, the Jewish rabbins. Thanks be to God that the apostles were not fetched from their schools. They would have mingled their notions with the doctrine of Christ, which would have corrupted it, as afterward it proved. For Christianity was much corrupted by the Platonists, the Peripatetics, and the judaizing teachers. If rabbins and philosophers had been made apostles, the success of the Gospel would have been ascribed to their learning and wit, and the force of their reasonings and eloquence; therefore they were passed by for the same reason that Gideon's army was reduced, Judges 7: 4. Paul, indeed, was bred a scholar; but he became a babe when he became an apostle, and made neither show nor use of any other knowledge than that of Christ and Him crucified, 1 Cor. 2: 2, 4. [4.] That God herein acted by way of sovereignty; Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight. If God gives his grace and the knowledge of his Son to some that are less likely, and doth not give it to others, whom we should think better able to deliver it with advantage; this must satisfy, so it pleases God, whose thoughts are infinitely above ours.

(2.) For what was secret between the Father and the Son, v. 22. [1.] The vast confidence that the Father puts in the Son; All things are delivered to me of my Father; all wisdom and knowledge; all power and authority; all the grace and comfort, all is delivered into the hand of the Lord Jesus; in Him all fulness must dwell, and from Him be derived; He is the great Trustee who manages all the concerns of God's kingdom. [2.] The good understanding that there is between the Father and the Son, and their mutual consciousness, such as no creature can be admitted to; No man knows who the Son is, nor what his mind is, but the Father, who possessed Him in the beginning of his ways, before his works of old; (Prov. 8: 22.) nor who the Father is, and what his counsels are, but the Son, who lay in his bosom from eternity, was by Him as one brought up with Him, and was daily his delight, (Prov. 8: 30.) and He to whom the Son, by the Spirit, will reveal Him. The Gospel is the revelation of Jesus Christ, and to Him we owe all the discoveries made us of the will of God for our salvation; He here speaks of it as that which was a great pleasure to Himself, and for being intrusted with which He was very thankful to his Father.

5. He told his disciples how well it was for them, that they had these things revealed to them, v. 23, 24. Having addressed Himself to his Father, He turned Him to his disciples, designing to make them sensible how much it was for their happiness, as well as for the glory and honor of God, that they knew the mysteries of the kingdom, and were employed to lead others into the knowledge of them; considering, (1.) What a step it is toward something better, though the bare knowledge of these things is not saving, yet it puts us in the way of salvation; Blessed are the eyes which see the things which ye see. God therein blesseth them, and if it be not their own fault, it will be an eternal blessedness to them. (2.) What a step it is above those that went before them, even the greatest saints, and those that were most the favorites of heaven; Many prophets and righteous men; (so it is, Matt. 13: 17. Many prophets and kings, so it is here) have desired to see and hear those things which you are daily and immediately conversant with, and have not seen and heard them. The honor and happiness of the New-Testament saints far exceed those even of the prophets and kings of the Old Testament, though they also were highly favored. The general ideas which the Old-Testament saints had, according to the intimations given them, of the graces and glories of the Messiah's kingdom, made them wish their lot had been reserved for those blessed days, and that they might see the substance of those things which they had faint shadows of. And the consideration of the great advantages we have, above what they had, should awaken

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17-24. Pious and zealous ministers, when evidently made useful, disregard their toil and hardship, and return from preaching the Word, to meet their gracious Lord in retirement, with joy and gratitude.—We may be sure that He will always rather exceed his promise, than fall short of it, to all who go forth depending on his help, and observing his directions; and we may, in hope, labor and pray for the pulling down of Satan's kingdom, all over the earth, through the preaching of the Gospel, and by the power of our exalted Redeemer. (Note, 2 Cor. 10: 1-6.) Nor can any adversary, by any means, hurt those, whom Jesus employs, protects, and prospers.—We should be thankful for gifts and usefulness, but chiefly seek the assurance of our names being written in heaven; for it would be far better to be the most obscure believer, than to have all knowledge, eloquence, and even success in preaching the Gospel, and at length to prove 'a cast-away.' Let us then beware especially of spiritual pride: by this sin, Satan 'fell like lightning from heaven,' and from a bright arch-angel, became a hateful and miserable fiend: (1 Tim. 3: 6.) pride has been the forerunner of destruction to many, who 'have prophesied, wrought miracles, and cast out devils in the name of Christ;' and of many, who for a time have preached with great popularity, and apparent success: and it has tarnished the lustre and terminated the usefulness of others, concerning whose final state better hopes may be entertained. (2 Cor. 12: 1-6, P. O. 1-10.)—The Lord Jesus 'rejoiced in Spirit,' that it pleased the Father to hide his 'mysteries from the wise and prudent, and to reveal them unto babes;' and He has at all times 'resisted the proud, and given his grace unto the humble.' The more simply dependent we therefore are on the teaching, help, and blessing of the Son of God, the more we shall know both of the Father and of the Son; (Notes, John 17: 1-3. 1 John 2: 20-25.) the more blessed we shall be in seeing the glory, and hearing the words, of the divine Savior; and the more useful we shall be made in promoting his cause. Whatever may be the precise meaning of the words, "No man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father," they must, I think, at least be conceived to convey some deep, mysterious truth. How far they may or may not relate to the great atonement, and sacrifice of Christ, who dare say? Those parts of the great covenant of grace, which relate to God Almighty are, no doubt, incomprehensible to us. Those parts which relate to us—which regulate our faith, and practice, are sufficiently plain. God has, in short, given us sufficient evidence to believe in the Gospel; and on that evidence we must exercise our faith in believing some truths, which we cannot understand.'

course to our Bibles, and walk in the way there showed us. It is a great mercy that we have the law written; and having it written, it is our duty to read it, and treasure it up, so that, when there is occasion, we may be able to tell what is written in the law, and how we read. To this we must appeal, our diligence to improve them; for if it do not, it will aggravate our condemnation.

V. 25-37. We have here, Christ's discourse with a lawyer about some points of conscience, which we are all concerned to be rightly informed in, and are so here, from Christ, though the questions were proposed with no good intention.

I. We are concerned to know what that good is, which we should do in this life, in order to attain eternal life. A question to this purport was proposed to our Savior by a certain lawyer, or scribe, v. 25. If Christ had any thing peculiar to prescribe, by this question he would get it from Him, and perhaps expose Him for it; if not, he would expose his doctrine as needless, since it would give no other direction for obtaining happiness, than they had already received; or, perhaps, he had no malicious design against Christ, only he was willing to talk with Him, as people go to church, to hear what the minister will say. This was a good question, What shall I do to inherit eternal life? But it lost all its goodness, when proposed with an ill design. Note, It is not enough to speak of the things of God, and to inquire about them, but we must do it with a suitable concern. If we speak of eternal life, and the way to it, in a careless manner, merely as a matter of discourse, or of dispute, we but take the name of God in vain.

Now, this question being started, observe, 1. How Christ turned Him to the divine law, and bid him follow its direction. Though He knew the thoughts and intents of his heart, He doth not answer him according to the folly of that, but according to the wisdom and goodness of the question. ^a He answered Him with a question, v. 26. He came to catechize Christ, and to know Him; but Christ will catechize him, and make him know himself. He talks to him as one conversant in the law; let him practise according to his knowledge, and he should not come short of eternal life. Note, It will be of great use to us, in our way to heaven, to consider what is written in the law, and what we read there. We must have recourse to our Bibles, and walk in the way there showed us. It is a great mercy that we have the law written; and having it written, it is our duty to read it, and treasure it up, so that, when there is occasion, we may be able to tell what is written in the law, and how we read. To this we must appeal,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 25-29. Good questions may be proposed from very base motives; yet we ought seriously to inquire, 'What shall we do to inherit eternal life?' And nothing should be counted difficult or perilous, where such a prize is at stake; especially as it is connected with the awful alternative of everlasting punishment. In answer to this inquiry, the blessed Savior will direct us to the written Word, and demand of us, 'How readest thou?' Yet the holy law itself cannot answer the question, How a sinner may inherit eternal life. It is, however, proper for those 'who desire to be under the law, to hear the law'; and when its extensive, spiritual, and reasonable requirements are fully and scripturally stated, we may safely assure any inquirer, that if he do this, he shall live. Indeed, the most perfect obedience for the time to come would not discharge any part of the debt, which we have already contracted: yet we know, that no man will ever perform this condition, or be able to claim eternal life, even on this ground; nay, no one will ever love God and his neighbor with any measure of pure, spiritual love, who is not made partaker of regenerating grace; which invariably produces humiliation for sin, and simplicity of dependence on the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus. But the proud heart of man strives earnestly against these mortifying convictions; and every ray of light that breaks in upon the conscience, excites men to other and further endeavors 'to justify themselves,' even as the approach of danger stirs us up to provide for our own defence. (Rom. 10: 1-4.) As the nature and effects of the love of God are most out of the way of carnal men, they elude conviction on that account; provided they can flatter themselves that they have not been injurious to their neighbors. Leaving out therefore 'the first and great commandment,' as if it were actually repealed; or supposing that by this we must try doctrines, and end disputes; this must be our oracle, and touchstone rule, guide.

2. What a good account he gave of the law. He did not, like a Pharisee, refer himself to the tradition of the elders, but, like a good testimony, he fastened on the two first and greatest commandments of the law, as those which he thought must be most strictly observed, in order to eternal life, and which included all the rest, v. 27. (1.) We must love God with all our hearts, must look on Him as the best of beings, in Himself most amiable, and infinitely perfect and excellent; as One to whom we lie under the greatest obligations, both in gratitude and interest. We must prize Him, and value ourselves by our relation to Him; must please ourselves in Him, and devote ourselves to Him. Our love to Him must be sincere and fervent; it must be superlative, a love strong as death; but an intelligent love, such as we can give a good account of. It must be an entire love; He must have our whole souls, and be served with all that is within us. We must love nothing beside Him, but what we love for Him, and in subordination to Him. (2.) We must love our neighbors as ourselves, which we shall easily do, if we, as we ought, love God better than ourselves. We must wish well to all, and ill to none; do all the good we can, and no hurt; we must fix it as a rule to ourselves, to do to others as we would they should do to us; this is to love our neighbor as ourselves.

3. Christ's approbation of what he said, v. 28. Though he came to tempt Him, yet what he said that was good, Christ commended. Thou hast answered right. Christ Himself fastened on those as the two great commandments of the law; (Matt. 22: 37.) both sides agreed in this. Those who do well, shall have praise of the same, and so should those that speak well; but the hardest part yet remains 'This do, and thou shalt live; thou shalt inherit eternal life.'

4. His care to avoid the conviction now read to fasten on him. When Christ said, This do and thou shalt live, he began to be aware that Christ intended to draw from him an acknowledgment that he had not done this, and therefore an inquiry what he should do, to get his sins pardoned; an acknowledgment also that they satisfy its requirements by 'a form of godliness,' they endeavor 'to justify themselves' in respect of 'the second, which is like unto it'; and learned scribes, ancient and modern, come in to their aid, with a variety of corrupt glosses, perplexing criticisms, and frivolous distinctions, before which the meaning and spirit of the precept seem to evaporate. Thus the most flagrant injustice, treachery, oppression and inhumanity, are openly vindicated, as consistent with the law of God! Nay, the Scripture is ransacked, and quoted for precedents and arguments, in favor of the most horrid cruelties, which rapacious avarice, malignity, bigotry, or ambition can perpetrate! Some difference of climate, or color, or religious tenets, is pleaded; as if this bounded the divine command, and excused us for not loving a vast majority of the human species as our neighbors! Or some judicial regulation, made to prevent the fatal effects of that hardness of heart, which no law can change; or some practices, evidently originating from human selfishness, are adduced, as if they actually repealed the laws of 'loving our neighbor as ourselves,' and 'of doing to others, as we would they should do unto us.' Thus men 'render the commandments of God of none effect, by their traditions' and corrupt reasonings; and human learning, nay, what is called theology, often rivets those prejudices, which are equally subversive of the law of love, and of the Gospel of free grace. We must, however, endeavor by every means to counteract the effects of such destructive errors: and in order to this, apt illustrations, and appeals to the heart and conscience, may be more useful than abstract reasonings; and though we must not countenance any corrupt prejudices, yet, on many occasions, it is advisable to oppose them indirectly, and to study by what avenue we may best find access to the heart. own nation and religion. Now observe,

(1.) The parable itself.

[1.] How the Jew was abused by his enemies. The man was travelling peaceably on his lawful occasions, in the great road that led from Jerusalem to Jericho, v. 30. The mentioning of those places intimates that it was matter of fact, and not a parable; probably it happened lately, just as here related. The occurrences of Providence would yield us many good instructions, if we would carefully observe and improve them, and would be equivalent to parables framed on purpose for instruction, and be more affecting. This poor man fell among thieves. Whether they were Arabian plunderers, or some profligate wretches of his own nation, or some of the Roman soldiers, doth not appear; but they were very barbarous; they not only took his money, but stripped him of his clothes, and that he might not be able to he could not do this perfectly, for the future, by any strength of his own, and therefore an inquiry how he might get strength to enable him to do it; but he was willing to justify himself, and therefore saith, in effect, as another did, (Matt. 19: 20.) All these things have I kept from my youth up. Note, Many ask good questions with a design rather to justify, than to inform themselves; rather proudly to show what is good in them, than humbly to see what is bad.

II. We are concerned to know who is our neighbor; whom we are obliged to love. This is another of this lawyer's queries, started only that he might drop the former, lest Christ should force him to condemn himself, when he was resolved to justify himself. As to loving God, he was willing to say no more of it; but as to his neighbor, he was sure he had come up to the rule; for he had always been kind and respectful to all about him. Now observe,

1. The corrupt notion of the Jewish teachers in this matter. Lightfoot quotes their own words to this purport, 'Where he saith, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, he excepts all Gentiles, for they are not our neighbors, but those only that are of our own nation and religion.' They would not put an Israelite to death for killing a Gentile, for he was not his neighbor: indeed they say, that they ought not to kill a Gentile whom they were not at war with; but that if they saw a Gentile in danger of death, they were under no obligation to help save his life. Such wicked inferences did they draw from that holy covenant of peculiarity by which God had distinguished them, and by abusing it thus, they had forfeited it; God justly took the forfeiture, and transferred covenant-favors to the Gentile world, to whom they brutishly denied common favors.

2. How Christ corrected this, and showed by a parable, that whomsoever we have need to receive kindness from, and find ready to show it us, we cannot but look upon as our neighbor; and therefore ought to look upon all those as such, who need our kindness, and to show them kindness accordingly, though they be not of our pursue them, or only to gratify a cruel disposition, (for otherwise, what profit was there in his blood?) they wounded him, and left him half dead, ready to die of his wounds. We may here conceive a just indignation at highwaymen, and at the same time we cannot but think with compassion on those that fall into the hands of such wicked and unreasonable men, and be ready, when it is in our power, to help them. What reason have we to thank God for our preservation from perils by robbers?

[2.] How he was slighted by those who should have been his friends, who were not only men of his own nation and religion, but men of a public character and station; nay, men of professed sanctity, whose offices obliged them to tenderness and compassion, (Heb. 5: 2.) who ought to have taught others their duty in such a case as this, which was to deliver them that were drawn unto death; yet they would not themselves do it. Lightfoot tells us that many of the courses of the priests had their residence in Jericho, and from thence came up to Jerusalem, when it was their turn to officiate there, and so back again, which occasioned abundance of passing and repassing of priests that way, and Levites, their attendants; they came thither, and saw the poor wounded man; probably they heard his groans, and they could not but perceive that, if he were not helped, he must quickly perish; but when they saw his case, they got as far off him as ever they could, as if they would have had a pretence to say, Behold, we knew it not. It is sad when those who should be examples of charity, are prodigies of cruelty, and when those who should, by displaying the mercies of God, open the bowels of compassion in others, shut up their own.

[3.] How he was succored and relieved by a stranger, a certain Samaritan, of that nation, which, of all others, the Jews most despised and detested, and would have no dealings with; this man had some humanity in him, v. 33. The priest had his heart hardened against one of his own people, but the Samaritan had his opened towards one of another people; when he saw him, he had compassion on him, he never took into consideration what country he was of; though a Jew, he was a man, a man in misery, and he has learned to honor all men; he knows not how soon this poor man's case may be his own, and therefore pities him, as he himself would desire and expect to be pitied in the like case. That so great love should be found in a Samaritan, was perhaps thought as great, as that faith which Christ admired in a Roman, and in a woman of Canaan; but really it was not so, for pity is the work of a man, but faith is the work of divine grace.

Verses 30—37.

This has generally been called a parable; but it is related as a fact, and probably was so. (35.) Two pence. Or, denarii. The circumstance, that the Samaritan could spare only so small a sum, seems an intimation that he was not affluent. The direct scope of this parable, or narrative, is evidently fixed by the context; it is a beautiful illustration of the law of 'loving our neighbor as ourselves,' without regard to nation, party, or any other distinction. The Samaritan alone has acted according to the commandment; and the whole was admirably suited to lead the lawyer to understand the subject. Our Lord therefore called on him to imitate the Samaritan's conduct; and this conclusion was calculated, by showing him the extent and spirituality of the law, to convince him that he could not, in this way, 'inherit eternal life,' as well as to direct his subsequent conduct. (Marg. Ref.)

(1.) Some commentators explain this supposed parable almost exclusively of the love of Christ to sinners; but this can be only an instructive accommodation. Man is not only in a pitiable state, as if contrary to his will and without his fault, he had fallen under the power of Satan; but he is also a condemned criminal, exposed to the righteous vengeance of God, from which Christ alone can deliver him. The Priest and the Levite could have helped the man if they would, and were very wicked in omitting to do it; but the law of God is 'holy, just, and good,' though it leaves the sinner to perish. (Rom. 7: 7-12.) At the same time, Christ has far outdone the good Samaritan; He came into the world on purpose to save sinners; their rebellions had been committed against Him, and they were deserving of his righteous indignation and holy abhorrence; He not only ventured some danger, and incurred some trouble and expense, to rescue them from deserved destruction; but He impoverished and abused Himself, and endured the most excruciating tortures, and the most ignominious death, for that end; and He not only brings them a temporary relief, but perfects their everlasting salvation. (P. O. Gen. 22: 13-24. Rom. 5: 8-10.) In short, the blessed Jesus has perfectly fulfilled the law of 'loving our neighbor as ourselves,' in such circumstances as no other person could be placed in. His conduct, therefore, is the best interpretation of the commandment, and the best example for our imitation. Several other accommodations have been made of the subject; but they are far more amusing than instructive; and it may seriously be apprehended, that, by them men's thoughts have been very much drawn off from the grand practical inference, 'Go, and do thou likewise.' (Marg. Ref. 11.—John 13: 12-17. 1 Pet. 2: 18-25.) (31.) By chance. That is, without intention. But that which is accidental, or by chance, as man is concerned, forms a part of the plan and purpose of God. (Rom. 2: 3.)

(30.) Went down] 'Jerusalem was on a high level, and Jericho in a valley upon the Jordan.' BLOOMFIELD.

And fell among thieves] 'The scene of this parable is with great propriety placed in that dangerous [and much frequented] road between Jerusalem and Jericho, [which was one hundred and forty stadia from Jerusalem, next in rank to it as to wealth and population;] for, from the testimony of Josephus, it appears that not only Judea was at that time overrun with robbers and ruffians, who committed the greatest excesses, but that this road in particular was deplorably harassed by banditti; it was favorable to their villainies, as it lay through wild and dreary solitudes. [The very aspect of the scenery, in a portion of it, the bold, projecting crags of rocks, the dark shadows in which every thing lay buried below, the towering height of the cliffs above, and the forbidding desolation which every where reigned around, seem to tempt to robbery and murder, says Buckingham, and occasion a dread of it in those who pass that way.] On account of the frequent robberies and murders committed here, it was, as Jerome tells us, called "the bloody way." (33.) 'It is admirably well judged to represent the distress or the side of the Jew, and the mercy on the side of the Samaritan; for self-interest would make them see how amiable such conduct was, and lay them open to our Lord's inference, v. 37. Had it been put the other way, prejudices might more easily have interposed before the heart could have been struck with these tender circumstances.' DOUGLASS.

The compassion of this Samaritan was not an idle compassion; he did not think it enough to say, 'Be healed, he helped' (Jam. 2: 16.) but when he drew out his soul, he reached forth his hand also to this poor, needy creature, Isa. 58: 7, 10. Prov. 31: 20. See how friendly this good Samaritan was. He went to the poor man, inquired, no doubt, how he came into this deplorable condition, and consoled with him. He performed the surgeon's part, for want of a better, and did all he could to ease the pain, and prevent the peril, of his wounds. He set him on his own beast, and went on foot himself, and brought him to an inn. A great mercy it is to have inns on the road. Some think the priest and Levite pretended they could not stay to help the poor man, because they were in haste, to go and attend the temple-service at Jerusalem. We suppose this Samaritan went on business; but he understood that both his own business and God's sacrifice too, must give place to such an act of mercy as this. He took care of him in the inn, got him to bed, had food for him that was proper, and due attendance, and it may be, prayed with him. Nay, as if he had been his own child, or one he was obliged to look after, when he left him next morning, he left money with the landlord, to be laid out for his use, and passed his word for what he should spend more. Two pence of their money was about fifteen pence of ours, which, according to the rate of things then, would go a great way; however, here it was an earnest of content, to the full of all demands. All this was kind and generous, and as much as one could have expected from a friend or a brother; and yet here it is done by a stranger and foreigner.

Now this parable is applicable to another purpose than that for which it was intended, and doth excellently set forth the kindness and love of God our Savior towards sinful, miserable man. We were like this poor, distressed traveller. Satan, our enemy, had robbed us, stripped us, wounded us; such is the mischief that sin hath done us; we are by nature more than half dead, twice dead, in trespasses and sins; utterly unable to help ourselves, for we were without strength. The law of Moses, like the priest and Levite, the ministers of the law, looks upon us, but gives us no relief, having neither pity nor power to help us; but the blessed Jesus, who, by way of reproach, was called a Samaritan, He has compassion on us. He binds up our bleeding wounds, (Ps. 147: 3. Isa. 61: 1.) pours in, not oil and wine, but that which is infinitely more precious, his own blood; He takes care of us, and bids us put all the expenses of our cure on his account; and all this, though He was none of us, till He was pleased by his voluntary condescension to make Himself so, but infinitely above us. This manifests the riches of his love, and obliges us all to say, 'How much are we indebted, and what shall we render?'

(2.) The application of the parable.

[1.] The truth contained in it is extracted from the lawyer's own mouth, v. 36, 37. The lawyer would not answer, as he ought to have done; 'Doubtless, the Samaritan was; but, He that shewed mercy on him; doubtless, he was a good neighbor to him, and I cannot but say that it was a good work thus to save an honest Jew from perishing.'

[2.] The duty inferred from it is pressed home upon the lawyer's own conscience; Go, and do thou likewise. The duty of relations is mutual and reciprocal; the titles of friends, brethren, neighbors, are, as Grotius here speaks, equally binding on both sides: If a Samaritan do well, that helps a distressed Jew, certainly a Jew does not well, if he do not in like manner help a distressed Samaritan: kind offices are to be reciprocated. And therefore go thou, and do as the Samaritan did, whenever occasion offers: show mercy to those that need thy help, and do it freely, and with concern and compassion, though they be not of thy own nation and thy own profession, or of thine own opinion and communion in religion. Let thy charity be thus extensive, before thou boastest of having conformed thyself to that great commandment, of loving thy neighbor. This lawyer valued himself much on his learning, and his knowledge of the laws, and in that he thought to have puzzled Christ Himself; but Christ sends him to school to a Samaritan, to learn his duty; 'Go, and do like him.' Note, It is the duty of every one of us, in our places, and according to our ability, to succor, help, and relieve all that are in distress and necessity, and of lawyers particularly; and herein we must study to excel many, that are proud of their being priests and Levites.

V. 38-42. We may observe here,

I. The entertainment Martha gave Christ and his disciples at her house, v. 38. Observe,

1. Christ's coming to the village where Martha lived, v. 38. This village was Bethany, nigh to Jerusalem, whither Christ was now going up. Note, Our Lord Jesus went about doing good, (Acts 10: 38.) scattering his benign beams and influences, as the true Light of the world. Wherever He went, his disciples went along with Him. And He honored the country villages, and not the great and populous cities only; for, as He chose privacy, so He countenanced poverty.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 30-37. It is most lamentable to observe, to what a degree selfishness pervades all ranks and orders of men; and how many excuses they devise, that they may avoid incurring trouble or expense, in relieving the miseries of others. Alas! that many professors and ministers of the Gospel are as evidently selfish and unfeeling as any other men! and thus they give up their holy faith and sacred function to the contempt and invectives of infidels, who substitute a proud semblance of benevolence, in place of repentance and faith. The true Christian, however, has the law of love written in his heart: the Spirit of Christ dwells in him, and his image is renewed on his soul: misery will therefore uniformly excite compassion in his breast, wherever it is seen, though in a stranger, an enemy, or of an opposite sect or party. Thus the Son of God looked down with compassion, and came to our relief; thus He is ever ready to pity and help the poor sinner; and He requires his ministers and people to show them their love to Him, by their attention to the weak and discouraged of his flock; (John 21: 15-17.) assuring them of an abundant recompense at his return to judge the world. After this interesting and endearing example of inexpressible love, to which we owe all our hopes and comforts, every true believer must and will pity and endeavor to relieve the oppressed, and to comfort the wretched; he will become the good Samaritan to the poor and afflicted, the ignorant and ungodly, of every name and nation, who come in his way: yea, he will go out of his way to meet with and relieve them, as he has ability and opportunity. And when he considers that Jesus loved him, and bled for him, when an enemy and a rebel; and, having shown him mercy, that He has commanded him 'to go and do likewise,' he will love, and do good to, even his enemies, and to the vilest of mankind, for Christ's sake. With this view of Christianity before our eyes, have we reason to expect that any, who profess it, will defraud, oppress, enslave, or persecute any of the human race? If there be an appearance of such practices in some who seem to be Christians, we must either allow that they are not what they profess to be, or that they 'know not what manner of spirit they are of.' And can we but wonder, that professed Christians should discourage, oppose, or forbid us, to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, and to the Jews, 'that they may be saved?' (Notes, Rom. 1: 13-16. 10: 12-17. 1 Thes. 2: 13-16.)

SCOTT.

(34.) Oil and wine.] 'That both were in common use, as medicines, among the ancient surgeons, is manifest from the citations here quoted by Wetsstein. That oil and wine were sometimes used separately, is clear from Columella.'

The oil was taken for the purpose of anointing the limbs; since, in the hot countries of the East, it is found particularly comfortable and refreshing; (perhaps also to use with food, as we use butter.) The antiquity of the custom is shown by the case of Jacob, who, though travelling only with his staff, yet took oil with him, since he anointed the stone he used for a pillow.'

[37.] Go and do thou likewise.] 'Had not what is here related (v. 30-37.) been a real matter of fact, and not a parable, the captious lawyer might have objected that no such case had ever existed; and that any inference drawn from it was only begging the question; but as he was, in all probability, in possession of the fact himself, he was forced to acknowledge the propriety of our Lord's inference and advice.'

40 But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to him, and said, Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me.

41 And Jesus answered and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things.

42 But one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her.

his word, and her submission to Christ's feet, or be made his footstool; but if we sit with Him at his feet now, we shall sit with Him on his throne shortly.

III. The care of Martha about her domestic affairs, v. 40. That was the reason why she was not where Mary was—sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. She was providing for the entertainment of Christ and those that came with Him. Observe here,

1. Something commendable, which must not be overlooked, (1.) Here was a commendable respect to our Lord Jesus; we have reason to think that it was not for ostentation, but purely to testify her good will to Him, that she made this entertainment. Note, Those who truly love Christ, will think that well bestowed, that is laid out for his honor. (2.) Here was a commendable care of her household affairs. It appears by the respect showed to this family among the Jews, (John 11:19,) that they were persons of some quality and distinction; and yet Martha herself did not think it a disparagement to her, to lay her hand even to the service of the family, when there was occasion for it. Note, It is the duty of those who have the charge of families, to look well to the ways of their household. The affectation of state and the love of ease make many families neglected.

2. Here was something culpable; which we must take notice of too. (1.) She was for much serving; her heart was upon it, to have a very sumptuous and splendid entertainment; great plenty, great variety, and great exactness, according to the fashion of the place. She was in care, concerning much attendance. Note, It does not become the disciples of Christ to affect much serving, to affect varieties, dainties, and superfluities, in eating and drinking. What need was there of much serving, when much less will serve? (2.) She was cumbered about it; she was just distracted with it. Note,

'Our Lord's words are a kind and tender expostulation, tending to vindicate the conduct of Mary. The most that can be said is, Martha was well employed, but Mary, on this occasion, better.'

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 42.

This term needful has reference to some proposed end; many things are needful to the gratification of men's passions; but the end proposed is, in itself, neither needful nor useful; many things are needful to the continuance of our lives on earth, but that may not be needful, or profitable for us. So that the favor of God is the only thing which is absolutely needful to our final happiness; the salvation of Christ is absolutely needful for us sinners, in order to the enjoyment of the favor of God; and a humble, believing, obedient attention to the Gospel is absolutely needful, in order to our obtaining an interest in the salvation of Christ. Where this 'one thing needful' is properly attended to, all other matters will be used, or pursued in subsequence to it; and whatever may seem to be neglected or lost, by this choice and conduct, present comfort and eternal felicity will be secured. Our Lord therefore said, that 'Mary had chosen that good part, which should not be taken from her.' (16:1-8, 19-23. Matt. 13:12.) Christ would by no

2. His reception at Martha's house, v. 38. Note, Our Lord Jesus, when on earth, was so poor, that He was necessitated to be beholden to his friends for a subsistence. Some were his particular friends, whom He loved more than his other friends, and them He visited most frequently. He loved this family, (John 11:5,) and often invited Himself to them. Christ's visits are the token of his love, John 14:23. 'It is called Martha's house, for, probably, she was a widow, and the housekeeper. Though it was chargeable to entertain Christ, for He did not come alone, but brought his disciples with Him, yet she would not regard the expense of it. (How can we spend what we have better than in Christ's service!) Nay, though at this time it was grown dangerous to entertain Him, especially so near Jerusalem, yet she cared not what hazard she ran for his name's sake, and bid Him welcome. Though Christ is every where spoken against, yet there is a remnant to whom He is dear, and who are dear to Him.'

II. Mary's attendance on the word of Christ, v. 20. She heard his word. It seems, our Lord Jesus, as soon as He came into Martha's house, even before entertainment was got for Him, addressed himself to his great work of preaching the Gospel: He presently took the chair with solemnity, for Mary sat to hear Him, which intimates that it was a continued discourse. Note, A good sermon is never the worse for being preached in a house; and the visits of our friends should be so managed, as to make them turn to a spiritual advantage. Mary, having this prize put into her hands, set herself to improve it, not knowing when she should have such another. Since Christ is forward to speak, we should be swift to hear. She sat to hear, which denotes a close attention; her mind was composed, and she resolved to abide by it; not to catch a word now and then, but to receive all that Christ delivered: She sat at his feet, as scholars at the feet of their tutors, signifying her readiness to receive to the guidance of it. We must either sit at Christ's feet, or be made his footstool; but if we sit with Him at his feet now, we shall sit with Him on his throne shortly.

Whatever cares the providence of God casts upon us, we must not be cumbered with them, nor be disquieted and perplexed by them. Care is good, and duty; but cumber is sin, and folly. (3.) She was then cumbered about much serving, when she should have been with her sister, sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. Note, Worldly business is then a snare to us, when it hinders us from serving God, and getting good to our souls.

IV. The complaint Martha made to Christ against her sister Mary, for not assisting her, on this occasion, in the business of the house, v. 40.

1. It may be considered as a discovery of her worldliness: it was the language of her inordinate care and cumber. She speaks as one in a mighty passion with her sister, else she would not have troubled Christ with the matter. Note, The inordinacy of worldly cares and pursuits is often the occasion of disturbance in families, and of strife and contention among relations. Moreover, those that are eager upon the world themselves, are apt to blame and censure those that are not so too; and while they justify themselves in their worldliness, and judge of others by their serviceableness to them in their worldly pursuits, they are ready to condemn those that addict themselves to the exercises of religion, as if they neglected the main chance, as they call it. Martha, being angry at her sister, appealed to Christ, and would have Him to say that she did well to be angry. It should seem as if Christ had sometimes expressed himself tenderly concerned for her ease and comfort, and would not have her go through so much toil and trouble, and she expected that He should now bid her sister take her share in it. When Martha was caring, she must have Mary, and Christ, and all, to care too, or else she is not pleased. Note, Those are not always in the right, that are most forward to appeal to God; we must therefore take heed, lest we at any time expect that Christ should espouse our unjust and groundless quarrels. The cares which He casts on us, we may cheerfully cast on Him, but not those which we foolishly draw on ourselves. He will be the patron of the poor and injured, but not of the turbulent and injurious.

2. It may be considered as a discouragement of Mary's piety and devotion. Her sister should have commended her for it; but, instead of that, she condemns her as wanting in her duty. Note, It is no strange thing for those that are zealous in religion, to meet, not only with opposition from enemies, but with blame and censure from their friends. David's fasting, and his dancing before the ark, were turned to his reproach.

V. Christ's reproof to Martha for her inordinate care, v. 41. She appealed to Him, and He gives judgment against her, v. 41, 42.

1. He reproved her, though her Guest, her fault was her over-solicitude to entertain Him, and she expected He should justify her in it, yet He publicly checked her for it. Note, As many as Christ loves, He rebukes and chastens. Even those that are dear to Christ, if any thing be amiss in them, shall be sure to hear of it. Nevertheless, I have something against thee.

means consent to her being deprived of the present satisfaction of flattery to his discourse, in order to assist in providing a needful plenty and variety, for the refreshment of the bodies, or the indulgence of the appetites, of the company. Though Martha was on this occasion faulty, yet she was a true believer, and did not in her general conduct neglect the one thing needful; we may therefore suppose that this reasonable and affectionate reproof had its proper effect; and that her conduct, when Jesus afterwards came to her house, was regulated by more spiritual and rational considerations. (John 11:1-46. 12:1-8.) 'Not one dish only to eat of, as Theophylact and many of the fathers descant here, but the better part, which Mary made it her chief care to labor after.' Whithy.

One thing is needful. 'Or, there is one thing absolutely necessary. CHAP. XI.

Jesus teaches his disciples to pray, and encourages earnestness and importunity by two illustrations, 1-13. He casts out a devil, and exposes the absurdity and malice of those who ascribed the miracle to the power of Beelzebub, 14-26. He shows the blessedness of true piety and all external privileges; and warns the impenitent Jews, 27-36. Dining with a Pharisee, He exposes the ignorance, hypocrisy, and wickedness of the Scribes and Pharisees, 37-52; who eagerly endeavor to ensnare and accuse Him, 53, 54.

AND it came to pass, a that as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples.

rebukes of Providence. If they fret for no just cause, it is just with Him to order something to fret at.

4. That which aggravated the sin and folly of her care was, that but one thing is needful. It is a low construction which some put on this, that, whereas Martha was in care to provide many dishes of meat, there was occasion but for one: one would be enough. If we take it so, it furnishes us with a rule of temperance, not to affect varieties and dainties, but to be content to sit down to one dish of meat, to half of one, Prov. 23:1-3. It is a forced constructor which some of the ancients put upon it. But oneness is needful, in opposition to distractions. There is need of one heart, to attend on the Word, not divided and hurried to and fro, as Martha's was at this time. The one thing needful is certainly meant of that which Mary made her choice—sitting at Christ's feet, to hear his word. Martha was troubled about many things, when she should have applied herself to one; godliness unites the heart, which the world had divided. The many things she was troubled about, were needless, while the one thing she neglected, was needful. Her care and work were good in their proper season and place; but now she had something else to do, which was unspeakably more needful, and therefore should be done first, and most minded. She expected Christ to have blamed Mary for not doing as she did, but He blamed her for not doing as Mary did; and we are sure the judgment of Christ is according to truth.

VI. Christ's approbation and commendation of Mary for her serious piety; Mary hath chosen the good part.

1. She had justly given the preference to that which best deserved it; For one thing is needful; this one thing that she has done, to give up herself to the guidance of Christ, and receive the law from his mouth. Note, Serious godliness is a needful thing, the one thing needful; for nothing without this will do us any real good in this world, and nothing but this will go with us into another world.

2. She had herein wisely done well for herself; Christ justified Mary against her sister's clamors. However we may be censured and condemned by men for our piety and zeal, our Lord Jesus will take our part; But Thou shalt

2. When He reproved her, He called her by name, Martha; reproofs are then most likely to do good, when they are particular, as Nathan's to David. He repeated her name; He speaks as one in earnest, and deeply concerned for her welfare. Those that are entangled in the cares of this life, are not easily disentangled. To them we must call again and again, O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord.

3. That which He reproved her for, was, her being careful and troubled about many things. He liked not that she should think to please Him with a rich and splendid entertainment, and with perplexing herself to prepare it for Him; whereas He would teach us, as not to be sensual in using such things, so not to be selfish in being willing that others should be troubled, no matter who or how many, so we may be gratified. Christ reproves her, both for the intenseness of her care, and for the extensiveness of it. 'Poor Martha, thou hast many things to fret at, and that puts thee out of humor, whereas less ad would serve.' Note, Inordinate care and trouble about many things in this world are a common fault among Christ's disciples; they are very displeasing to Christ, and that for which they often come under the answer, Lord, for me. Let not us then condemn the pious zeal of any, lest we set Christ against us; and let us never be discouraged if we be censured for our pious zeal, for we have Christ for us. Note, Sooner or later, Mary's choice will be justified, and all those who make that choice, and abide by it. But this was not all: He applauded her for her wisdom; She hath chosen the good part; to be with Christ, to take her part with Him; she chose the better business, and the better happiness, and took the better way of honoring Christ, and of pleasing Him. Note, (1.) A part with Christ is a good part; it is a part for the soul and eternity, the part Christ gives to his favorites. (John 13: 8.) who are partakers of Christ, (Heb. 3: 14.) and partakers with Christ, Rom. 8: 17. (2.) It is a part that shall never be taken away from those that have it. A portion in this life will certainly be taken away from us, at the furthest, when we shall be taken away from it; but nothing shall separate us from the love of Christ, and our part in that love. Men and devils cannot take it away from us, and God and Christ will not. (3.) It is the wisdom and duty of every one of us to choose this good part, the service of God for our business, and the favor of God for our happiness, and an interest in Christ, in order to both. In particular cases we must choose that which has a tendency to religion, and reckon that best for us, which is best for our souls. Mary was at her choice, whether she would partake with Martha in her care, and get the reputation of a fine housekeeper, or sit at the feet of Christ, and approve herself a zealous disciple; and by her choice in this particular, Christ judges of her general choice. (4.) Those who choose this good part, shall not only have what they choose, but shall have their choice commended in the great day.

CHAP. XI. v. 1-13. Prayer is one of the great laws of natural religion. That man is a brute,—a monster, that never prays; that never gives glory to his Maker, nor feels his favor, nor owns his dependence on Him. One great design therefore of Christianity is, to assist us in prayer; to enforce the duty on us, to instruct us in it, and encourage us to expect advantage by it. Now here,

1. We find Christ himself praying in a certain place, probably where He used to pray, v. 1. As God, He prayed; to us, as Man, He prayed. This evangelist, more than any other, has taken particular notice of Christ's praying often; thus when He was baptized, (ch. 3: 21.) He was praying; He withdrew into the wilderness, and prayed; (ch. 5: 16.) He went out into a moun-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 33-42. Let us follow Christ, especially in his persevering love to sinners; let us welcome Him into our hearts, and his disciples and ministers into our houses; and let the latter especially be careful to improve the hours of social intercourse in edifying discourse. Alas! what time is wasted, and what expenses are incurred, even in the entertainment of the ministers and professors of the Gospel, to feast the guests, and to gratify the vanity of those who furnish the repast; while a scanty surplus remains for the poor, and a small proportion of the opportunity, for religious improvement! (14: 12-14.) Nay, sometimes the persons concerned thus lose their temper also; and are even induced to violate the Sabbath, and to constrain their servants to neglect the public ordinances of God, and perhaps to do the same themselves! If the gracious Savior were personally present on such occasions, and saw his professed disciples thus 'careful and troubled about many things,' would He not rebuke them far more sharply than He did Martha? Indeed the delinquents will attempt to vindicate their conduct; but He will decide the matter against them, and not admit their plea that these are little things, much less consider such cares and incumbrances as needful.—But it is not in this way alone, that we are apt to be 'careful and troubled about many things.' Numbers are wholly given up to a variety of worldly pursuits and anxieties, to the entire neglect of their souls; and there are none of us, who do not at some times expose ourselves to the rebuke of Christ, for our disproportionate solicitude and eagerness about mere trifles, when compared with our attention to the great concerns of eternity. Let us then mind, more diligently and entirely, 'the one thing needful.' 'None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good;' to hear, believe and obey his Gospel, and to have Him for our 'Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification and Redemption,' comprises all that is necessary for this world and the next; and without this, all the rest will leave us forever miserable. This good part is, by the Gospel, proposed to our choice: happy then are they, who give it a decided preference to all earthly objects; for it 'shall not be taken from them,' through the countless ages of eternity; and to those who choose and seek it in the first place, all things else which can conduce to their present comfort, or their everlasting felicity, shall assuredly be added. (Notes, Matt. 6: 25-34.)

SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. v. 1-4. Probably, John had added to his general instructions some comprehensive directory, or form of prayer; which both served to distinguish his disciples from those of the Pharisees, and to impress on their minds the important truths which he had inculcated, concerning the Messiah and the spiritual blessings of his kingdom, and thus to regulate their judgment and devotions at the same time. This disciple therefore desired Jesus to instruct him and the other disciples in prayer, by some similar method; for we cannot suppose but that He had in general taught them both what to pray for, and in what manner to pray, by his doctrine and daily example. In answer to his request, our Lord again delivered that prayer, which has been fully considered. (Matt. 6: 7-13.) The variations are immaterial, except the omission of the concluding doxology. The clause, 'When ye pray, say,' at least warrants the frequent use of the very words here prescribed, which certainly imply every thing that we can ask for ourselves or others, in respect of this life, and of that which is to come. (Marg. Ref.) (2.) Thy will be done, &c. To pray, that 'the will

2 And he said unto them, 'When ye pray, say, "Our Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth."

3 'Give us \circ day by day our daily bread.

4 And \circ forgive us our sins; \circ for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. And \circ lead us not into temptation; \circ but deliver us from evil.

5 And he said unto them, 'Which of you shall have a friend, and shall go unto him at midnight, and say unto him, Friend, lend me three loaves; tain to pray, and continued all night in prayer: He was alone praying; (ch. 9: 18.) soon after, He went up into a mountain to pray, and as He prayed, He was transfigured; (ch. 9: 28, 29.) and here He was praying in a certain place. Thus, like a genuine Son of David, He gave Himself unto prayer, Ps. 109: 4. It is most probable the disciples were now joining with Him.

6 For a friend of mine \circ in his journey is come to me, and I have nothing to set before him?'

II. His disciples applied themselves to Him for direction in prayer; Lord, teach us to pray. Note, The gifts and graces of others should excite us to covet earnestly the same. Their zeal should provoke us to a holy imitation and emulation. Observe, They came to Him with this request, when He ceased: they would not disturb Him. Every thing is beautiful in its season. One of his disciples, in the name of the rest, said, Lord, teach us. Note, Though Christ is apt to teach, yet He will for this be inquired of, and his disciples must attend Him for instruction.

Their request was, 'Lord, teach us to pray; give us a rule or model; put words into our mouths.' Note, It becomes Christ's disciples to apply to Him for instruction in prayer. Lord, teach us to pray, is itself a good prayer, and a very useful one, for Jesus Christ only can teach us, by his Word and Spirit, how to pray. 'Lord, teach me what it is to pray; Lord, excite and quicken me to the duty; Lord, direct me what to pray for; Lord, give me praying graces, that I may serve God acceptably in prayer; Lord, teach me to pray in proper words; give me a mouth and wisdom in prayer, that I may speak as I ought; teach me what I shall say.'

Their plea was, 'As John also taught his disciples.' He took care to instruct his disciples, and we would be taught as they were, for we have a better Master.' Lightfoot's notion of this is, That, whereas the Jews' prayers were generally adorations, and praises of God, and doxologies, John taught his disciples such prayers as were more filled with petitions and requests; for it is said of them that they made prayers, Luke 5: 33. The word signifies such prayers as are properly petitionary. 'Now, Lord, teach us such, to be added to those benedictions of the name of God, which we have been accustomed to from our childhood.' According to this sense, Christ here taught them a prayer of petitions, omitting the doxology and the Amen, usually said in the giving of thanks, 1 Cor. 14: 16. But the disciples need not have urged John Baptist's example; Christ was more ready and able to teach than he.

III. Christ gave them direction; much the same that He had given them before in his sermon on the mount, Matt. 6: 9, &c. They and fuller instructions, but He did not, as yet, them from on high, they would find all their requests couched in these few words, and be able, in words of their own, to expatiate and enlarge upon them. In Matthew, He had directed them to pray after this manner; here,

When ye pray, say; which intimates that the Lord's prayer was intended to be used both as a form of prayer and a directory.

1. There are some differences between the Lord's prayer in Matthew and in Luke, by which it appears that it was not the design of Christ that we should be tied up to these very words, for then there would have been no variation. Here is one difference in the translation only, viz. in the third petition; as in heaven, so in earth; whereas, in the original, the words are the very same, and in the same order as in Matthew. But there is a difference in the fourth petition; in Matthew we pray, 'Give us daily bread this day; here, 'Give it us day by day.' Day by day is, 'Give us each day the bread which our bodies require, as they call for it: not, 'Give us this day bread for many days to come;' but, as the Israelites had manna, 'Let us have bread to-day for to-day, and to-morrow for to-morrow; for thus we may be kept in a continual dependence on God, as children on their parents, and may have our mercies fresh from his hand daily, and may find ourselves under fresh obligations to do the work of every day in the day, according as the duty of the day requires.'

Here is likewise some difference in the fifth petition. In Matthew it is, Forgive us our debts, as we forgive: here it is, Forgive us our sins; which proves that our sins are our debts; for we forgive, not that our forgiving of those that have offended us, can merit pardon from God, or be an inducement to Him to forgive us; (He forgives for his own name's sake, and his Son's sake;) but this is a very necessary qualification for forgiveness; and if God have wrought it in us, we may plead that work of his grace, for the enforcing of our petitions for the pardon of our sins; 'Lord, forgive us, for Thou hast Thyself inclined us to forgive others.' Here is another addition here; we plead not only in general, 'We forgive our debtors, but in particular, 'We profess to forgive every one that is indebted to us, without exception. We so forgive our debtors, as not to bear malice or ill-will to any, but true love to all, without any exception whatsoever.'

Here also the doxology in the close is wholly omitted, and the Amen; for Christ would leave them at liberty to use that, or any other doxology fetched out of David's psalms; or rather, He left a vacuum here, to be filled up by a doxology more peculiar to the Christian institutes, ascribing glory to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

2. Yet it is, for substance, the same; and we shall therefore here only gather up some general lessons from it.

(1.) That in prayer we ought to come to God as children to a Father, a common Father to us and all mankind, but in a peculiar manner a Father to all the disciples of Jesus Christ. Let us therefore in our requests, both for others and for ourselves, come to Him with a humble * thought to have had further than a fit to give them any; when the Spirit should be poured out upon them from on high, they would find all their requests couched in these few words, and be able, in words of their own, to expatiate and enlarge upon them. In Matthew, He had directed them to pray after this manner; here, of God may be done, as in heaven, so on earth,' is widely different from saying, in submission to Providence, in some special instance, 'The will of the Lord be done;' (22: 42. Acts 21: 14.) for the former takes in obedience to the will of God, as a Lawgiver, and as a Savior, as well as submission to his providential appointments. (Matt. 6: 10. 7: 21-23) (4.) Indebted, &c. 'It is carefully to be observed, that sins (are not strictly and properly compared to debts; seeing, by sinning we do not so properly contract a debt as a guilt, and obnoxiousness to punishment; which two things will admit these differences: (1.) That, if another will pay my debt, the creditor cannot justly refuse his paying it for me, or complain that he is not satisfied when the whole debt is paid; but let another be never so willing to suffer for my offence, he can make no satisfaction for it, unless the judge be willing to admit him to suffer in my stead. Hence, (2.) the creditor does no act of grace, by admitting the solution of another; and if that other pay the whole, he can require no conditions for my discharge. But the ruler, against whose laws I have personally offended, does me an act of grace, in admitting another to suffer in my stead; and so may do this only upon some reasonable conditions.' Whitby. SCOTT.

(1-5.) 'The prayer related here by Luke was probably given at a different time from that mentioned by Matthew, ch. 6: 5-15. That a Matthew seems to have been given after the second passover, and this in Luke after the third, between the feast of Tabernacles and the Dedication. So Bishop Newcome in his Greek Harmony of the Gospels. The many various readings in this prayer seem to have proceeded principally from the desire of rendering this similar to that in Matthew. Attempts of this nature have given birth to multitudes of various readings in the MSS. of the New Testament. The doxology in Matthew is not found in any copy of Luke's Gospel.' Dr. A. CLARKE. [496]

(1.) As John also taught his disciples. 'Many learned men suppose that the Jewish masters used to give their followers some short form of prayer, as a peculiar badge of their relation to them. This John the Baptist had probably done, though we know not now what it was. In this view, only, can we suppose the disciples could now ask Jesus to teach them to pray; for it is not to be thought, that in the three preceding years of his ministry, he had not often given them instructions both as to the matter and manner of prayer. In this sense, Mr. Joseph Wade and Dr. Lightfoot understand the request and answer before us; and I have never met with any thing upon it which has given me more satisfaction.'

'Dr. Guysa has excellently shown, in his note on Matt. 6: 13, that this prayer in its original sense was peculiarly suited to the dispensation then present, as introductory to the Messiah's kingdom, and has given a just and expressive paraphrase of it in that particular view. But there is not a clause in it which will not bear a more extensive sense, and express what ought to be our daily temper, and the breathings of our hearts before God. No doubt, thousands of Christians have daily refreshment and edification in the use of it.' DODDRIDGE.

7 And he from within shall answer and say, * Trouble me not: the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed; I cannot rise and give thee.

8 I say unto you, Though he will not rise and give him, because he is his friend; yet because of his importunity, he will rise and give him as many as he needeth.

9 And * I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

10 For every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened.

11 If a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent?

12 Or if he shall ask an egg, will he offer him a scorpion?

13 If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give boldness, confiding in his power and goodness.

(2.) That in our petitions to God for ourselves, we should take in with us all the children of men, as God's creatures and our fellow-creatures; this prayer being so worded as to be accommodated to such a noble principle of catholic charity, and of Christian, sanctified humanity.

(3.) That in order to confirm the habit of heavenly-mindedness in us, which ought to act and govern us in the whole course of our conversation, we should, in all our devotions, with an eye of faith, look heaven-ward, and view the God we pray to as our Father in heaven, that we may make the upper world more familiar to us, and may ourselves become better prepared for the future state.

(4.) That in prayer, as well as in the tenor of our lives, we must seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, by ascribing honor to his name, his holy name, and power to his government, both that of his providence in the world, and that of his grace in the church. O that both the one and the other may be more manifested, and we and others more manifestly brought into subjection to both!

(5.) That the principles and practices of the upper, the unseen world, (which therefore by faith only we are apprized of), are the great original, to which we should desire the principles and practices of this lower world, both in others and in ourselves, may be more conformed. Those words, As in heaven, so on earth, refer to all the first three petitions.

(6.) That those who faithfully and sincerely mind the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, may humbly hope that all other things, so far as to Infinite Wisdom seems good, shall be added to them, and they may in faith pray for them. If our first chief desire and care be, that God's name may be sanctified, his kingdom come, and his will be done, we may then come boldly to the throne of grace for our daily bread, which will then be sanctified to us, when we are sanctified to God, and God is sanctified by us.

(7.) That in our prayers for temporal blessings, we must moderate our desires, and confine them to a competency. The expression here used, of day by day, is the very same with, our daily bread; and therefore some think that we must look for another signification of the word rendered daily, and that it means our necessary bread; that bread that is suited to the cravings of our nature; the fruit that is brought out of the earth for our bodies that are made of the earth, and are earthly, Ps. 104: 14.

(8.) That sins are debts we are daily contracting, and therefore should every day pray for the forgiveness of them. Every day adds to the score of our guilt, and it is a miracle of mercy, that we have so much encouragement given us to come every day to the throne of grace, to pray for the pardon of our sins of daily infirmity. God multiplies to pardon beyond seventy times seven.

(9.) That we have no reason to expect, nor can with any confidence pray, that God would forgive our sins against Him, if we do not sincerely, and from a truly Christian principle of charity, forgive those that have at any time affronted us, or been injurious to us. Though the words of our mouth be even this prayer to God, if the meditation of our heart at the same time be, as often it is, malice and revenge to our brethren, we are not accepted, nor can we expect an answer of peace.

(10.) That temptations to sin should be as much dreaded and deprecated by us, as ruin by sin; and it should be as much our care and prayer to get the power of sin broken in us, as to get the guilt of sin removed from us; and though temptation may be a charming, flattering thing, we must be as earnest with God, that we may not be led into that, as that we may not be led by that to sin, and by sin to ruin.

Lastly, That God is to be depended on, and sought to, for deliverance from all evil; and we should pray, not only that we may not be left to ourselves to run into evil, but that we may not be left to Satan, to bring evil upon us. I might understand it of being delivered from the evil one, that is, the devil. The disciples were employed to cast out devils, and therefore were concerned to pray that they might be guarded against the particular spite he would always be sure to have against them.

IV. He encourages importunity, fervency, and constancy, in prayer; by showing.

1. That importunity will go far in our dealings with men, v. 5-8. He speaks this parable with the same intent that He speaks that, (ch. 18: 1.) That men ought always to pray, and not to faint. Not that God can be wrought upon by importunity; we cannot be troublesome to Him, nor by being so, change his counsels. We prevail with men by importunity, because they are displeased with it, but with God, because He is pleased with it. Now this similitude may be of use,

(1.) To direct us in prayer. We must come to God with boldness and confidence for what we need, as a man does to the house of his neighbor, or friend, who, he knows, loves him, and is inclined to be kind to him. We must come in bread, for that which is needful, and which we cannot be without. We must come for others as well as for ourselves. This man did not come for bread for himself, but for his friend. The Lord accepted Job, when he prayed for his friends, Job 42: 10. We cannot come on a more pleasing errand than when we come for grace to enable us to do good. We may come with the more boldness in a strait, if it be providential, and not the result of our own folly and carelessness. This man would not have wanted bread, if his friend had not come in unexpectedly. The care which Providence casts on us, we may with cheerfulness cast back on Providence. We ought to continue instant in prayer, and watch in the same with all perseverance.

(2.) To encourage us in prayer. If importunity could prevail thus with a man who was angry at it, much more with God, who is infinitely more kind and ready to do good to us than we are to one another, and is not angry at our importunity, but accepts it, especially when it is for spiritual mercies. If He does not answer our prayers presently, yet He will in due time, if we continue to pray.

2. That God has promised to give us what we ask of Him; (v. 9, 10.) either the thing itself, or that which is equivalent; the thorn in the flesh removed, or grace sufficient. We had this before, Matt. 7: 7, 8. I say unto you. We have it from Christ's own mouth, who knows his Father's mind, and in whom all promises are yea and amen. We must not only ask, but seek, in the use of means; and in asking and seeking, we must continue pressing, still knocking at the same door, and we shall at length prevail, not only by our prayers in concert, but by our particular prayers; Every one that asketh, receiveth, even the meanest saint that asketh in faith. This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, Ps. 34: 6. When we ask of God those things Christ has here directed us to ask, that his name may be sanctified, that his kingdom may come, and his will be done, in these requests we must be importunate, must never hold our peace day or night; we must not keep silence, nor give God any rest, until He establish, until He make Jerusalem a praise in the earth, Isa. 62: 6, 7.

V. He gives us both instruction and encouragement in prayer, from the consideration of our relation to God as a Father. Here is,

1. An appeal to the affection of earthly fathers; v. 11, 12.

2. An application of this to the blessings of our heavenly Father; v. 13. He shall give good things; so it is in Matthew. Observe,

(1.) The direction what to pray for; we must ask for the Holy Spirit, not only as necessary in order to our praying well, but as inclusive of all the good things we are to pray for; the Spirit is the Worker of spiritual life, and the Earnest of eternal life. Note, The gift of the Holy Ghost is a gift we are every one of us concerned earnestly and constantly to pray for.

(2.) The encouragement to hope that we shall speed in this prayer; Your heavenly Father will give. It is in his power to give the Spirit; but that is not all, it is in his promise, Acts 2: 33-35. And it is here inferred from parents' readiness to supply their children's needs, and gratify their desires, when they are natural and proper. If the child ask for a serpent, or a scorpion, the father in kindness denies him, but not if he ask for what is needful, and will be nourishing. When God's children ask for the Spirit, they do, in effect, ask for bread, for the Spirit is the Staff of life; nay, He is the Author of the soul's life. If our earthly parents, though evil, be yet so kind, if they, though weak, be yet so knowing, that they not only give, but give with discretion, give what is best, in the best manner and time, much more shall your heavenly Father, who infinitely excels the fathers of our flesh both in wisdom and goodness, give you his Holy Spirit. If earthly parents be willing to lay out for the education of their children, to whom they design to leave their estates, much more will your heavenly Father give the spirit of sons to all those whom He has predestinated to the inheritance of sons.

V. 14-26. The substance of these verses we had, Matt. 12: 22, &c. They contain a general proof of Christ's divine mission, by way of a particular proof of his power over Satan. He is here casting out a devil that made the poor possessed man dumb; in Matthew, we are told that he was blind and dumb. When the devil was forced out by the word of Christ, the dumb spake immediately, to show forth his praise. Now,

I. Some were affected with this miracle. The people wondered; they admired the power of God, and especially that it should be exerted by the hand of One who made so small a figure; that One who did the work of the Messiah, should have so little of that pomp of the Messiah, which they expected.

II. Others were offended at it, and to justify their infidelity, suggested that it was by virtue of a league with Beelzebub, the prince of the devils, that He did this, v. 15. They would have it thought, that there was a correspondence settled between Christ and the devil, that the devil should have the advantage in the main, but that, in particular instances, he should yield Christ the advantage, and retire by consent. Some to corroborate this suggestion, and confirm the evidence of Christ's miraculous power, challenged Him (v. 16,) to confirm his doctrine by some appearance in the clouds, such as was upon mount Sinai when the law was given; as if a sign from heaven, not disprovable by any sagacity of theirs, could not have been given as well by a compact and collusion with the prince of the power of the air, as the casting out of a devil. Note, Obstinate infidelity will never be at a loss for something to say in its own excuse, though ever so frivolous and absurd.

Now Christ here returns a full and direct answer to this cavil; in which He shows,

1. That it can by no means be imagined that such a subtle prince as Satan is, should ever give in to measures, having such a tendency to the undermining of his own kingdom, v. 17, 18. What they objected, they kept to themselves, afraid to speak it, lest it should be answered and baffled; but Jesus knew their thoughts, even when they industriously thought to conceal them; and He said, 'You yourselves cannot but see the groundlessness, and, consequently, the pitifulness, of this charge; for it is an allowed maxim, confirmed by every day's experience, that no interest can stand, that is divided against itself; not the more public interest of a kingdom; nor the private interest of a house or family. Satan would herein act against himself; not only by the miracle which turned him out of possession of the bodies of people, but much more in the doctrine for the explication and confirmation of which the miracle was wrought, and which had a direct tendency to the ruin of Satan's interest in the minds of men, by mortifying sin, and turning men to the service of God.'

2. That it was a very partial, ill-natured thing for them to impute that in Him to a compact with Satan, which yet they applauded and admired in others of their own nation, v. 19. 'Some of your own kindred, as Jews, nay, and some of your own followers, as Pharisees, have undertaken, in the name of the God of Israel, to cast out devils, and they were never charged with such a hellish combination as I am charged with.' Note, It is gross hypocrisy to condemn that in those who reprove us, which yet we allow in those that flatter us.

3. That, in opposing the conviction of this miracle, they were enemies to themselves, for they thrust from them the kingdom of God, v. 20. 'The kingdom of the Messiah offers itself and all its advantages to you, and if you receive it not, it is at your peril.' In Matthew it is, by the Spirit of God, here, by the finger of God; which may intimate perhaps how easily Christ did and could conquer Satan. He need not make bare his everlasting arm; that roaring lion, when He pleases, is crushed like a moth,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-13. It is a most valuable effect of preventing grace, to be made so sensible of our indigence, and our dependence on God, as heartily to pray; and so aware of our ignorance, and of the difficulty of praying aright, as to seek instruction in this most important concern. When we are thus led to beseech the Lord Jesus to teach us to pray, we use a very proper introduction to all our subsequent devotions. He will lead us into an acquaintance with our own wants, and the promises of God, and excite in our hearts correspondent desires and affections; and thus He will teach us to pray in humility, reverence, faith, expectation and earnest importunity. (P. O. Matt. 6: 9-18.) The teaching of Christ will also encourage and enlarge our hopes. Assured that we are praying for such things as are good for us, we shall persevere, and be importunate, though we seem to meet with a repulse; being satisfied, that 'every one that asketh receiveth.' We shall therefore return again and again to the throne of grace, even when we have been baffled by temptation, or proved by delays; and renew and increase our earnestness in asking, seeking, and knocking; especially that we may obtain the Holy Spirit, to enlighten, sanctify, strengthen, and comfort our hearts; and to put us in full possession of the salvation of Christ. (Note, John 4: 10-15.) All these blessings our heavenly Father is far more ready to bestow, on 'every one who asketh for them,' than any indulgent father can be to give food to his hungry child; and, in this way, we need no more fear being fatally deluded, or finally overcome by our enemy, than a beloved child needs fear, lest his father should give him a scorpion instead of an egg; nay, this would be far more likely, because men without exception are evil by nature, and that depravity often triumphs over even natural affection; but 'God is Love,' and 'delighteth in mercy.' (Note, 1s. 40: 14-16.)

The Holy Spirit.] By this it is intimated, that this gift to us sinners, since the work of redemption was completed, is the sum or earnest of all good things; for by his influences, we are brought to know God and ourselves, to repent, to believe in and love Christ, to hope, to rejoice, and obey; and so are made comfortable and useful in this world, and meet for happiness in the next. (Marg. Ref. 1.—Notes, John 16: -15.) The gift of the Holy Spirit is two-fold: his immediate inspiration made men prophets; his regenerating and sanctifying influences render men saints, or holy persons. No sober man can suppose that every one, who prays for the Holy Spirit, will be made a prophet, or enabled to work miracles. His renewing, enlightening; sanctifying, and comforting influences are, no doubt, exclusively intended. (John 4: 10-15. 7: 37-39.)

The circumstances of the 'strong man being armed,' (namely, with the sinner's ignorance, error, prejudices, pride, and lusts,) the confidence which he places in this armor, and the peace in which he retains his possession, till overcome by one 'stronger than he,' are also alluded to in the parable; and the contrast between 'the strong one,' and one 'stronger than he,' is marked emphatically. 5. That there was a vast difference between the devil's going out by compulsion, and his being cast out by compulsion. Into those out of whom Christ cast him, he never entered again, for so was Christ's charge; (Mark 7:25.) whereas, if he had gone out whenever he saw fit, he would have made a re-entry, with a touch of a finger. Perhaps here is an allusion to the acknowledgment of Pharaoh's magicians; (Exod. 8:19.) This is the finger of God. Now if the kingdom of God be herein come to you, and you will be found, by those cavils and blasphemies, fighting against it, it will come upon you as a victorious force before which you cannot stand.

4. That his casting out devils was really the destroying of them and their power, for it confirmed a doctrine which had a direct tendency to the ruining of his kingdom, v. 21, 22. Perhaps there had been some who had cast out the inferior devils, by compact with Beelzebub their chief; but that was without any real damage or prejudice to Satan and his kingdom; what he lost one way, he gained another. But when Christ cast out devils, He did it so as to ruin Satan's power, and blast his great design, which no one devil ever did to another, or ever will. Now this is applicable to Christ's victories over Satan, both in the world and in the hearts of particular persons, by that power which went along with the preaching of his Gospel, and doth still. And so we may observe here,

(1.) The miserable condition of an unconverted sinner. In his heart, the devil has his palace; there he resides, and there he rules; he works in the children of disobedience: and all the powers and faculties of the soul, being employed by him in the service of sin, are his goods. The devil, as a strong man armed, keeps this palace, and all the prejudices with which he hardens men's hearts against truth and holiness, are the strong holds he erects for that purpose; this palace is his garrison. While he thus keeps it, there is a kind of peace in the unconverted soul. The sinner has a good opinion of himself, is very secure and merry, has no doubt concerning the goodness of his state, nor any dread of the judgment to come; he flatters himself in his own eyes, and cries peace to himself. Before Christ appeared, all was quiet, because all went one way: but the preaching of the Gospel disturbed the peace of the devil's palace.

(2.) The wonderful change made in conversion, which is Christ's victory over this usurper.

Observe the manner of this victory. He comes upon him by surprise, when his goods are in peace, and the devil thinks it is all his own forever, and overcomes him. Observe the evidences of this victory. First, He takes from him all his armor wherein he trusted. The devil is a confident adversary, he trusts to his armor, as Pharaoh to his rivers; (Ezek. 29:3.) but Christ disarms him. When the power of sin and corruption in the soul is broken, when the mistakes are rectified, the eyes opened, the heart humbled and changed, and made serious and spiritual, then Satan's armor is taken away. Secondly, He divides the spoils; He takes possession of them for Himself; all the endowments of mind or body, the estate, power, interest, are now converted to Christ's service, and employed for Him; yet that is not all, He makes a distribution of them among his followers, and, having conquered Satan, gives to all believers the benefit of that victory.

Now from hence He infers, that, seeing the whole drift of his doctrine and miracles was to break the power of the devil, that great enemy of mankind, it was the duty of all to join with Him, and to follow his guidance, receive his Gospel, and come heartily into the interests of it, otherwise they would justly be reckoned as siding with the enemy; v. 23. Those therefore who rejected the doctrine of Christ, and slighted his miracles, were looked upon as adversaries to Him, and in the devil's interest.

"a multitude" generally were well disposed towards our Savior and his doctrines; the great opposition He met with being from those chiefly to whom wealth, power, and authority had furnished occasions of pleasure, pride, and a stupid inconsiderateness. This was the case then; and it is exactly the same now, mankind being the same in all ages.

for that is the way of the unclean spirit, when he voluntarily and with design goes out of a man, v. 24-26. The prince of the devils may give leave, nay, may give order to his forces retreat, or make a feint, to draw the poor deluded soul into an ambush; but Christ, as He gives a total, so He gives a final defeat to the enemy.

In this part of the argument, He has a further reach, which is, to represent the state of those who have had fair offers made them, among whom, and in whom, God has begun to break the devil's power, and overthrow his kingdom but they reject his counsel against themselves and relapse into a state of subjection to Satan. Here we have,

(1.) The condition of a formal hypocrite, his bright side, and his dark side; his heart still remains the devil's house, he calls it his own, and he retains his interest in it; and yet, the unclean spirit has gone out. He was not driven out by the power of converting grace, but he went out, withdrew for a time, so that the man seemed not to be under the power of Satan as formerly. Satan is gone, or has turned himself into an angel of light. The house is swept from common pollutions, by a forced confession of sin, as Pharaoh's; a feigned contrition for it, as Ahab's; and a partial reformation, as Herod's. There are those that have escaped the pollutions of the world, and yet are still under the power of the god of this world, 2 Pet. 2:20. The house is swept, but it is not washed; and Christ hath said, If I wash thee not, thou hast not part with Me. It is swept from open, loose dirt, but it is not searched and ransacked for secret filthiness, Matt. 23:25. It is swept, but the leprosy is in the wall, and will be till something more be done. The house is garnished, not furnished with any true grace, but garnished with the pictures of all graces. Simon Magus was garnished with faith; Balaam with good desires; Herod with a respect for John; the Pharisees with many external performances. It is garnished, but it is like a polisher covered with silver dross, not real, not lasting. It is garnished, but the property is not altered; it was never surrendered to Christ, nor inhabited by the Spirit. Let us therefore take heed of resting in that which a man may have, and yet come short.

(2.) Here is the condition of a final apostate, into whom the devil returns after he had gone out, v. 26. He takes seven other spirits more wicked than himself; a certain number for an uncertain, as seven devils are said to be cast out of Mary Magdalene: seven wicked spirits are opposed to the seven spirits of God; (Rev. 3:1.) these are said to be more wicked than himself. It seems, even devils are not all alike wicked. These enter in, are welcomed and dwell there, where they work, there they rule; and the last state of that man is worse than the first. Note, Hypocrisy is the high road to apostasy. If the heart remains in the interest of sin and Satan, the shows and shadows will come to nothing; where secret haunts of sin are kept up under the cloak of a visible profession, conscience is debauched; God is provoked to withdraw his restraining grace, and the close hypocrite commonly proves an open apostate. The last state of such is worse than the first, in respect both of sin and punishment. Apostates are usually the worst of men, and their sins, of all others, the most aggravated. God often sets marks of his displeasure on them in this world, and in the other world they will receive the greater damnation. Let us therefore hear, and fear, and hold fast our integrity.

V. 27, 28. We had not this passage in the other evangelists, nor can we tack it, as Hammond doth, to that of Christ's mother and brethren desiring to speak with Him, (for this evangelist also had related that some time ago, ch. 8:19.) but it contains an interruption much

Verses 27, 28.

The answer of our Lord here, was exactly to the same effect with one on another occasion, which has already been considered. (Morg Ref.—Matt. 12:46-50.) The blessedness of my father art thou not from this, that she conceived Me, and brought Me for I into the world but in order to that, it is necessary for her, as well as others to be 'and obey my word. So Theophylact.' Why is.

28 But he said, ^e Yea, rather blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it.

29 ¶ And ^h when the people were gathered thick together, he began to say, ⁱ This is an evil generation; ^k they seek a sign, and there shall no sign be given it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet.

30 For ^l as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation.

31 The ^m queen of the south shall ⁿ rise up in the judgment with the men of this generation, and condemn them: for she came from the utmost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, behold, ^o a greater than Solomon is here.

32 The ^p men of Nineveh shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonas; and, behold, ^q a greater than Jonas is here.

33 No man, ^r when he hath lighted a candle, putteth it in a secret place, neither under ^s a bushel, but on a candlestick, that they which come in ^t may see the light.

34 The ^u light of the body is the eye: therefore, when thine eye is ^v single, thy whole body also is full of light; ^w but when thine eye is evil, thy body also is full of darkness.

like that, and, like that, occasion is taken from it for an instruction.

1. The applause which an affectionate, honest, well-meaning woman gave to our Lord Jesus, on hearing his excellent discourses. While the scribes and Pharisees despised and blasphemed them, this good woman (and probably she was a person of some quality) admired them, and the wisdom and power with which He spake, v. 27. She was so pleased to hear how He had confounded the Pharisees, and cleared Himself from their vile insinuations, that she could not forbear crying out, ⁱ Blessed is the womb that bare Thee. What an admirable, excellent Man! Surely never was there a greater or better: happy the woman that hath Him for her Son. ^j This was well said, as it expressed her high esteem of Christ, and that for the sake of his doctrine; and it was not amiss that it reflected honor on the virgin Mary, his mother, for it agreed with what she herself had said, (ch. 1: 45.) All generations shall call me blessed; so even of this generation, had as it was. Note, To all that believe the Word of Christ, his Person is precious, and He is an honor, 1 Pet. 2: 7. Yet we must be careful, lest, as this good woman, we too much magnify the honor of his natural kindred, and so know Him after the flesh, whereas we must now henceforth know Him so no more.

2. The occasion Christ took from thence to pronounce them more happy, who are his faithful and obedient followers. He does not deny what this woman said, nor refuse her respect, but from this He leads her to that which was of higher consideration, and more concerned her; v. 28. This is intended partly as a check to her, for doting so much on his bodily presence, and his human nature, partly as an encouragement to her to hope that she might be as happy as his own mother, whose happiness she was ready to envy, if she would hear the Word of God, and keep it. Note, It is a great privilege to hear the Word of God, yet those only are truly blessed, that is, blessed of the Lord, that keep it; keep it in memory, and keep it to as their way and rule of life.

V. 29-36. Christ's discourse in these verses shows two things:

1. What is the sign we may expect from God, for the confirmation of our faith, viz. the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Here is,

1. A reproof to the people for demanding other signs than what had already been given in great plenty, v. 29. Christ knew what brought such a multitude together; they came seeking a sign, not so much to have their consciences informed by the doctrine of Christ, as to have their curiosity gratified by his miracles; and it is an evil generation which nothing will awaken and convince, no, not the most sensible demonstrations of divine power and goodness.

2. A promise that yet there should be one sign more given them, different from any that Verbs 29-32.

Marg. Ref.—Matt. 12: 33-42. Scott. (29, 30.) (Matt. 12: 33-42. 16: 1-4. Mark 8: 11, 12.) In all these passages, as well as here in Luke, Jesus rejects the demand of Him to work some miracles, and pronounces those who desired the miracles, an evil generation. A very natural paraphrase of these texts is this: "How can these persons demand further proof of the divinity of my mission, since they have already shown, by their conduct when they beheld my former miracles, (Matt. 9: 34. 12: 24.) that they are not to be convinced by miracles, and therefore not by the new ones which they demand? Their wishes shall not be gratified. So unreasonable are their demands, that no sign shall be given them." STORR and FLATT.

Verbs 33-36.

This was an answer to another cavil, connected with the preceding objection. (16.) The substance of it has been already commented upon; but the allusion to the light and the eye, seems here to be applied in a different manner than elsewhere. (Matt. 5: 14-16. 6: 22, 23. Mark 4: 21, 22.) Our Lord intimated by it, that he should proceed to diffuse the light of his truth, notwithstanding the perverse opposition of the Pharisees; nor would they be able to cover or extinguish it. Yet they, and others of similar character, would remain in darkness, through the prejudices of their wicked hearts; even as men, had yet seen given them, even the sign of Jonas the prophet, which in Matthew is explained, as meaning the resurrection of Christ. As Jonas, being cast into the sea, and lying there three days, and then coming up alive, and preaching repentance to the Ninevites, was a sign to them, upon which they turned from their evil way, so shall the death and resurrection of Christ, and the preaching of his Gospel immediately after to the Gentile world, be the last warning to the Jewish nation; if they be provoked to a holy jealousy by that, well and good; but if that do not work upon them, let them look for nothing but utter ruin, v. 30.

3. A warning to them to improve this Sign, for it was at their peril if they did not.

(1.) The queen of Sheba would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their unbelief, v. 31. She was a stranger to Israel, and yet so readily gave credit to the report of the glories of a king of Israel, that, notwithstanding the prejudices we are apt to conceive against foreigners, she came from the uttermost parts of the earth, not only to satisfy her curiosity, but to inform her mind, especially in the knowledge of the true God and his worship; and behold, a greater than Solomon, or more than a Solomon is here; that is, saith Hammond, more of wisdom and more heavenly, divine doctrine than ever was in all Solomon's words or writings; and yet these wretched Jews will give no manner of regard to what Christ saith to them, though He be in the midst of them.

(2.) The Ninevites would rise up in judgment against them, and condemn their impenitency, v. 32. They repented at the preaching of Jonas; but here is preaching which far exceeds that of Jonas, is more powerful and awakening, and threatens a much sorer ruin than that of Nineveh, and yet none are startled by it, to turn from their evil way, as the Ninevites did.

II. He shows what sign God expects from us, for the evidencing of our faith; and that is, the serious practice of that religion we profess to believe, and a readiness to entertain all divine truths, when brought to us in their proper evidence. Now observe,

1. They had the light, with all the advantage they could desire. For God, having lighted the candle of the Gospel, did not put it in a secret place, or under a bushel; Christ did not preach in corners. The apostles were ordered to preach the Gospel to every creature; and both Christ and his ministers, wisdom and her maidens, cry in the chief places of concourse, v. 33. It is a great privilege to have the light of the Gospel, that by it all may see where they are, whither they are going, and what is the true, sure and only way to happiness.

2. Having the light, their concern was, to have the sight. Be the object ever so clear, if the organ be not right, we are never the better, v. 34. The light of the body is the eye, which receives the light. So the light of the soul is

It therefore concerned every hearer to be particularly careful, that the supposed light, which he followed, was not darkness; or his first principles and practical judgment erroneous. (*Marg. V. 14-36. The goodness of God, in all its varied displays, tends to draw forth man's ingratitude and enmity, so far as he is left to himself. Even when divine Love was incarnate for the salvation of sinners, his persevering kindness, and pre-eminent excellency, excited the utmost envy and malignity in those persons, whose hypocrisy He exposed, whose selfishness He shamed, and with whose credit, interest or authority, his doctrine interfered: nay, they ascribed even his most beneficent miracles to diabolical agency! But the tendency of his Gospel to humble piety, purity, equity, truth and love, did then, and does still, confute such blasphemous slanders; and it is even now in a measure accompanied with 'the finger of God,' to change the willing slaves of Satan into the devoted worshippers and servants of JEHOVAH. As the conversion of a sinner breaks that false peace, which existed in his heart and conscience, whilst the devil reigned there, and two conflicting parties are formed within the soul, of which grace is superior and will obtain the complete victory; (Note, Gal. 5:16-18.) so the strange indifference of men to the concerns of religion is disturbed, wherever the Gospel is successfully preached; and two parties are formed, the one for Christ and his cause, and the other in opposition to them; but the former will certainly prevail at length. (Notes, 12:49-53. Matt. 10:34-36. P. O. Acts 14:1-10.) In this contest, none are allowed to stand neuter: the Lord Jesus calls on every one to join Him in destroying the kingdom of Satan. Yet we must not hastily conclude, that all who appear to be for Him, will 'continue to the end.' Alas! the unclean spirit for a time goes out of many, the understanding and judgment, and its power of discerning between good and evil, truth and falsehood. Now, according as this is, so to us is the light of divine revelation, and our benefit by it; a savor of life unto life, or of death unto death.

If this eye of the soul be single, if it see things as they are, and judge of them impartially, if it aim at truth only, and seek it for its own sake, the whole body, that is, the whole soul, is full of light, it receives and entertains the Gospel; which denotes the same thing with that of the good ground, receiving the Word, and understanding it. If our understanding admit the Gospel in its full light, it fills the soul, and has enough to fill it. And if the soul be thus filled with the light of the Gospel, having no part dark; if all its powers and faculties be subjected to the government and influence of the Gospel, and none left unsanctified, then the whole soul shall be full of light, full of holiness and comfort; it was darkness itself, but is now light in the Lord, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light, v. 36. Note, The Gospel will come into the souls of those who will receive it; and where it comes, it will bring light with it. But,

If the eye of the soul be evil, if the judgment be bribed and biased by the corrupt and vicious dispositions of the mind; if the understanding be prejudiced against divine truths, and resolved not to admit them, though brought with ever so convincing an evidence, it is no wonder that the whole body, the whole soul is full of darkness, v. 34. How can they have instruction, information, direction or comfort from the Gospel, that wilfully shut their eyes against it; and what hope is there of such, what remedy for them? The inference from hence therefore is, (v. 35.) Take heed that the eye of the mind be not blinded by partiality and prejudice, and sinful aims. Be sincere in your inquiries after truth, and ready to receive it in the light, and love, and power of it; and not as the men of this generation whom Christ preached to, who never sincerely desired to know God's will, or designed to do it, and therefore no wonder that they walked on in darkness, wandered endlessly, and perished eternally.

V. 37-54. Christ here saith many of those things to a Pharisee and his guests, in a private conversation at table, which He afterward said in a public discourse in the temple, Matt. 23. He would not give those reproofs to any sort of sinners in general, which He durst not apply to them in particular; for He was, and is, the faithful Witness. Here is,

I. Christ's going to dine with a Pharisee, v. 37. We are willing to hope that the Pharisee was so well pleased with his discourse, that he was willing to show Him respect, and desirous to have more of his company, and therefore gave Him this invitation; and yet we have cause to suspect that it was with an ill design, to break off his discourse with the people, and to have an opportunity of insnaring Him, and getting something out of Him which might serve for matter of accusation or reproach, v. 53, 54. But, whatever his mind was, Christ knew it; if he meant ill, he shall know Christ doth not fear him; if well, he shall know Christ is willing to do him good; so he went in and sat down to meat. Note, Christ's disciples must learn of Him to be conversable, and not morose. Though we have need to be cautious what company we keep, yet we need not be rigid, nor must we therefore go out of the world.

II. The offence the Pharisee took at Christ, for not washing before dinner, v. 38. He wondered that a Man of his sanctity, a Prophet, a Man of so much devotion, and such a strict conversation, would sit down to meat, and not first wash his hands, especially being newly come out of a mixed company, and there being in the Pharisee's dining-room, no doubt, all accommodations ready for it, and the Pharisee himself and all his guests washing, so that He could not but be singular, if He did not wash. And what harm had it been, if He had washed? Was it not strictly commanded by the canons of their church? It was so, and therefore Christ would not do it, because He would witness against their assuming a power to impose that as a matter of religion, which God commanded them who never admit the Savior to take possession of their hearts: and so the enemy returns, and 'the last state of those men becomes worse than the first.' Let such a dreadful event, (may every one say,) 'Good Lord, deliver us!' (P. O. Matt. 12:22-50.)—In order to this, we should endeavor to 'hear the Word of God, and keep it.' Without this, we cannot be blessed: for all notions, forms and outward privileges, which fail of rectifying men's dispositions and regulating their conduct, will lead to their deeper condemnation. Thus multitudes who hear the Gospel, stand out in unbelief against every demonstration of the truth, and continue in sin against the convictions of their own consciences: while many come from distant places through love to the Word of God, and bestow great pains, under immense disadvantages, to become wise unto salvation; and others profit by far inferior means and instruments, who 'will rise up in judgment against them and condemn them.'—But were Christ Himself the constant Preacher to any company, and did He daily work his miracles of love among them; unless his grace also humbled their hearts, and subdued their carnal prejudices, they would not be profited. Instead, therefore, of requiring more evidence and fuller instruction, than the Lord is pleased to afford us, we should 'pray without ceasing,' that our understandings may be opened, and our hearts prepared, to profit by the light which we enjoy; and above all things, we ought to take heed that the 'light which is in us be not darkness;' for if our leading principles be fallacies, and our affections carnal, our judgment and practice must become more egregiously wrong by all our reasonings and assiduity. Scott.

(36.) 'The doctrine that is contrary to the Gospel may say, Ignorance is the mother of devotion; but Christ shows that there can be no devotion without heavenly light. Ignorance is the mother of superstition, but with this the heavenly light has nothing to do.'

As Jesus was speaking on some other occasion, (for harmonists seem, with probability, to place the following incident in another connection.)

Pharisee, with apparent respect and earnestness, pressed him to dine with him, and he was pleased to accept of the invitation; yet it is probable, that the Pharisee had purposely collected together many of his brethren to meet Jesus, with a design to insnare Him, of which He was fully aware. This may account for the remarkable sharpness of his reproofs and warnings. (Notes, 7:36, 14:1-6.) The Pharisee, however expressed his surprise, that Jesus had not first washed according to their traditions; (Marg. Ref. b.—Matt. 15: 1, 2. Mark 7: 3-8.) and this gave him the opportunity of exposing and condemning their hypocrisy and superstition. (Note, Matt. 23: 23, 24.) (38.) Had not washed. 'I had not been baptized.'—If the verb means exclusively to immerse, certainly all the company, except Jesus and his disciples, had openly been immersed, and were daily immersed, before dinner: so that it was a matter of astonishment, that our Lord should not be thus immersed. Scott.

(37.) To dine.] The Jews made but two meals in the day. The word here used refers to the first eating, which may be called their breakfast, or dinner, because, it was both, and was but a slight meal. The hour for this on the Sabbath, says Josephus, was noon: i. e. the sixth hour. Their chief meal was their supper, after the heat of the day was over; and the same was the principal meal among the Greeks and Romans. Bp. Pearce, in CLARKE.

not. The ceremonial law consisted in divers washings, but this was none of them, and therefore Christ would not practise it.

III. Christ's reproof, on this occasion, to the Pharisees.

1. He reproves them for placing religion so much in those things which are only external, while those which respect the soul, and fall under the eye of God, were not attended to, v. 39, 40. 'Ye Pharisees make clean the outside only, ye wash your hands with water, but not your hearts from wickedness; these are full of covetousness and malice.' The frame and temper of the mind, in every religious service, are the inside of the cup and platter; the impurity of that infects the services, and therefore to keep ourselves free from scandalous enormities, and yet to live under the dominion of spiritual wickedness, is as great an affront to God, as it would be for a servant to give the cup into his master's hand, clean wiped from all dust on the outside, but within full of cobwebs and spiders. Ravening and wickedness, that is, reigning worldliness and reigning spitefulness, for which men think they can find some cover, are the dangerous, damning sins of many, who have made the outside of the cup clean from the more gross and scandalous sins of whoredom and drunkenness. 'Ye fools, did not He that made that which is without, make that which is within also?' He who made laws, and appointed divers ceremonial washings for that which is without, did not He, even in those laws, further intend something within, and by other laws show how little He regarded the purifying of the flesh, and the putting away of the filth of that, if the heart be not made clean? Or, it may have regard to God, not only as a Lawgiver, but, (which the words seem rather to import,) as a Creator. Did not God, who made us these bodies, make us these souls also? Now if He made both, He justly expects we should take care of both, and therefore not only wash the body, but the spirit, — get the leprosy in the heart cleansed.

To this He subjoins a rule for making our creature-comforts clean to us, v. 41. Here is a (Marg. Ref.—Matt. 12: 33-37. 23: 25-28.) As God, who created the soul, and perfectly knows it, abhors all sin, and requires especially inward purity; nothing can be more irrational and foolish than to suppose, that any external observance can please Him, while avarice, pride and ambition, revenge, and other malignant passions, or sensual lusts, possess the heart.

'Notes, Is. 53: 3-12. Dan. 4: 27. Matt. 5: 7. 25: 34-40.' Pilate washed his hands, as a token that he was pure from the blood of Jesus, when he gave Him up to be crucified; and the Pharisees washed their hands, as a profession of holiness and piety, while their hearts were full of rapacity and iniquity. (Note, Matt. 27: 24, 25.) But the observance in both cases was vain and inefficacious; and the conduct of Zachæus, who, having made large restitution to all whom he had wronged, gave half of his remaining goods to the poor, was a far better proof of love to God and man, as well as of sincere repentance and faith; and a far better method of seeking the sanctified and comfortable use of outward things. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 3: 10-14. 19: 1-10.) Some think our Lord meant, that, as the possessions of many among the Pharisees had been in great measure acquired by oppression and injustice; and as it would have been impracticable, in all cases, to make restitution to the injured persons they must dispose of all their ill-gotten and idolized property in alms, before they could expect that God would accept their services, and bless their provisions; and the original expression, with the connection, and the character of the persons addressed, give considerable probability to this interpretation. Liberality to the poor, however, according to a man's ability, from proper principles, does more towards rendering outward possessions or enjoyments sanctified, than any ceremonial washings can do. Where this is duly attended to, from scriptural motives, and men deduct from their own indulgence to give a portion to their poor neighbors, 'Behold, all things are clean unto them.' Of such things as ye have. 'As ye are able.' SCOTT.

'Even as to vessels, the genuine way of cleansing them, in a moral and spiritual sense, is by making them the instruments of conveying relief to the distressed and needy.'

'Such things as ye have.' Meaning, either what was within the dishes spoken of before; or what was within their houses, or power; what they had at hand. When a part of every thing you have is sincerely consecrated to God, then all that remains will be clean unto you.'

DR. A. CLARKE.

'In proportion to your substance.' So Grotius understands it. The learned Bos has 'I think, abundantly proved, the original words will very justly admit this sense, and are thus used by some of the best Greek classics. No other seems to agree so well with the connection.'

Graves which appear not.] 'How is it possible to make these words the same in sense with those of Matt. 23: 27?—Luke's graves that appear not, with Matthew's unseen sepulchres, which appear beautiful outward? And yet great pains have been taken to this purpose by learned men, not considering that our Savior made use of both similitudes; but Matthew related one, and Luke another.'

'The sepulchres or burying-places of the common class of people were mere excavations in the earth, such as are commonly made at the present day in the East. Persons who sustained a higher rank, owned subterranean recesses, crypts, or caverns, which were, in some instances, the work of nature, and in some, were merely artificial excavations of the earth, and in others, were cut out from rocks. Verse 45.

The lawyers seem to have been a superior order of the scribes, who were most celebrated as learned men, or most followed as teachers, and gave lectures on the law. This man considered himself and his brethren as superior to all censure or reproof; he wondered, therefore, and 46 And he said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lead men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers.

47 Woe unto you! for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them.

48 Truly ye bear witness that ye allow the deeds of your fathers: for they indeed killed them, and ye build their sepulchres.

49 Therefore also said the Wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they shall slay and persecute;

50 That the blood of all the prophets, which was shed from the foundation of the world, may be required of this generation;

51 From the blood of Abel, unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple; verily I say unto you, It shall be required of this generation.

52 Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered.

53 And as he said these things unto them, the Scribes and the Pharisees began to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him ing over the wickedness of their hearts and lives with specious pretences; (v. 44.) 'Ye are as grasses overgrown with grass, which therefore appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them, and so contract the ceremonial pollution which by the law arose from the touch of a grave.' These Pharisees were within full of abominations, as a grave of putrefaction, full of covetousness, envy and malice; and yet they concealed it so artfully with a profession of devotion, that they who conversed with them, and followed their doctrine, were defiled with sin, infected with their corruptions and ill morals, and yet suspected no danger by them: The contagion insinuated itself, and was insensibly caught, and those that caught it, thought themselves never the worse.

IV. His testimony also against the lawyers or scribes, who made it their business to expound the law according to the tradition of the elders, as the Pharisees did to observe the law according to that tradition.

1. There was one of that profession, who represented what He said against the Pharisees, v. 45. Note, It is common for unhumiliated sinners to call and count reproofs reproaches. It is the wisdom of those who desire to have their sin mortified, to make a good use of reproaches that come from ill will, and to turn them into reproofs; if we can thus hear of our faults, and amend them, it is well: but it is the folly of those who are wedded to their sins, and resolved not to part with them, to make an ill use of faithful and friendly admonitions, which come from love, and to have their passions provoked by them, as if they were intended for reproaches, and therefore fly in the face of their reprovers, and justify themselves in rejecting the reproof. Thus the prophet complained, (Jer. 6: 10.) The word of the Lord is to them a reproach, they have no delight in it. This lawyer espoused the Pharisee's cause, and so made himself partaker of his sins.

2. Our Lord thereupon took them to task, v. 46, 52. They blessed themselves in the reputation they had among the people, who thought them happy men, because they studied the law, and were always conversant with that, and had the honor of instructing the people in the knowledge of that; but Christ denounced woes against them, for He sees not as man sees. This was just upon him for taking the Pharisees' part, and quarrelling with Christ because He reproved them. Note, Those who quarrel with the reproofs of others, and suspect them to be reproaches to them, do but get woes of their own by so doing.

(1.) The lawyers are reproved, for making the law to speak of many things; services of religion more burdensome to others, but more easy to themselves, than God had made them, v. 46. 'Ye will not burden yourselves with, nor be yourselves bound by those restraints with which you hamper others.' They would seem, by the hedges they pretended to make about the law, to be very strict for the observance of the law, but in their practices they make nothing, not only of those hedges, but of the law itself: thus the confessors of the Romish church are said to do with their penitents. 'Ye will not lighten them to those ye have power over; ye will not touch them, that is, either to repeal, or to dispense with them, when ye find them burdensome and grievous to the people.' They would come in with both hands, to dispense with a command of God, but not with a finger, to mitigate the rigor of any tradition of the elders.

54 Laying wait for him, and seeking to catch something out of his mouth, that they might accuse him.

(2.) They are reproved, for pretending a veneration for the memory of the prophets whom their fathers killed, when yet they hated and persecuted those in their own day, who were sent on the same errand, to call them to repentance, and direct them to Christ, v. 47-49.

[1.] These hypocrites, among other pretences of piety, built the sepulchres of the prophets; that is, erected monuments over their graves, in their honor, probably with large inscriptions containing high encomiums of them. They were not so superstitious as to enshrine their relics, or to think devotions more acceptable to God for being paid at the tombs of the martyrs; they did not burn incense, or pray to them, or plead their merits with God; they did not add that iniquity to their hypocrisy; but, as if they owned themselves the children of the prophets, their heirs and executors, they repaired and beautified the monuments sacred to their pious memory.

[2.] Notwithstanding this, they had an inveterate enmity to those in their own day, that came to them in the spirit and power of those prophets; and, though they had not yet had an opportunity of carrying it far, yet they would soon do it, for the Wisdom of God said, that is, Christ Himself would so order it, and did now foretell it, that they would slay and persecute the prophets and apostles that should be sent them. The Wisdom of God would thus make trial of them, and discover their odious hypocrisy, by sending them prophets, to reprove them for their sins; and warn them of the judgments of God. Those prophets should prove themselves apostles, or messengers sent from heaven, by signs, and wonders, and gifts of the Holy Ghost. Or, 'I will send them prophets under the style and title of apostles, who yet

Jesus should join the scribes with the Pharisees, in the preceding woe, and charged Him with reproaching so honorable a body.

One of the lawyers. [1.] One of the doctors of the law; which I choose rather than lawyer, because the word lawyer naturally suggests to us a modern idea of an office which did not exist among the Jews at this time, and has strangely misled some interpreters. These Jewish lawyers (as our translators call them) were the most considerable species of scribes, who applied themselves peculiarly to study and explain the law. Probably some of them were Pharisees; but it was no ways essential to their office that they should be so.

'Marg. Ref.—Matt. 23: 1-4, v. 29-33. (48.) Truly, &c.] As in your conduct you imitate your fathers, truly ye bear witness to them, rather than against them; and in effect approve the works of your fathers; for one would imagine that you erected these monuments, not so much in honor of the prophets, as of the persecutors by whom they were so wickedly destroyed.

(47.) Ye build, &c.] We are not to understand this, as though any part of the guilt lay in the building or adorning the tombs of the prophets, considered in itself; but in their falseness, in giving this testimony of respect to the prophets, whilst they were actuated by the spirit, and following the example of their persecutors and murderers, inasmuch that they appeared to erect these sepulchres, not to do honor to God's prophets, but to serve as eternal monuments of the success of their progenitors in destroying them.

In the parallel passage of St. Matthew, which was spoken at the close of his ministry, our Lord evidently spoke in his own person.

CHAP. XII.

Jesus warns his disciples against hypocrisy; and the fear of man in confessing Him. He shews the danger of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and teaches dependence on Him, 1-12. He refuses to act as judge in temporal things; and warns his disciples against covetousness, by the parable of a rich man, suddenly torn by death from all his purposes and expected enjoyments, 13-21. He cautions them against anxious cares, and exhorts them to seek spiritual blessings, 22-34, and to be ready for the coming of the Lord, 35-40. He instructs and warns his ministers, by the parable of a faithful, and of a wicked steward, 41-48. He predicts the divisions which his Gospel would occasion, 49-53; reproves those who knew not the signs of the times, 54-56; and counsels the people to seek reconciliation to God without delay, 57-59.

IN the mean time, when there were gathered together an innumerable multitude of people, inasmuch that they trode one upon another, he began to say unto his disciples, 'first of all, ^a Beware ye of the leaven of the Pharisees, ^b which is hypocrisy.

Gospel, and doing all they could to obstruct its progress and success, v. 52. They had not, according to the duty of their place, faithfully expounded to the people those Scriptures of the Old Testament, which pointed at the Messiah, for had they been led, by the lawyers, into the right understanding of these, they would readily have embraced Him and his doctrine: but, instead of that, they had perverted those texts, and cast a mist before the eyes of the people, by their corrupt glosses on them, and this is called taking away the key of knowledge, and in Matthew, shutting up the kingdom of God against men, Matt. 23: 13. Note, Those who take away the key of knowledge, shut up the kingdom of heaven. They themselves did not embrace the Gosshall produce as good an authority as any of the old prophets did; and those they shall not only contradict and oppose, but slay and persecute.^c Christ foresaw this, and yet did not otherwise, than as became the Wisdom of God in sending them, for He knew how to bring glory to Himself in the issue, by the recompenses reserved both for the persecutors and the persecuted in the future state.

[3.] Therefore God will justly put another construction on their building of the tombs of the prophets, than what they would be thought to intend, and it shall be interpreted their allowing of the deeds of their fathers, v. 45. If these lawyers will carry the matter further, and will build their sepulchres, it is such over-doing as gives cause to suspect it is meant as a cover for some design against prophecy itself, like the kiss of a traitor; as he that blesseth his friend with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, it shall be counted a curse to him. Prov. 27: 14.

[4.] They must expect no other than to be reckoned with, as the fillers up of the measure of persecution, v. 50, 51. They keep up the trade as it were in succession, and therefore are responsible for the debts of the company, even those it has been contracting all along from the blood of Abel, when the world began, to that of Zacharias, and so forward to the end of the Jewish state; it shall all be required of this generation, this last generation of the Jews, whose sin in persecuting Christ's apostles would exceed any of the sins of that kind their fathers were guilty of, and so would bring wrath upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. 2: 15: 16. Their destruction by the Romans was so terrible, that it might well be reckoned the completing of God's vengeance on that persecuting nation.

[5.] They are reproved for opposing the Gospel, and doing all they could to obstruct its progress and success, v. 52. They had not, according to the duty of their place, faithfully expounded to the people those Scriptures of the Old Testament, which pointed at the Messiah, for had they been led, by the lawyers, into the right understanding of these, they would readily have embraced Him and his doctrine: but, instead of that, they had perverted those texts, and cast a mist before the eyes of the people, by their corrupt glosses on them, and this is called taking away the key of knowledge, and in Matthew, shutting up the kingdom of God against men, Matt. 23: 13. Note, Those who take away the key of knowledge, shut up the kingdom of heaven. They themselves did not embrace the Gospel, though by their acquaintance with the Old Testament they could not but know that: the time was fulfilled, and the kingdom of God was at hand; they saw the prophecies accomplished in that kingdom our Lord Jesus was about to set up, and yet would not themselves enter into it. Nay, them that, without any assistance of theirs, were entering in, they did all they could to hinder and discourage, by threatening to cast them out of the synagogue, and otherwise terrifying them.

Lastly, In the close of the chapter, we are told how spitefully and maliciously the scribes and Pharisees contrived to draw Him into a snare, v. 53, 54. They could not hear those cutting reproofs which they must own to be just; but since what He had said against them in particular, would not bear an action, and they could ground upon it no criminal accusation: therefore, as if because his reproofs were warm, they hoped to stir Him up to some intemperate heat and passion, so as to put Him off his guard; they began to be very fierce upon Him, and to provoke Him to speak of many things, to propose dangerous questions to Him, laying wait for something which might serve the design they had, of making Him either odious to the people, or obnoxious to the government, or both. Thus they sought occasion against Him, like David's enemies that every day wrested his words, Ps. 56: 5. Evil men dig up mischief. Note, Faithful reprovers of sin must expect to have many enemies, and have need to set a watch before the door of their lips, because of their observers that watch for their halting. The prophet complains of those in his time, who make a man an offender for a word, and lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate, Isa. 29: 21. That we may bear trials of this kind with patience, and get through them with prudence, let us consider Him who endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself.

CHAP. XII. v. 1-12. In this chapter, we have divers excellent discourses of our Savior's on various occasions; many of which are to the same purport with what we had in Matthew on other like occasions; for we may suppose that our Lord Jesus preached the same doctrines,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 37-54. The case of these Pharisees and lawyers is a awful, but instructive example. Their ambitious desire of pre-eminence, applause and authority, and their proud and worldly prejudices, led them to place religion in minute but specious observances: this seduced them from the spiritual truth, will, and worship of God, and entangled them more and more in superstition and delusion. Thus they were exposed to the sharp rebukes of Christ, and engaged in opposition to Him: and, with all their sanctimonious gravity and austerity, they became his persecutors and murderers, and fell under his most tremendous indignation, till 'vengeance came upon them to the uttermost.' Alas! they have had many successors, who have proved themselves to be their children, even as they were proved to be 'the children of those who slew the prophets.' Proud men deem the Word of God to be a reproach to them: many would allow the preacher to be severe upon the crimes of others, provided he would be gentle to theirs; and, among learned men, numbers seem to think, that their characters even sanctify their crimes; so that it is often thought intolerable insolence, for a minister to expose their most flagrant enormities. But the reproach comes from their own consciences; and we must by no means connive at their vices, which are dishonorable to God and ruinous to men, in proportion to the eminence or sacredness of their characters: and when renowned or authorized teachers perplex the truth, and set the people against it, they become murderers of men's souls, and ought most carefully to be avoided, and decidedly protested against. 'Woe unto them! for they take away the key of knowledge; they enter not in themselves, and those who are entering in they hinder:' and they are the more dangerous for being 'as graves that appear not, of which the men who walk over them are not aware.' But such truths must excite opposition, and many will vehemently urge those who openly declare them, to speak or do something which may give them a handle against them. Persons, therefore, who engage in contests of this kind, should be of a blameless conversation, and endued with heavenly wisdom; they should also have a clear call, and a great command of their own temper and spirit: so that few are qualified for these services. But we should all look well to our own hearts, that they may be cleansed and new created; and, while we insist on the great things of the law and of the Gospel, we must be careful not to neglect even the smallest matter, which God has appointed.—Finally, the more careful we are 'to give aims of such things as we have,' and to deduct from every article of expense for that purpose, the more comfortable pure and holy will all our possessions and enjoyments be. (P. O. Matt. 23: 13-39.) SCOTT.

Pharisee, when He thus spake to them. (54.) Laying wait. Several of the original words are taken from hunting; which is an apt emblem of the violence, and rudeness, and artful devices, with which the company sought to entangle Jesus in their nets and toils. (Marg. Ref.)

(53.) To speak of many things. 'Literally, to extemporize; in order that they might catch up something hastily and inconsiderately uttered.'

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. v. 1-7. (1.) Gathered together. The people must have come from very distant places, and our Lord seems to have left the Pharisee's house, and to have spoken the subsequent instructions to his disciples, in the hearing of the multitude, yet in the presence of the company with whom He had before dined. (1.) Hypocrisy. (11.) 44. Matt. 16: 5-12. 23: 12-25.) The folly of hypocrisy is clearly seen, when it is considered that it shall be discovered before the Judge [504,

Himself, and the whole assembled world: so that no one word, whispered in confidence most secretly, can escape detection. (3: 17. Mat. 10: 24-28. Mark 4: 21, 22. 1 Cor. 4: 2-5. 2 Cor. 5: 2-12.) The solemn warning to 'fear Him, who after He hath killed hath power to cast into hell,' is here addressed immediately to the friends of Christ; for even believers have often been rendered victorious over the dread of man's cruelty, by fear of falling under the wrath of almighty God. The word, here translated hell, always means the place of final and eternal punishment. (Note, Matt. 5: 21, 22.) and pressed the same duties, at several times, in several companies, and that one of the evangelists took them as He delivered them at one time, and another at another time; and we need thus to have precept upon precept, line upon line.

We find here,

I. A vast auditory assembled to hear Christ preach, v. 1. The scribes and Pharisees sought to accuse Him, but the people still admired Him. It was while He was in the Pharisee's house, the people got together for an afternoon-sermon, and He would not disappoint them. Though, in the morning, (ch. 11: 29.) He had severely reproved them, yet they renewed their attendance on Him; so much better could they bear their reproofs than the Pharisees theirs. The more the Pharisees strove to drive the people from Christ, the more flocking there was to Him. It is good to see people thus forward to hear the Word, and venture on inconvenience and danger, rather than miss an opportunity for their souls.

II. The instructions He gave his followers, in the hearing of this auditory.

1. He began with a caution against hypocrisy. This He said to his disciples first of all; either to the twelve, or to the seventy; whom, being his more peculiar charge, He therefore particularly warned as his beloved sons; for, making more profession of religion than others, hypocrisy in that, was the sin they were most in danger of. They were to preach to others; and hypocrisy would be worse in them than in others. Besides, there was a Judas among them, that was a hypocrite, which Christ knew, and would hereby startle him, or leave him inexcusable. Christ's disciples were, for aught we know, the best men then in the world, yet they needed to be cautioned against hypocrisy. Christ said this to them, in the hearing of this great multitude, rather than privately, to add the greater weight to the caution, and to let the world know, that He would not countenance hypocrisy, no, not in his own disciples.

Now observe,

(1.) The description of the sin He warns them against. It is leaven, is spreading as leaven, insinuates itself into the whole man, and all that he does; swelling, and souring as leaven, for it puffs men up with pride, imbitters them with malice, and makes their service unacceptable to God. It is the leaven of the Pharisees; the sin they are most of them found in. 'Take heed of imitating them; be not you of their spirit; do not you disseminate in Christianity, as they do in Judaism; make not your religion a cloak of maliciousness, as they do theirs.'

(2.) A good reason against it, v. 2, 3. 'It is to no purpose to disseminate, for sooner or later, truth will come out; and a lying tongue is but for a moment. If you speak in darkness that which is unbecoming, and inconsistent with your public professions, it shall be heard in the light; some way or other it shall be discovered, a bird of the air shall carry the voice, (Eccl. 10: 20.) and your folly will be made manifest.' The iniquity that is concealed with a show of piety, will be discovered, perhaps in this world, as that of Judas, and Simon Magus, at furthest, in the great day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be made manifest. Eccl. 12: 14. Rom. 2: 16.

2. To this He added a charge, to be faithful to the trust reposed in them, and not betray it, through cowardice or base fear. Some make v. 2, 3. to be a caution to them not to conceal those things which they had been instructed in, and were employed to publish to the world. 'Whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear, tell them the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, whoever is offended; for if you please men, you are not Christ's servants, nor can you please Him.' Gal. 1: 10.

But this was not the worst of it; it was likely to be a suffering cause, though never a sinking one, let them therefore arm themselves with courage; and divers arguments are furnished here, to steel them with a holy resolution in their work. Consider,

(1.) 'The power of your enemies is a limited power, v. 4. Christ's disciples are his friends, and He gives them this friendly advice, 'Do not disquiet yourselves with tormenting fears of the power and rage of men.' Those whom Christ owns for his friends, need not be afraid of any enemies. 'Be not afraid, no, let it not be in the power, not only of scoffers, but even of murderers, to drive you from your work; for you that have learned to triumph over death, may say, even of them, Let them do their worst, the immortal soul lives, and enjoys itself and its God, and sets them all at defiance.' Note, Those can do Christ's disciples no real harm, and therefore ought not to be dreaded, who can but kill the body; for they only send that to its rest, and the soul to its joy, the sooner.

(2.) God is to be feared more than the most powerful men; (v. 5.) that you may fear man less, fear God more. Moses conquers his fear of the wrath of the king, by having an eye to Him that is invisible. By owning Christ, you may incur the wrath of men, which can reach no further than to cut you to death; (and without God's permission they cannot do that;) but by denying Christ, you will incur the wrath of God, which has power irresistible to send you to hell. Now of two evils the least is to be chosen, and the greatest to be dreaded; therefore, I say unto you, fear Him.' 'It is true,' said that blessed martyr, bishop Hooper, 'life is sweet, and death bitter; but eternal life is more sweet, and eternal death more bitter.'

(3.) The lives of good Christians and good ministers are the particular care of Divine Providence, v. 6, 7. To encourage us in times of difficulty and danger, we must have recourse to our first principles, and build on them; now a firm belief in God's universal providence would be satisfying to us, when at any time we are in peril, and would encourage us to trust to God in the way of duty. Providence takes cognizance of the meanest creatures, even of the sparrows. 'Though they are of such small account, yet not one of them is forgotten of God, but is provided for, and notice is taken of his death. Now, therefore, ye may be sure ye are not forgotten, though imprisoned, though banished, though forgotten by your friends; much more precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of saints than the death of sparrows.' Providence takes cognizance of the meanest interest of the disciples of Christ; (v. 7.) 'Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered; much more your sighs and tears, and the drops of your blood, which ye shed for Christ's name's sake. An account is kept of all your losses, that they may be, and without doubt they shall be, recompensed unspeakably to your advantage.'

(4.) You will be owned or disowned by Christ in the great day, according as you now own or disown Him, v. 8, 9. This we have, [1.] To engage us to confess Christ before men, whatever we may lose or suffer for our constancy to Him, and how dear soever it may cost us. Jesus Christ will confess, not only that He suffered for us, and that we are to have the benefit of his sufferings, but that we suffered for Him, and that his kingdom and interest on earth were advanced by our sufferings; and what greater honor can be done them? [2.] To deter us from denying Christ, and a cowardly deserting of his truths and ways. Christ will not know us, will not own us, will not show us any favor, which will turn to our everlasting terror and contempt. By the stress here

Recognising the Holy Spirit is more criminal than denying Christ; many who denied Christ have repented and found mercy; but none who blasphemed the Holy Spirit. (Note, Matt. 26: 69-75.) The unity of Christ, and that of the Holy Spirit, is strongly implied in these words, (8, 9.) Angels. 'Before my Father.' (Matt. 10: 32, 33.) etia, when our Lord 'shall appear in his own glory, and the glory of his Father, and of the holy angels,' to judge the world. (9: 18-27, v. 26.)

(8, 9.) 'Nothing can be more majestic than this view which Christ gives of Himself. To be renounced by Him, is spoken of as a circumstance which would expose a man to the contempt of the whole angelic world, and leave him no remaining shelter of hope.'

10 And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven.

11 And when they bring you unto the synagogues, and unto magistrates and powers, take ye no thought how or what thing ye shall answer, or what ye shall say:

12 For the Holy Ghost shall teach you in the same hour what ye ought to say.

[Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ And one of the company said unto him, Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me.

14 And he said unto him, Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?

15 And he said unto laid on their being confessed or denied before the angels of God, it should seem to be a considerable part of the happiness of glorified saints, that they will not only stand right, but stand high, in the esteem of the holy angels; they will love, honor, and own them, if they be Christ's servants; they are their fellow-servants, and they will take them for their companions. On the contrary, a considerable part of the misery of damned sinners will be, that the holy angels abandon them, and witness, not only their disgrace, as here, but their misery; for they shall be tormented in the presence of the holy angels, (Rev. 14: 10.) who will give them no relief.

(5.) The errand they were shortly to be sent out upon, was of the highest importance to the children of men, to whom they were sent, v. 10. Let them be bold in preaching the Gospel, for a sorer and heavier doom would attend those that rejected them, (after the Spirit was poured out on them, which was to be the last method of conviction,) than those that now rejected Christ Himself, and opposed Him. 'Though they shall stumble at the meanness of his appearance, and speak slightly and spitefully of Him, it is capable of some excuse; Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do, But unto him that blasphemes the Holy Ghost, that blasphemes the Christian doctrine, and maliciously opposes it, after the pouring out of the Spirit, and his attestation of Christ's being glorified, (Acts 2: 33, 35, 32.) the privilege of the forgiveness of sins shall be denied, he shall have no benefit by Christ and his Gospel; you may shake off the dust of your feet against those that do so, and give them over as incurable; they have forfeited that repentance and that remission which Christ was exalted to give, and which you are commissioned to preach. The sin, no doubt, was the more daring, and consequently, the case the more desperate, during the continuance of the extraordinary gifts and operations of the Spirit in the church, which were intended for a sign to them who believed not, 1 Cor. 14: 22. Those, who, though they were not convinced by them at first, yet admired them, there were hopes of, but those who blasphemed them were given over.

(6.) Whatever trials they should be called to,

they should be sufficiently furnished for, and honorably brought through them, v. 11, 12. The faithful martyr for Christ has not only sufferings to undergo, but a testimony to bear, a good confession to witness, and he is concerned to do that well, so that the cause of Christ may not suffer, though he suffer for it; and if this be his care, let him cast it on God. 'When they bring you before church rulers, or the Jewish courts, or before Gentile rulers, rulers in the state, to be examined about your doctrine, what it is, and what the proof of it; do not study by what art or rhetoric to modify your judges, or by what tricks in law to bring yourselves off; if it be the will of God that you should come off, and your time is not yet come, He will bring it about effectually. Let your aim be to serve your Master; but do not perplex yourselves about it, for the Holy Ghost, as a Spirit of wisdom, shall teach you what you ought to say, and how to say it, for the honor of God and his cause.'

V. 13-21. We have, in these verses,

I. The application made to Christ, very unseasonably, by one of his hearers, desiring Him to interpose between him and his brother, in a matter that concerned the estate of the family; (v. 9.) 'Speak—speak as a prophet, speak as a king, speak with authority.'

1. Some think his brother did him wrong, and that he appeals to Christ to right him, because he knew the law was costly. His brother was such a one as the Jews called Benhameseen—a son of violence, that took not only his own part of the estate, but his brother's too, and forcibly detained it from him. Such brethren there are in the world, who have no sense at all either of natural equity, or natural affection, who make a prey of those whom they ought to patronize and protect. They who are so wronged, have a God to go to, who will execute judgment and justice for those that are oppressed.

2. Others think that he had a mind to do his brother wrong, and would have Christ to assist him; that, whereas the law gave the elder brother a double portion of the estate, and the father himself could not dispose of what he had but by that rule, (Deut. 21: 16, 17.) he would have Christ to alter that law, and to oblige his brother, who perhaps was a follower of Christ

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-12. Increasing popularity must not induce ministers to be less plain and faithful. All who attend in any degree to religion, need repeated and earnest warnings, 'first of all to beware of hypocrisy;' but they who are most deeply infected with it, will be most ready to take offence. Indeed the plainest warnings seldom have a salutary effect on those, who are confirmed in hypocrisy; but they tend to prevent others from venturing on it; and those who are under concern about their souls, but not established in the faith, are in various ways tempted to it. Yet, while it assumes many specious appearances, and promises great advantages, it is a most foolish, as well as hateful sin: it can only hide for a moment, what must at length be made known to all; and it confers a temporary reputation, but leads to 'everlasting shame and contempt.' Let us then continually think of that day, when our most secret actions, words, thoughts and motives will be proclaimed before men and angels; that we may be far more careful to approve our inmost purposes, and our most retired conduct, to a heart-searching God, than to obtain the good opinion of our fellow-servants.—But if we are the 'friends' of Christ, we must also be open and avowed in our religion, and on our guard against the fear of men. If we are true believers, we are perfectly safe from every effect of man's enmity, which can prove eventually hurtful; and we may boldly confess Christ before men, in joyful hope of being acknowledged by Him before the angels of God; while they who have denied Him for fear of reproach or persecution, will be rejected, and left under the condemnation to everlasting misery.—But let no trembling penitent, who in an unguarded hour has spoken 'a word against the Son of man,' doubt of obtaining forgiveness; for this is far different from that determined enmity, which dictates the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, and which shall never be forgiven, because it will never be repented of. And let no one, who is suffering for Christ's sake, or called upon to speak in his name amidst his enemies, fear lest He should not by his 'Holy Spirit' teach him in the same hour, what he ought to say; for 'they who trust in Him shall never be confounded.' (P. O. Matt. 10: 16-33. 12: 31-37. Notes, Heb. 6: 4-8. 10: 26-34.)

Magistrates and powers. [The two original words signify rulers and magistrates.] True Tit. 3: 1. So the Latin potestas, and the Italian podestà, literally power, signify a magistrate. BLOOMFIELD. 'Take ye no thought, &c.' It is not without reason that Christ so often touches on this topic. The apostles, being poor and illiterate men, would naturally have been thrown into confusion when they appeared as criminals in the presence of persons in the highest stations of life, and their solicitude would be in some measure, proportionate to their piety, if they apprehended the Gospel, which was dearer to them than their own lives, might suffer by the hurry and disorder of their thoughts, when they were thus called publicly to defend it.

Verses 13, 14.

(13.) Master, divide. His 'kingdom was not of this world' (John 18: 33-36.) He appeared as a Teacher and a Savior; but not as a civil magistrate. 'Christ would not, for three causes, be a judge to divide inheritances. First, for that He would not cherish the carnal opinion, which the Jews had of the Messiah. Secondly, for that He would distinguish the civil government from the ecclesiastical. Thirdly,

'to teach us to beware of them, which abuse the show of the Gospel, and also the name of ministers, to their own private advantage. Esa.—It is probable, that Christ refused to take this office upon him; chiefly, because He had but little time remaining, which He could better spend in dividing to them the Word of life, and promoting their 'eternal interest.' Whitby. This reason is at least very forcible, in all similar cases, with ministers of the Gospel; if they duly consider the shortness and uncertainty of life, the state of the world, the worth of souls, and the immense importance and arduousness of their work. (Acts 6: 2-8. P. O. 1: 7. 1 Cor. 6: 1-6.)

This shows us the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom; it is spiritual, and not of this world. 1. It does not interfere with civil powers, nor take the authority of princes out of their hands. Christianity leaves the matter as it found it, as to civil power. 2. It does not intermeddle with civil rights; it obliges all to do justly, but dominion is not to be founded in grace. 3. It does not encourage our expectations of worldly advantages by our religion. If this man will be a disciple of Christ, and expects that, in consideration of that, Christ should give him his brother's estate, he is mistaken; the rewards of Christ's disciples are of another nature. 4. It does not encourage our contests with our brethren, and our being rigorous and high in our demands, but rather, for peace's sake, to recede from our right. 5. It does not allow ministers to entangle themselves in the affairs of this life, (2 Tim. 2:4.) to leave the Word of God, to serve tables. There are those whose business it is, let it be left to them.

III. The necessary caution Christ took occasion from hence to give. Though He came not to be a Divider of men's estates, He came to be a Director of their consciences about them, and would have all take heed of harboring that corrupt principle which they saw to be in others the root of so much evil. Here is,

1. The caution itself, v. 15. 'Observe yourselves, keep a jealous eye on your own hearts, lest covetous principles steal into them; and, preserve yourselves, keep a strict hand upon your own hearts, lest covetous principles rule and give law in them.' Covetousness is a sin which we have need constantly to watch against, and therefore frequently to be warned against.

2. The reason of it, or an argument to enforce this caution; 'For a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth; that is, 'Our happiness and comfort do not depend on our having a great deal of wealth.' The life of the soul, undoubtedly, doth not depend on it, and the soul is the man. The things of the world will not suit the nature of a soul, nor supply its needs, nor satisfy its desires, nor last so long as it will last. Nay,

Verses 15-21.

Our Lord took occasion, from this intrusion, to warn his hearers against covetousness, and all approaches to it; as neither the duration, comfort, credit, usefulness, or happy event of a man's life, consists in the abundance of his possessions. (Marg. Ref. e, f.—Note, 1 Tim. 3: 6-10. v. 8-10.) (16.) The ground brought forth plentifully. The 'rich man' is not said to have obtained his wealth by fraud or oppression, or to have been a penurious miser. (16: 19-21.) He had an estate; and, by skillful and diligent culture, it yielded him large crops, so that his affluence increased rapidly; till at length he had abundance, and thought himself ready to enjoy it. (Marg. Ref. g, k-n.) The character here drawn, is exactly that of a prudent worldly man, who rises from inferior circumstances to a great and useful, by assiduous industry and good management; and then retires from business, to spend the latter part of his life according to his own inclinations. But there was no grateful regard to God, 'who gave him power to get wealth,' no consideration of his accountability to God for the use of it. (Notes, 18: 1-13.) There was no proper sense of the instability of human affairs, the uncertainty of life, the vanity of earthly pleasure, the worth of his soul, or the importance of eternity; no thought of happiness to be found in communion with God, in peace of conscience, and the hope of glory! But the man spake 'within himself, if "eating, drinking, and marrying, be increased," that I may be a lord of a rational creature; and as if it might be enjoyed here forever. Neither did he express any regard to his neighbor; his wealth was his own, and he would hoard it for himself, and spend it on himself; for and he inquired how many in various ways needed relief, he might have found a far better way to dispose of his superfluity, and have enjoyed a far superior satisfaction, than what he proposed to himself.—'What shall I do?' Give it to the poor, that shouldst thou do.' Basil. (Marg. Ref. h, l, 33.) The whole was the language of a selfish, ungodly man, and was intended to expose men of his character, even when not chargeable with gross immorality. However, therefore, this man might deem himself wise and happy, or be envied, respected, or commended by his neighbors, he was, in the judgment of God, a fool; and as such God addressed him. He had foolishly reckoned in many years to come, when he had not a single day to live! He had even the life of the body, and the happiness of that; do not consist in an abundance of these things: for many live and get through the world very comfortably, who have but a little of the wealth of it; (a dinner of herbs with holy love is better than a feast of fat things;) and on the other hand, many possess abundance who live very miserably, and have no comfort of it; but bereave their souls of good; (Ecl. 4 8.) as Ahab and Haman.

3. The illustration of this by a parable; the sum of which is to show the folly of carnal worldlings while they live, and their misery when they die,—which is intended not only for a check to the man who came to Christ with an address about his estate, while he was in no care about his soul, and another world, but for the enforcing of that necessary caution to us all, to take heed of covetousness. The parable gives us the life and death of a rich man, and leaves us to judge whether he was a happy man.

(1.) Here is an account of his wealth, v. 16. He had a whole country to himself, a lordship of his own. His wealth lay much in fruits of the earth, for the king himself is served of the field, Eccl. 5: 9. Note, The fruitfulness of the earth is a great blessing, but one which God often gives to wicked men, to whom it is a snare, that we may not think to judge of his love or hatred by what is before us.

(2.) Here are the workings of his heart, in the midst of this abundance, v. 17. Note, God knows and observes whatever we think within ourselves, and we are accountable to Him for it. He is both a Discerner and Judge of the thoughts and intents of the heart. We mistake if we imagine that thoughts are hid, and free.

Let us here observe,

[1.] What his cares and concerns were. When he saw an extraordinary crop on his ground, instead of thanking God for it, or rejoicing in the opportunity it would give him of doing the more good, he afflicts himself with the thought where he shall store it. He speaks as one at a loss, and full of perplexity. What shall I do now? The poorest beggar in the country, that did not know where to have a meal's meat, could not have said a more anxious word. Disquieting care is the common fruit of an abundance of this world, and the common fault of those that have abundance. The more men have, the more perplexity they have with it, and the more solicitous they are to keep what they have, and to add to it, how to spare, and how to spend; so that even the abundance of the rich will not suffer them to provided a large superfluity for a future continuance on earth, which was never to be granted him; but he had made no provision for the world to come, into which he was immediately to pass, and in which he was to exist to eternity! For, on that very night his soul was required of him, and he must give an account of his ungodliness, selfishness, and covetousness; 'and then whose would those things be, which he had provided,' to the neglect of his soul, and to his everlasting ruin? He could not tell into whose hands his wealth would pass; nor would it be any comfort to him, even for his children or friends to possess it, when he was torn from all which he loved and idolized, and plunged into the pit of destruction; and perhaps they were preparing by it for the same dreadful end. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. o-q.—16: 22-31. Ps. 39: 6. Matt. 16: 24-28. P. O. 21-28.) To this parable our Lord added, that 'so is every one, who layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God.' All lay up treasure for themselves, who seek wealth either for its own sake, or for the influence and consequence it bestows, or to spend in the pride of life and luxurious indulgence; or in order to aggrandize their families; but who are not rich in faith, in wisdom, and grace, in good works, and a heavenly treasure. (22-34. v. 33. 34. Jam. 1: 9-11. 2: 5-7.) Every man of this character is in God's account 'a fool'; his life is vanity and vexation; his success an empty bubble, or a destructive delusion, and his end most miserable. A man's life, &c. [Not in the abounding to any one, is his life, of those things which he possesses.] Even when any man acquires abundance, his life is not preserved, and made comfortable or useful, or the true life of his soul promoted by his possessions. These blessings must be conveyed to the rich man, in the same way, and from the same sources, as to the poor man, if he at all enjoys them. (17.) He thought. 'He reasoned with himself.' Shall be required. [See on 6: 30. 'Shall they require of thee.' The angels, commissioned by God for that purpose.] Scott

(15.) For a man's life.] 'Life is here used, agreeably to the Hebrew idiom, for "happiness," or "the enjoyment of life." The corresponding word in Hebrew signifies not only animal existence, but also the enjoyment of every temporal blessing, which renders it desirable.' Hawt

17 And he thought within himself, saying, 'What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?

18 And he said, 'This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods.

19 And I will say to my soul, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.

20 But God said unto him, 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?

of it. 1st. It was folly for him to put off his comfort in his abundance, till he had compassed his projects concerning it. Grotius here quotes the story of Pyrrhus, who was projecting to make himself master of Sicily, Africa, and other places in the prosecution of his victories; Well, saith his friend, Cyneas, and what must we do then? Then, saith he, we will live. But, saith Cyneas, we may live now, if we please. 2dly. It was folly to be confident that his goods were laid up for many years, when, in an hour's time, his bigger barns might be burnt to the ground, and all that was laid up in them.

A few years may make a great change: moth and rust may corrupt, or thieves break through and steal. 3dly. It was folly to count on certain ease, when he had laid up abundance, since there are many things that may make people uneasy in the midst of their greatest abundance. One dead fly may spoil a whole pot of precious ointment; and one thorn a whole bed of down.

Pain and sickness of body, disagreeableness of relations, and especially a guilty conscience, may rob a man of his ease, who has ever so much of the wealth of this world. 4thly. It was folly to think of making no other use of his plenty than to eat and drink, and to be merry: without any thought of doing good to others, and being put thereby into a better capacity of serving God and his generation; as if we lived to eat, and did not eat to live, and the happiness of man consisted in nothing else, but in having all the gratifications of sense wound up to the height of pleasurableableness. 5thly. It was the greatest folly of all to say all this to his soul. If he had said, Body, take thine ease, for thou hast goods laid up for many years, there had been sense in it; but the soul, considered as an immortal spirit, separable from the body, was no way interested in a barn full of corn, or a bag full of gold. If he had had the soul of a swine, he might have blessed it with the satisfaction of eating and drinking; but what is this to the soul of a man, that has exigencies and desires which these things will be no way suited to? It is the great absurdity which the children of this world are guilty of, that they portion their souls in the wealth of the world, and the pleasures of sense.

3.) Here is God's sentence on all this; and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth; by his judgment, we must stand or fall, not by our own, 1 Cor. 4: 3, 4. His neighbors blessed him, (Ps. 10: 3.) as doing well for himself, for thinking what they shall do with what they have, and how they shall dispose of it. The rich man seems to speak it with a sigh, What shall I do? And if you ask, Why, what is the matter? Truly he has abundance of wealth, and wants a place to put it in, that is all.

[2.] What his projects and purposes were, which were the result of his cares, and were indeed absurd and foolish like them, v. 18. Now here, 1st. It was folly for him to call the fruits of the ground his fruits, and his goods. He seems to lay a pleasing emphasis on that; whereas what we have, is but lent us, the property is still in God; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods. It is my corn, (saith God,) and my wine, Hos. 2: 8, 9. 2dly. It was folly to hoard up what he had, and then to think it well bestowed; There will I bestow it all; as if none must be bestowed on the poor, none on his family, none on the Levite and the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, but all in the great barn. 3dly. It was folly for him to let his mind rise with his condition; when his ground brought forth more plentifully than usual, then to talk of bigger barns, as if the next year must needs be as fruitful as this, and much more abundant, whereas the barn might be as much too big the next year, as it was too little this. Years of famine commonly follow years of plenty, as they did in Egypt; and therefore he had better have stacked some of his corn this once. 4thly. It was folly to think to ease his care by building new barns, for the building of them would but increase his care; those know that, who know any thing of the spirit of building. The way that God prescribes for the cure of inordinate care, is certainly successful, but the way of the world does but increase it. And besides, when he had done this, there were other cares that would still attend him; the greater the barns, still the greater the cares, Eccl. 5: 10. 5thly. It was folly for him to contrive and resolve all this absolutely and without reserve. This I will do, I will pull down my barns, and I will build greater, yea, that I will; without so much as that necessary proviso, If the Lord will, I shall live, Jam. 4: 13, 14. Peremptory projects are foolish projects; for our times are in God's hand, and not in our own, and we do not so much as know what shall be on the morrow.

[3.] What his pleasing hopes and expectations were, when he made good those projects, v. 19. Here also appears his folly, as much in the enjoyment of his wealth, as in the pursuit self; (Ps. 49: 18.) but God said, he did ill for himself, v. 20. God said to him, that is, decreed this concerning him, and let him know it, either by his conscience or by some awakening providence, or rather by both together. This was said when he was in the fulness of his sufficiency, (Job 20: 22.) when his eyes were held waking on his bed, with his cares and contrivances about enlarging his barns, not by adding a bay or two, which might answer the end, but by pulling them down, and building greater, to please his fancy. When he was forecasting this, and had brought it to an issue, and then lulled himself asleep again with a pleasing dream of many years' enjoyment of his present improvements, then God said this to him. Thus Belshazzar was struck with terror by the handwriting on the wall, in the midst of his jollity. Now observe what God said, [1.] The character He gave him, Thou fool, thou Nabal, alluding to the story of Nabal, whose heart was struck dead as a stone, when he was regaling himself in his abundance of his provision for his sheep-shearers. Note, Carnal worldlings are fools, and the day is coming when God will call them by their own name, and they will call themselves so. [2.] The sentence He passed on him, a sentence of death; They shall require thy soul, so the words are. He thought he had goods that should be his, many years, but he must part from them this night; he thought he should enjoy them himself, but he must leave them to be known not his. Note, The death of carnal worldlings is miserable in itself, and terrible to them.

1st. It is a force, an arrest, it is the requiring of the soul. What hast thou to do with a soul, who canst use it no better? Thy soul shall be required; that intimates that he is loath to part with it. A good man cheerfully resigns his soul at death; but a worldly man has it torn from him with violence, it is a terror to him to think of leaving this world. They shall require thy soul; God shall require it, he shall require an account of it; 'Man, woman, what hast thou done with thy soul? Give an account of that stewardship.' They shall, that is, evil angels, as the messengers of God's justice. As good angels receive gracious souls to carry them to joy, so evil angels receive wicked souls to carry them to torment; they shall require it, as a guilty soul to be punished. The devil requires the soul as his own, for it did, in effect, give itself to him.

2dly. It is a surprise, an unexpected force. It is in the night, and terrors in the night are most terrible. The time of death is day-time to a good man, it is his morning; but it is night to a worldly, a dark night, he lies down in sorrow. It is this night, this present night, now thou must die and go to judgment; thou art entertaining thyself with the fancy of many a merry day, and merry night, and merry feast; but in the midst of all, here is an end of all, Isa. 21: 2.

3dly. It is the leaving of all those things behind, which they have provided. All which they have placed their happiness in, and built their hope on, they must leave behind. Their pomp shall not descend after them, (Ps. 49: 17,) but they shall go as naked out of the world as they came into it, and they shall have no benefit at all by what they have hoarded up, either in death, in judgment, or in their everlasting state.

4thly. It is leaving them to they know not who. 'Then whose shall those things be? Not thine, to be sure, and thou knowest not what they will prove, for whom thou didst design them, thy children and relations, whether they will be wise or fools, (Eccl. 2: 18, 19.) whether such as will bless thy memory or curse it, be a credit to thy family or a blemish, do good or hurt with what thou leavest them, keep it or spend it; nay, thou knowest not but those or whom thou dost design it, may be prevented from the enjoyment of it, and it may be turned to somebody else thou little thinkest of; nay, though thou knowest to whom thou leavest it, 21 So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.

[Practical Observations.]

22 ¶ And he said unto his disciples. Therefore I say unto you, 'Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on.

23 The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment.

24 Consider the ravens: for they neither sow nor reap; which neither have store-house nor barn; and God feedeth them. How much more are ye better than the fowls?

25 And which of you, with taking thought, can add to his stature one cubit?

26 If ye then be not able to do that thing which is least,

V. 13-21. Alas! most men are too much immersed in thoughts and contrivances about the world, to value spiritual blessings; and many, even while hearing the Gospel, are so distracted in their thoughts about their inheritances, that they would be ready to interrupt the preachers, if they could, by their counsel or influence, promote their own secular interest! But, as Christ would not attend to these inferior concerns, his ministers should avoid similar interruptions, and leave it to others to be 'judges and dividers' over the people.—Every opportunity, however, should be embraced of warning men to 'take heed and beware of covetousness;' by which almost all men are, one way or other, in some degree seduced. Every reflecting man's experience and observation may convince him of the inefficiency of riches, to promote even the comfort or continuance of this life: yet after all which the Lord has said on this subject, how few are there among professed Christians, who do not desire to be rich, and to make their children rich! (P. O. Matt. 19:23-30.) And many are apt to point out to them similar characters within this in the parable, as models for their imitation, and as proper persons with whom to form connections!

Verses 22-34.

(Marg. Ref. —1.—Matt. 6:24-34.) Probably our Lord frequently repeated the following instructions, and He here assigns the reason; namely, because of the folly and fatal consequences of covetousness; and the excessive proneness of the human heart to it, in one form or another. Some variation from the passage referred to may be noted. 'If I were not able to do that which is least,' &c. (26.) Whence we may infer, that the preceding question (25) was proverbial, and was used to show the inefficiency of being careful about those things, which are not at all in our power. If a man were ever so solicitous about it, he 'could not add a cubit to his stature;' why then should men be anxious about other matters, of far greater importance to their comfort and happiness, but which are unconnected with their present duty? For these also would be ordered by the same unerring hand of God, as He saw best, without their being able in the least to alter his appointments. Rich Zaccheus, probably, would have given a large sum to have 'added a cubit to his stature.' (19:3.) 'All these things shall be added, &c.' (21.) 'It is a foolish thing, not to look for small things at his hands, who freely giveth us the greatest things.' Bez. 4:4. 54:11. 2. Rom. 8:32-34.) Instead of burdening them what his end will be. Note, it is the unspcak- able folly of most men, to mind and pursue the wealth of this world more than of the other, that which is for the body only, and for time, more than that which is for the soul and eternity.

V. 22-40. Our Lord Jesus is here inculcating some useful, useful lessons which he had before taught his disciples, and had occasion afterward to press upon them; for they need to have precept upon precept, and line upon line: 'Therefore—because there are so many that are ruined by covetousness, and an inordinate affection to the wealth of this world, I say unto you, my disciples, take heed of it.' Thou, O man of God, flee these things, as well as thou, O man of the world, 1 Tim. 6:11.

I. He charges them not to afflict themselves with disquieting, perplexing cares about the necessary supports of life; v. 22. In the foregoing parable he had given us warning against that branch of covetousness which rich people are most in danger of; and that is, a sensual complacency in the abundance of this world's goods. Now, therefore, he warns us against another branch of covetousness, which they are most in temptation to, who have but a little of this world, which was the case of the disciples; and that is, an anxious solicitude about the necessary supports of life. 'Take no thought for your life, either for its preservation, if it be in danger, or for the provision to be made for it, either of food or clothing. This is the caution he had largely insisted on, Matt. 6:25, &c. And the arguments here used are much the same, designed for our encouragement to cast all our care upon God, which is the right way to ease ourselves of it. Consider then,

1. God, who has done the greater for us, may be depended on to do the less. He has, without any care or forecast of our own, given us life and a body, and therefore we may cheerfully leave it to Him to provide meat for the support of that life, and raiment for the defence of that body.

2. God, who provides for the inferior creatures, may be depended on to provide for good Christians. 'Trust God for meat, for He feeds the ravens,' v. 24. Consider how much better ye are than the fowls, than the ravens. Trust God for clothing, for He clothes the lilies, v. 27. And if God has clothed the lilies, such

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Yet it is, as it were, said to one of them after another, 'This night thy soul is required of thee,' perhaps when they are saying within themselves, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.' And what does it then avail, to have the public informed, how many tens or hundreds of thousands they have left behind them, or how rich their heirs are made by their decease? (Note, Job 14:16-22.)—Indeed it often happens, that after men have spent their lives, without regard to God, to their neighbors, or their own souls, in order to enrich their families, they are even disappointed in this vain ambition, their riches are strangely dissipated, and their children reduced to dependence or poverty: for 'man walketh in a vain shew, he disquieteth himself in vain; he heareth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them.' As therefore 'every one, who layeth up treasure for himself,' is thus foolish, guilty and miserable; let us seek the true riches, that we may be approved by God Himself as wise men, and made honorable and happy in his presence, and in the eternal enjoyment of his favor. SCOTT.

selves in endeavors to accumulate wealth, Christ's disciples ought, when properly called to it, to part with their possessions, and distribute to their needy brethren. When this is done in faith and love, it insures to them a treasure, of which God Himself is the Guardian. Probably, this instruction influenced the primitive converts, after the day of Pentecost, to sell their estates for the support of their poor brethren. (Marg. Ref. k—p.—15-21. 19:1-10. v. 8. Matt. 19:16-22, v. 21. Acts 4:32-35. Jam. 5:1-6.)

(24.) Consider the ravens. 'Or, crows. Philo and Elian remark, that the young crows are driven away from the nest as soon as they are able to fly, and are afterwards supported, we scarce know how, by a remarkable providence of God. Philo also observes that crows are naturally very forgetful, and often fail to return to their nests; yet by the wise and merciful providence of God, they instinctively heap together in their nests whatever may create worms, from which their abandoned young are nourished and preserved.' BOCHART. (25.) Add to his stature one cubit. 'Prolong his life one hour.' The original word, here rendered stature, signifies both stature and age or life.—For examples of the latter acceptance, see Job 8:21, 23. Eccl. 11:11.

fading, perishing things, shall He not much more clothe you with such clothing as is fit for you? When God fed Israel with manna in the wilderness, He also took care for their clothing; for though He did not furnish them with new clothes, yet (which all came to one) He provided that those they had should not wax old upon them, Deut. 8: 4. Thus will He clothe his spiritual Israel; but then let not them be of little faith. Note, Inordinate cares are owing to weakness of faith; for a powerful, practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God, in covenant-relation to us as a Father, and especially his precious promises, relating both to this life and that to come, would be mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the strong holds of these disquieting, perplexing imaginations.

3. Our cares are fruitless, vain, and insignificant, and therefore it is folly to indulge them; they will not gain us our wishes, and therefore ought not to hinder our repose, v. 25. 'If it be not in your power to alter your statures, why should you perplex yourselves about other things, which are as much out of your power, and about which it is as necessary that we refer ourselves to the providence of God?' Note, As in our stature, so in our state, it is our wisdom to take it as it is, and make the best of it; for fretting and vexing, carping and caring, will not mend it.

An inordinate, solicitous pursuit of the things of this world, even necessary things, very ill becomes the disciples of Christ; v. 29, 30. 'Whatever others do, do not ye afflict yourselves with perplexing cares, nor weary yourselves with constant toils; do not ye hurry hither and thither with inquiries what ye shall eat or drink, as David's enemies, that wandered up and down for meat, (Ps. 59: 15.) or as the eagle that seeks the prey afar off, Job 39: 29. Let not the disciples of Christ thus seek their food, but ask it of God day by day; let them not be of doubtful mind; be not as meteors in the air, that are blown hither and thither with every wind; do not, like them, rise and fall, but maintain a consistency with yourselves, be even and steady, and have your hearts fixed; live not in careful suspense; let not your minds be continually perplexed between hope and fear, ever on the rack.' Let not the children of God make themselves uneasy; for,

(1.) This is to make themselves like the children of this world, v. 30. 'They that take care for the body only, and not for the soul, for this world only, and not for the other, look no farther than what they shall eat and drink; and, having no all-sufficient God to seek to, and confide in, they burden themselves with anxious cares about those things; but it ill becomes you to do so. You, who are called out of the world, ought not to be thus conformed to the world, and to walk in the way of this people,' Isa. 8: 11, 12. When inordinate cares prevail over us, we should think, 'What am I, a Christian or a heathen? And if a Christian, shall I rank myself with Gentiles, and join with them in their pursuits?'

(2.) It is needless for them to disquiet themselves with care about the necessary supports of life, for they have a Father in heaven, who doth and will take care for them. 'He is your Father, who made you subject to these necessities, and therefore will suit his compassions to them; your Father, who maintains you, educates you, and designs an inheritance for you, and therefore will take care that you want no good thing.'

(3.) They have better things to mind and pursue; (v. 31.) 'But rather seek ye the kingdom of God, and mind that, ye, my disciples, who are to preach the kingdom of God; let your hearts be on your work, and your great care how to do that well, and that will effectually divert your thoughts from inordinate care about the things of the world. And let all that have souls to save, seek the kingdom of God, in which only they can be safe. Seek admission into it, seek advancement in it, seek the kingdom of grace, to be subjects in that, the kingdom of glory, to be princes in that, and then all these things shall be added to you; mind the affairs of your souls with diligence and care, and then trust God with all your other affairs.'

(4.) They have better things to expect and hope for; v. 32. To banish inordinate cares, our fears must be suppressed; when we frighten ourselves with an apprehension of evil to come, we put ourselves on the stretch of care how to avoid it, when, after all, perhaps it is but the creature of our own imagination; and therefore, fear not. This comfortable word we had not in Matthew. Note, Christ's flock in this world is a little flock; his sheep few and feeble. The church is a vineyard, a garden, a small spot compared with the wilderness of this world; as Israel, (1 Kings 20: 27.) who were like two little flocks of kids, when the Syrians filled the country. Though it be a little flock, yet it is the will of Christ that they should not be afraid. 'Fear not, little flock, but see yourselves safe under the protection and conduct of the great and good Shepherd, and lie easy.' God has a kingdom in store for all that belong to Christ's little flock; a crown of glory, (1 Pet. 5: 4.) a throne of power, (Rev. 3: 21.) unsearchable riches, far exceeding the peculiar treasures of kings and provinces. The sheep on the right hand are called to come and inherit the kingdom, it is theirs forever; a kingdom for each. The kingdom is given according to the good pleasure of the Father; not of debt, but of grace, free grace, sovereign grace, even so, Father, because it seemed good unto Thee. The kingdom is his; and may He not do what He will with his own? The believing hopes and prospects of the kingdom should silence and suppress the fears of Christ's little flock in this world. 'Fear no trouble, for though it should come, it shall not come between you and the kingdom; that is sure, it is near.' (That evil is not worth trembling at, which cannot separate us from the love of God.)

'Fear not the want of any thing that is good for you, for if it be your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom, you need not question but He will bear your charges thither.'

II. He charged them to make sure work for their souls, by laying up their treasure in heaven, v. 33, 34. Those who have done this, may be very easy, as to all the events of time.

1. 'Sit loose to this world, and to all your possessions in it. Sell that ye have, and give alms,' that is, 'rather than want wherewith to relieve those that are truly neccitous, sell that which you have superfluous, all that you can spare from the support of yourselves and families, and give it to the poor. Sell that ye have, if ye find it a hindrance, or incumbrance, in the service of Christ. Do not think yourselves undone, if, by being fined, imprisoned, or banished, for the testimony of Jesus, you be forced to sell your estates, though they be the inheritance of your fathers. Do not sell to hoard up the money, or because you can make more of it by usury, but sell, and give alms; what is given in alms, in a right manner, is put out to the best interest, on the best security.'

2. 'Set your hearts upon the other world, and

(30.) 'It is the essence of heathenism to live only for this life; and it is the property of Christianity to lead men to live here in reference to another and a better life. Remember! how art thou living?'

(32.) Little flock, 'Campbell has well rendered, "My little flock," the article in the original has here the force of a possessive pronoun, and in the article, says L. Brug, is contained the chief momentary of consolation. I have only to observe, that as a double diminutive is used in the original Greek, perhaps it may be more accurately rendered, "My poor little flock." For, (as Campbell has well observed, it is an expression of endearment, at the same time that it suggests the actual smallness of the number. BROOMFIELD.

'God pleasure to give you, &c.' 'It is most edifying and delight ful to observe, how God is represented in Scripture as enjoying his own presence, as it were, with a peculiar relish, in the view of those glories which He has prepared for his people. Hence those emphatical phrases, of wisdom rejoicing in the habitable parts of the earth, or in the prospect and idea of them, before they were actually made; (Prov. 8: 31.) of God's knowing the thoughts He thinks towards his people; (Jer. 29: 11.) and of his rejoicing over them with joy, and silently resting in his love to them. Zeph. 3: 17. The tenderness and energy of innumerable scriptures depend on this remark; and many of those relating to election, predestination, &c. which have been as dry rods of controversy, when considered in this view, laid out into a thousand fair leaves and fragrant blossoms of hope and joy.'

DODDGE

34 For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.

35 ¶ Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning;

36 And ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately.

37 Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching: verily I say unto you, That he shall gird himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them.

38 And if he shall come in the second watch, or come in the third watch, and find your expectations from that world. Provide yourselves bags that wax not old, that wax not empty, not of gold, but of grace in the heart, and good works in the life; these are the bags that will last.¹ Grace will go with us into another world, for it is woven in the soul, and our good works will follow us, for God is not unrighteous to forget them. These will be a treasure in heaven, that will not be exhausted; we may spend on it to eternity, and it will not be at all the less; a treasure that we are in no danger of being robbed of; laid up in heaven, out of the reach of enemies; a treasure that will no more spoil with keeping, than wax with spending; the moth doth not corrupt it. Now by this it appears that we have laid up our treasure in heaven, if our hearts be there while we are here, (v. 34.) if we think much of heaven, and keep our eye on it, if we quicken ourselves with the hopes of it, and keep ourselves in awe with the fear of falling short of it. But if your hearts be set upon the earth and the things of it, it is to be feared that you have your treasure and portion in it, and are undone when you leave it.

III. He charges them to get ready, and to keep in readiness for Christ's coming; when all those who have laid up their treasure in heaven, shall enter on the enjoyment of it, v. 35, &c.

1. Christ is our Master, and we are his servants, not only working servants, but waiting servants; if any man serve Me, let him follow Me. We must be as men that wait for their Lord. Christ's servants are now in a state of expectation, looking for their Master's glorious appearing, and doing every thing with an eye to that, and in order to that.

2. Christ our Master, though now gone from us, will return again. He will come to take cognizance of his servants, and that being a critical day, they shall either stay with Him, or be turned out of doors, according as they are found in that day.

3. The time of our Master's return is uncertain; it will be in the night, when many have done looking for Him; in the second watch, just before midnight, or in the third watch, next after midnight, v. 38. His coming to us, at our death, is uncertain, and to many it will be a great surprise; v. 40. This bespeaks not only the uncertainty of the time of his coming, but the prevailing security of the greatest part of men, who are unthinking, and altogether regardless of the notices given them, so that, whenever He comes, it is in an hour that they think not.

4. He expects and requires from his servants, that, whenever He comes, they be in a frame fit to receive Him, or, rather, to be received by Him; (v. 36.) that they be found as his servants, in the posture that becomes them, with their loins girded about; alluding to the servants that are ready to do what their master bids them, having their long garments tucked up, (which otherwise would hang about them, and hinder them,) and their lights burning, with which to light their master into the house, and to his chamber.

5. Those servants will be happy who are found ready, and in a good frame, when their Lord comes, (v. 37.) who, after having waited long, continue waiting, until their Lord comes, and are then found awake, and aware of his first approach; then will be the time of their preferment. Here is such an instance of honor done them, as is scarcely to be found among men; He shall make them sit down to meat, and serve them; for the bridegroom to wait on his bride at table is not uncommon, but to wait on his servants is not the manner of men; yet Jesus Christ was among his disciples as one that served: (John 13: 4, 5.) it signified the joy with which they shall be received into the other world by the Lord Jesus, who is gone before, to prepare for them, and has told them that his Father will honor them, Job 12: 26.

6. We are therefore kept uncertain concerning the precise time of his coming, that we may be always ready; for a man may well be ready for an attack, if he know beforehand the time it will be made, v. 39. But we know not at what hour the alarm will be given us, and therefore are concerned to watch at all times. Or, this may intimate the miserable case of those who are careless and unbelieving in this great matter. If the good man of the house had had notice of his danger of being robbed such a night, he would have sitten up, and saved his house; but we have notice of the day of the Lord's coming, as a thief in the night, to the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22—34. If we are the disciples of Christ, and have learned to serve Him in our secular employments, and in the use of our possessions, we should peculiarly watch against distracting cares and apprehensions. He who created our bodies, and sustains our lives, will give us useful food and raiment; and if we have acquired a relish for spiritual pleasures, and know the value of 'the beauty of holiness,' we shall not crave the luxuries and elegances of life. Yet we often need rebuking for 'being of little faith,' and therefore 'of a doubtful mind.' But it becomes Christians to seek nobler blessings, than the nations of the earth who know not God; and if we seek first the privileges and the righteousness of his kingdom, and desire its peace and prosperity, all other things will surely be added unto us. Indeed, the flock which the good Shepherd has purchased, and collected into his fold, and taught to rely on his powerful and watchful care, to hear his voice, to love his ordinances, and copy his example, is a little small, when compared with the vast multitudes around them, who resemble filthy swine, ravening wolves, subtle foxes, or venomous serpents; but they need not fear wanting any good thing; for it is their Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom, and He will withhold no good things from them. (Notes, Matt. 11: 25—27. Eph. 1: 9—12. 1 Thes. 5: 4—11.) Let us then first examine, whether we be long to this 'little flock,' and have those dispositions which characterize it: let us also keep close under our Shepherd's care: and let us be thankful, that it was not the Lord's good pleasure to give us worldly treasures, and to leave us destitute of his grace. While others are grasping after more and more of earthly, perishing vanities, Christians should excite one another to abound in love and good works, by willingly expending what they have, in relieving the necessitous, and promoting the cause of godliness; and this will gradually both enlarge their capacities of enjoyment, and insure to them a gracious and most glorious recompense. (Matt. 6. P. O. 19—34.)

(Matt. 24: 42—51.) Our Lord here addressed his disciples in respect of diligent attention to their proper work; as He before had done about moderation, indifference, and confidence in God, as to their subsistence. It was the custom of servants, in those days, to gird up their long loose garments by a girdle round their loins, that they might attend to their work with less encumbrance. Thus the disciples were reminded to be prepared for active service, by a vigilant frame of mind; and by laying aside every needless worldly engagement, and avoiding improper indulgences; as well as strengthened for it by the habitual exercise of faith, hope, and love. (Marg. Ref. q.—1 Pet. 1: 13—16.) And as servants, during the night, when they were waiting for their master's return home, or engaged in any work, kept their lights burning; so the disciples were directed to keep the instructions of Christ before them, to make an open profession of his truth, and to hold out the light of a good conversation. (Marg. Ref. r.—Matt. 5: 13—16. Phil. 2: 14—18.) Weddings were then generally celebrated at night, and the return of the guests might be uncertain; the servants, therefore, when waiting for their master, must watch, that they might open to him without delay; and by this simile our Lord might allude to his own ascension to heaven, his coming to call his people to Him by death, and his return to judge the world; for which the disciples were continually to hold themselves in readiness. (Marg. Ref. s.—Matt. 25: 1—13. Mark 13: 33—37.) To induce them to this, He further speaks of the blessedness of those servants whom He should find watching; and the danger of being found unprepared or misemployed. (37.) The Lord will gird Himself, &c.) 'That is, the Redeemer, 'the Lord of glory,' and 'the Lord of all,' will graciously condescend to employ all his power and authority, in advancing their honor and felicity; in proportion as they have simply devoted all their ability to promote his glory, and do his will. (Marg. Ref. x—b.) (41.) To us or to all.) All were included, according to the different situations and services to which they were called. (Marg. Ref. c.—21: 34—36. Mark 13: 33—37.) (46.) Unbelievers.) 'Hypocrites,' in Matthew. Hypocrites are concealed infidels, and they will have their portion among avowed infidels.

(37.) And serve them.) 'Whitby agrees with Grotius, in comparing it to the Roman Saturnalia, the Cretan Hermæa, and the Babylonian Saccæ—feasts, where the servants sat at table. Others think there is an allusion to the forms of manumission among the Romans, one of which was that the manumitted servant should sit at table with his late master. But Kuinoel has justly objected, that, at the Saturnalia, all servants, whether good or bad, were waited upon by the master; but here the subject is the reward assigned to faithful and diligent servants. The condition of servants or slaves, among the Hebrews, was by no means hard, or their treatment unkind; nay, at solemn festivals, continues Heuman, their masters assigned them a portion of the banquet, that they might be partakers of their own good cheer.'

V. 41—53. Here is,

I. Peter's question. Peter was now, as often-spokenman for the disciples. We have reason to bless God that there are some such forward men, that have a gift of utterance; let such take heed of being proud. Now Peter desires Christ to explain Himself. He calls his discourse a parable, because it was not only figurative, but weighty, solid, and instructive. ¹Lord, said Peter, ²was it intended for us or for all? To this, Christ gives a direct answer, (Mark 13: 37.) What I say unto you, I say unto all. Yet here He seems to show that the apostles were primarily concerned in it. Note, We are all concerned to take to ourselves what Christ in his Word designs for us, and to inquire accordingly concerning it; Speakest Thou this to us? To me?—Speak it, Lord; speak it to my heart.

II. Christ's reply, directed to Peter and the rest of the disciples; which is peculiarly adapted to ministers, who are the stewards in Christ's house. Now our Lord Jesus here tells them,

1. Their duty as stewards, and the trust committed to them. (1.) They are made rulers of God's household, under Christ, whose own the house is: ministers derive authority from Christ to preach the Gospel, and to administer the ordinances of Christ, and apply the seals of the covenant of grace. (2.) Their business is to give God's children and servants their portion of meat, that which is proper for, and allotted to, them; convictions and comfort to those to whom they respectively belong. To every one his own. This is rightly to divide the Word of truth, 2 Tim. 2: 15. (3.) To give it in due season, at the time, and in the way, most suitable to the temper and condition of those who are to be fed: a word in season to him that is weary. (4.) Herein they must approve themselves faithful and wise; faithful to their Master, by whom this great trust is reposed in them; and faithful to their fellow-servants, for whose benefit they are put in trust; and wise to improve an opportunity of doing honor to their Master, and service in the family. Ministers must be both skillful and faithful.

2. What would be their happiness, if they approve themselves faithful and wise; (v. 43.) doing, and not idle, nor indulgent of ease; but doing, yea, so doing as they should be, giving each his portion of meat, by public preaching, and personal application; and found so doing, when their Lord comes: they that thus approve themselves, shall be preferred to a larger and higher service; (v. 44.) as Joseph in Pharaoh's court. Note, Ministers that obtain mercy of the Lord to be faithful, shall obtain further mercy to be abundantly rewarded for their faithfulness, in the day of the Lord.

3. What a dreadful reckoning there would be, if they were treacherous and unfaithful, v. 45, 46. We had all this before, in Matthew and therefore shall here only observe, (1.) Our looking on Christ's second coming as a thing at a distance, is the cause of all those irregularities which render the thought of it terrible to us; He saith in his heart, My Lord delays his coming. Christ's patience is very often misinterpreted, his delay to the discouragement of his people, and the encouragement of his enemies. (2.) The persecutors of God's people are commonly abandoned to security and sensuality; as the king and Haman, who sat down to drink when the city Shushan was perplexed. Thus they drank to drown the clamors of their own consciences, and baffle them, which otherwise would fly in their faces. (3.) Death and judgment will be very terrible to all wicked people, but especially to wicked ministers: it will be a surprise to them, at an hour when they are not aware, it will be the determining of them to endless misery; they shall be cut in sunder, and have their portion assigned them with the unbelievers.

4. What an aggravation it would be of their sin and punishment, that they knew their duty, and did not do it, v. 47, 48. Here seems to be an allusion to the law, which made a distinction between sins committed through ignorance and presumptuous sins, (Lev. 5: 15. Num. 15: 29, 30.) as also to another law concerning the number of stripes given to a malefactor, to be according to the nature of the crime, Deut. 25: 2. Now, (1.) Ignorance of our duty is an extenuation of sin. He that knew not his Lord's will, through carelessness and neglect, and his not having such opportunities as some others had of coming to the knowledge of it, and did things worthy of stripes, he shall be beaten, because he might have known his duty better, but with few stripes; his ignorance excuses in part, but not in whole. Thus, through ignorance the Jews put Christ to death, (Acts 3: 17. 1 Cor. 2: 8.) and Christ pleaded that ignorance in their excuse; They know not what they do. (2.) The knowledge of our duty is an aggravation of our sin; That servant that knew his lord's will, and yet did his own will, shall be beaten with many stripes. God will justly inflict more on him, for abusing the means of knowledge He afforded him, which others would have made a better use of; and because it argues a great degree of wilfulness and contempt, to sin against knowledge, of how much sorer punishment then shall they be thought worthy, beside the many stripes that their own consciences will give them! Son, remember. Here is a good reason for this added, To whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required, especially when it is committed as a trust he is to account for. Those that have greater capacities of mind than others, more Unbelievers.] O rather, the unfaithful; not in fidels, but persons who had the light and knowledge of God's Word, but made an improper use of their privileges.

This may be considered as a general rule of the Lord's dealing with all his rational creatures. No man is left in such absolute ignorance, except by his own fault, as not to do many things which he knows to be wrong, and to neglect many things which he knows to be right; therefore all are inexcusable, and liable to condemnation and punishment, if they continue impenitent. But, in proportion to the degree in which they have the means of instruction, and are actually acquainted with the will of God, their disobedience becomes more aggravated, more direct and deliberate rebellion, and their punishment will be proportionably more severe. (Rom. 2: 12—16.) Thus likewise will the Lord dispense correction to his offending children, in proportion a they have sinned against light and conviction, or the contrary. (Marg. Ref.—16: 1—13. 19: 11—27. Matt. 13: 12. 25: 14—30. Mark 4: 23—25. Jam. 4: 13—17.) This being one grand difference betwixt the pastors of the church, and other Christians, they must expect a severer punishment, as sinning against greater evidence, and knowledge of their duty: for "to whom much is given, of them will much be required." Whitby.

The antithesis in this passage has prodigious moral depth. The negligence, against the light of conscience, shall be severely punished, while an offence, in itself comparatively heinous, if committed ignorantly, and without light, shall be mildly dealt with. This merciful discrimination, however, is full of terror; for, whatever may be the case respecting past, forsaken, and repented sins of ignorance, no man is entitled to take comfort to himself from this passage, respecting his present or future course of life: the very thought of doing so, proves that the person entertaining that thought has sufficient knowledge to place him beyond its favorable operation.

It was allowable for a master to inflict any number of stripes on his servant.

Bp. Jebb, in BLOOMFIELD LIGHTFOOT.

48 But he that 'knew not, and did commit 'things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes.' For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required; and to whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more.

knowledge and learning, more acquaintance and converse with the Scriptures, to them much is given, and their account will be accordingly.

III. A further discourse concerning his own sufferings, which he expected, and concerning the sufferings of his followers, which He would have them also expect; in general, (v. 49.) I am come to send fire on the earth. By this, some understand the preaching of the Gospel, and the pouring out of the Spirit; but by what follows, it seems rather to be understood of the fire of persecution; Christ is not the Author of it, as it is the sin of the incendiaries, the persecutors; but He permits it, nay, He commissions it, as a refining fire for the trial of the persecuted. This fire was already kindled, in the enmity of the carnal Jews to Christ and his followers. 'What will I that it may presently be kindled? What thou dost, do quickly. If it be already kindled, what will I? Shall I wait the quenching of it? No, for it must fasten on myself, and upon all, and glory will redound to God from it.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 35-48. While we cast all our care upon God, in respect of events and consequences, we cannot be too attentive to our duty. We are the servants of Christ, whose coming to remove us by death, or to judge the world, may be very soon, or very sudden: but if 'our loins be girded and our lights burning,' we shall have no more reason to dread the summons, than a child has to be alarmed at the arrival of a messenger, who is sent to convey him home to his tender parents: nay, words can never express the delight, with which our gracious Lord will welcome and bless his faithful servants. If then we are habitually watching and ready, what does it signify to us personally, whether He 'come at the second or the third watch?' For blessed are those servants, who... are found so doing.' But as robbers assault the house, when the family has least expectation of them, so death generally surprises a man when he is least thinking of it. We should, therefore, never remit our watch, to pursue vain diversions, worldly interests, or sensual indulgences, lest our Lord should come at that very time. (Note, Rom. 13: 11-14.) This indeed applies to every man, but more especially to the ministers of the Gospel, who are 'the stewards of God's mysteries,' and rulers of his household. Happy then is that faithful and wise servant who delights in his work, and gives himself continually to it; for 'his Lord, when He cometh, will make him ruler over all that He hath;' and how paltry are all other preferences, when compared with 'this crown of glory that fadeth not away!' (Note, 1 Pet. 5: 1-4.) But woe to infidels, and ungodly men, who appear in the garb of ministers! They say in their hearts, 'My Lord delayeth his coming,' and so are emboldened to persecute, oppress and fleece their brethren, and to indulge in riot and licentiousness: but they will soon be surprised in the midst of their successful impiety, and torn away, to have their portion with the unbelievers. Those who were thus ungodly, not only with the Bible in their hands, but with the Gospel in their mouths, and who knew their Lord's will accurately, and could instruct others in it, yet never prepared themselves, or set about obeying it, will be punished in the most tremendous manner. Indeed the condemnation of heathens, and others who have had but few advantages for knowing the will of God, will be very light, compared with that of wicked professors of Christianity, and of ungodly ministers: 'For unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required.' May the Lord then give us grace, to improve our many advantages to the glory of his name! (Note and P. O. Is. 56: 9-12. P. O. Matt. 24: 36-51.)

SCOTT.

Verses 49-53.

The introduction of the Gospel would, in some respects, resemble the kindling of a fire, which should occasion very destructive and wide-spread desolations. Not that this is the tendency of Christianity; but it would be the effect of the opposition raised against it, and of the perversions many would make of it. Hence would arise furious persecutions, bitter contentions, and multiplied divisions, usurpations, and oppressions; and these things, with the resistance made to them, producing fierce and bloody wars, would diffuse manifold calamities and evils all over the earth. (Marg. Ref. c. d.—Mic. 7: 5-7. Matt. 10: 34-36.) Infidels have confidently alleged these consequences of the promulgation of Christianity, as so many objections to its divine original; wilfully forgetting that 'thus it was written, and thus it must be.' But the prediction of these effects, which no philosophizing or speculative observer would ever have expected from so benign a religion, forms an additional demonstration that it is from God; and every man, who is experimentally acquainted with the human heart, will readily account for them, without charging the least blame on the Gospel: nay, he will see, that they are occasioned by its excellency, and must follow from it, so long as men continue proud, carnal, selfish, and alienated from God. To this, our Lord added, 'And what will I, if it be already kindled?'—What would I, br. that it were kindled.' Campbell. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) It may, however, refer to the malignant opposition of the scribes and Pharisees, and the divisions and contentions which our Lord's ministry had already excited; yet, though the fire was indeed already kindled, did He regret that He had been so open in his instructions, and sharp in his reproofs? Did they suppose that He was disappointed or disconcerted? Did they imagine it at He meant to desist? This was, by no means, the case; on the contrary, He earnestly desired that this fire should be more completely kindled, by the full and extensive publication of his Gospel. But before that could take place, 'He had a baptism to be baptized with,' far different from that 'of water and of the Holy Spirit,' by which He had been admitted to the exercise of his prophetic office; for He must endure the most extreme sufferings, shed his blood on the cross, and pour out his soul unto death, before He could enter on his office within the veil, as the High Priest of his church, and be put in full possession of the mediatorial throne. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. z, a.—Notes, Matt. 20: 20-23.) 'But how was He straitened, till this was accomplished? It did not consist with the plan laid down for the performance of this work, to preach the Gospel more openly or extensively, till this baptism was completed; in the mean time He was exceedingly straitened and limited, in the exercise of his ardent love and zeal; and even tormented for that awful and important crisis, which should make way for his exaltation, and the publication of his Gospel to all nations, that God might be glorified in the salvation of an innumerable multitude of precious souls. (Is. 53: 11, 12. John 16: 16-22. Heb. 12: 2, 3.)

53 The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.

54 ¶ And he said also to the people, When ye see a cloud rise out of the west, straightway ye say, There cometh a shower; and so it is.

55 And when ye see the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat; and it cometh to pass.

56 Ye hypocrites, ye can discern the face of the sky, and of the earth; but how is it that ye do not discern this time?

57 Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?

58 When *thou goest with thine adversary to the magistrate, as thou art in the way, give diligence that thou mayest be delivered from him; lest he hale thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and the officer cast thee into prison.

ther in holy love, and, if all would receive it, this would be the effect of it; but there being multitudes that not only will not receive it, but oppose it, and have their corruptions exasperated by it, and are enraged at those that do receive it, it proves, though not the cause, yet the occasion of division. While the strong man armed kept his palace, in the Gentile world, his goods were at peace; all was quiet, for all went one way, the sects of philosophers agreed well enough, so did the worshippers of different deities; but when the Gospel was preached, and many were enlightened by it, and turned from the power of Satan to God, then there was a disturbance, a noise and a shaking, Ezek. 37: 7. Some distinguished themselves by embracing the Gospel, and others were angry that they did so. Yea, and among them that received the Gospel, there would be different sentiments in lesser things, which would occasion division; and Christ permits it for holy ends, (1 Cor. 11: 19), that Christians may learn and practise mutual forbearance, Rom. 14: 1, 2.

(2.) That this division will reach into private families, and the preaching of the Gospel occasion discord among the nearest relations; v. 53. If, for instance, the father turns Christian, and the son does not; the former will be zealous by arguments and endearments, to turn the latter too; (1 Cor. 7: 16.) as soon as ever Paul was converted, he disputed: (Acts 9: 29.) the one that continues in unbelief will be provoked, and will hate and persecute the one that by his faith and obedience witnesses against, and condemns, his unbelief and disobedience. A spirit of bigotry and persecution will break through the strongest bonds of relation and mutual affection; see Matt. 10: 35, 34: 7. Even mothers and daughters fall out about religion; and those that believe not, are so violent and outrageous, that they are ready to deliver up into the hands of the bloody persecutors those that believe, though otherwise very near and dear to them. We find in the Acts, that, wherever the Gospel came, persecution was stirred up; it was every where spoken against, and there was no small stir about that way. Therefore let not the disciples of Christ, promise themselves peace on earth, for they are sent forth as sheep in the midst of wolves.

V. 54—59. Having given his disciples their lesson in the foregoing verses, Christ here turns to the people, and gives them theirs, v. 54. In general, He would have them be as wise in the affairs of their souls, as they are in their outward affairs. Two things He specifies,

I. Let them learn to discern the way of God toward them, that they may prepare accordingly. They could, by observing the winds and clouds, foresee when there would be rain, and when there would be hot weather; (v. 54, 55.) and they accordingly either housed their hay and corn, or threw it abroad, and equipped themselves for a journey, according as they foresaw the weather would be. Even in the change of the weather, God gives us warning what is coming, and art has improved those notices of nature, in weather-glasses. These preparations here spoken of, were made by repeated observations on the chain of causes; see the benefit of experience; by taking notice, we may come to give notice; whose is wise, will observe and learn. See now,

1. The particulars of the presages: 'Ye see a cloud arising out of the west;' (the Hebrew would say, out of the sea;) 'perhaps it is at first no bigger than a man's hand,' (1 Kings 18: 44.) but ye say, This is a shower in the womb of it, and it proves so. When ye observe the south wind blow, ye say, There will be heat,' (for the hot countries of Africa lay not far south of Judea,) 'and it usually comes to pass.'

2. The inferences from them, (v. 56.) 'Ye hypocrites, who pretend to be wise, but really are not so, who pretend to expect the Messiah and his kingdom,' (for so the generality of the Jews did, and yet are no way disposed to receive and entertain it, how is it that ye do not discern that, according to the indications given in the Old Testament prophecies, now is the time for the Messiah to appear, and that, according to the marks given of Him, I am He? Why are ye not aware that ye have now an opportunity which ye will not have long, and which ye may never have again, of securing to yourselves an interest in the kingdom of God, and the privileges of that kingdom? Now is the accepted time, now or never. It is the folly and misery of man, that he knows not his time, Eccl. 9: 12. This was the ruin of the men of that generation, that they knew not the day of their visitation, Luke 19: 44. But a wise man's heart discerns time and judgment; such was the wisdom of the men of Issachar, who had understanding of the times, 1 Chron. 12: 32. He adds, (v. 57.) 'Yea, and why, even of yourselves, though ye had not these loud alarms given you, judge ye not what is right? Ye are not only stupid and regardless in matters that are purely of divine revelation, but ye are so even in the dictates of the very light and law of nature.' Christianity has reason and natural conscience on its side; and if men would allow themselves the liberty of judging what is right, they would soon find that all Christ's precepts concerning all things are right, and that there is nothing more equitable in itself, nor better becoming us, than to submit to them, and be ruled by them.

II. Let them hasten to make their peace with God, before it be too late, v. 55, 59. This we had on another occasion, Matt. 5: 26.

1. We reckon it our wisdom, in our temporal affairs, to compound with those with whom we cannot contend, to agree with our adversary on the best terms we can, before the equity be foreclosed, and we be left to the rigor of the law. Wise men will not let their quarrels go to an extremity, but accommodate them in time.

2. Let us do thus in the affairs of our souls; we have by sin made God our adversary, have provoked his displeasure against us, and He has both right and might on his side; so that it is to no purpose to think of carrying on the controversy with Him either at bar or in battle. Christ, to whom all judgment is committed, is the Magistrate before whom we are hastening to appear: if we stand a trial before Him, and insist on our own justification, the cause will certainly go against us; the Judge will deliver us to the officer, the ministers of his justice, and we shall be cast into the prison of hell; the debt will be exacted to the utmost; and though we cannot make a full satisfaction for it, it will be continually demanded, till the last mite be paid, which will not be to all eternity. Christ's sufferings were short, yet in value fully satisfactory. In the sufferings of damned sinners, what is wanting in value, must be made up in an endless duration. Now, in consideration of this, let us give diligence to be delivered out of the hands of God, as an adversary, into his hands as a Father, and this as we are in the way, which has the chief stress laid on it here. While we are alive, we are in the way; and

Verses 54—57.

(Marg. Ref. e—h.—Notes, Matt. 16: 1—4. Mark 8: 10—13.) When the people saw a cloud rise from the Mediterranean sea, they had learned by constant observation to expect copious showers; and a south wind from off the sultry deserts was deemed a sure prognostic of heat. In such matters they were sagacious; but the exact accomplishment of types and prophecies, in the doctrine, miracles, and character of Christ, and in the time and circumstances of his appearance, did not suffice to convince them that He was their promised Messiah! In this, their hypocritical scribes and teachers were most faulty; and, being blinded by their carnal prejudices, they used their whole influence to mislead the people. Yet, as the case was so very evident, why did not the people see with their own eyes, and judge for themselves what was right, or decide impartially and justly between Him and his malicious opponents? (Marg. Ref. i.—Acts 2: 37—40.)

Verses 58, 59.

This passage, as here connected, implied a warning to the Jews, and their priests, scribes, and rulers, to cease from their opposition to Christ, and to welcome Him as their Prince and Savior, before it were too late; otherwise terrible and durable miseries would soon come upon them; but it also inculcated those instructions to individuals, which have been already considered. (Marg. Ref.—Prov. 6: 1—5. 25: 8—17. Matt. 5: 25, 26.) Be delivered. (Acts 13: 12. Heb. 2: 15. Mat. 6: 24.) It seems to imply deliverance from an enemy, by pacifying Him and being reconciled.

He compares the kingdom of God to a grain of mustard-seed, 18, 19, and to leaven, 20, 21. Being asked whether few should be saved, He warns the people to 'strive to enter in at the strait gate,' before it was finally shut, 22-30. He will not be diverted from his course, by the threatenings of Herod, 31-33. He predicts, and America over, the approaching desolations of Jerusalem, 34, 35.

THERE were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices.

regarded man. The altar, which used to be a sanctuary and place of shelter, is now become a snare and a trap, a place of danger and slaughter.

2. Why it was related at this season to our Lord Jesus. (1.) Perhaps merely as a matter of news, and as a thing which they lamented, and believed He would too, for the Galileans were their countrymen. Note, Sad providences ought to be observed by us, and communicated to others, that they and we may be suitably affected with, and make a good use of them. (2.) Perhaps as a confirmation of what Christ had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, concerning the necessity of making our peace with God in time, before we be delivered to the officer, that is, to death, and so cast into prison, when it will be too late to make agreements. Note, It will be of good use to us both to explain the Word of God, and to enforce it upon ourselves, to observe the providences of God. (3.) Perhaps they would stir Him up, being Himself of Galilee, and a Prophet, and one that had a great interest in that country, to find out a way to revenge the death of these Galileans on Herod. If they had any thoughts of this kind, they were quite out; for Christ was now going up to Jerusalem, to be delivered into the hands of Pilate, and to have his blood, not mingled with his sacrifice, but itself made a sacrifice. (4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 49-59. We ought not to be disconcerted at the undesirable effects, occasioned by the preaching of the Gospel; but to be bold and zealous in promoting the truth, without shrinking, from fear of consequences to ourselves or others: for, though afflictions must be endured, divisions excited, and 'a man's foes be those of his own household,' yet sinners will be converted, and God will be glorified.—But if men were as wise for their souls, as most of them are in their temporal concerns, though false teachers might attempt to prejudice or mislead them, yet they would 'even of themselves discern what was CHAP. XIII. v. 1-3. (23: 1-5. Matt. 22: 15-22.) (2.) Were sinners, &c.] (Notes, John 9: 1-3. Acts 29: 3-6.) This is generally supposed to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the slaughter of the Jews by the Romans, for making insurrections against the government; and especially to the havoc made among them, in the courts of the temple, while they were offering their sacrifices: inasmuch that the altar was sprinkled with their blood, and a multitude of dead bodies lay round about it. (Marg. Ref.—Ex. 5: 7-7. 1 Pet. 4: 17-19.) This shows, that those who brought sacrifices were admitted into the inner court. (Lev. 1: 5-9. 2 Chr. 23: 3-10, v. 6.) now is our time, by repentance and faith through Christ, (who is the Mediator as well as the Magistrate,) to get the quarrel made up, while it may be done, before it be too late. Thus was God in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, beseeching us to be reconciled. Let us take hold on the arm of the Lord stretched out in this gracious offer, that we may make peace, and we shall make peace; (Isa. 27: 4, 5.) for we cannot walk together till we be agreed.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1-5. We have here,

I. Tidings brought to Christ of the death of some Galileans lately, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices, v. 1. Let us consider,

1. What this tragical story was: it is briefly related here, and is not met with in any of the historians of those times. Josephus indeed mentions Pilate's killing of some Samaritans, who, under the conduct of a factious leader, were going in a tumultuous manner to mount Gerizim, where the Samaritans' temple was; but we can by no means allow that story to be the same with this. Some think these Galileans were of the faction of Judas Gaulonita, called Judas of Galilee, (Acts 5: 37.) who disowned Cæsar's authority, and refused to pay tribute to him: or perhaps these, being Galileans, were only suspected by Pilate to be of that faction, and barbarously murdered, because those who were in with that pretender, were out of his reach. The Galileans being Herod's subjects, it is probable that this outrage committed on them by Pilate, occasioned the quarrel between Herod and Pilate, which we read of, ch. 23: 12. We are not told what number they were, perhaps but a few; (and therefore, the story is overlooked by Josephus;) but the circumstance remarked is, that Pilate mingled their blood with their sacrifices in the court of the temple. Lightfoot thinks it probable they were themselves killing their sacrifices, and that Pilate's officers came on them by surprise, just at that time. Neither the holiness of the place, or work, would protect them from the fury of an unjust judge, that neither feared God, nor

Perhaps it was told Christ, to deter Him from going up to Jerusalem, to worship, (v. 22.) lest Pilate should serve Him as he had those Galileans, and should suggest against Him, as, probably, he had against them, that they came to sacrifice as Absalom, with a seditious design, under color of sacrificing, to raise rebellion. (5.) Christ's answer intimates that they told Him this with a spiteful intuendo, that, though Pilate was unjust in killing them, yet that without doubt, they were secretly bad men, else God would not have permitted Pilate thus barbarously to cut them off. It was very invidious; rather than allow them to be martyrs, though they died sacrificing, and perhaps suffered for their devotion, they will, without any color of proof, suppose them malefactors; and it may be for no other reason than because they were not of their party and denomination, differed from them, or had difference with them; their fate, which was capable not only of a favorable, but an honorable construction, shall be called a just judgment of God upon them, though they know not for what.

II. Christ's reply to this report: in which, 1. He seconded it with another story, which, like it, gave an instance of people's being taken away by sudden death, v. 4. Lightfoot's conjecture is, that this tower adjoined to the pool of Siloam, the same with the pool of Bethesda, and that it belonged to those porches by the pool, in which the impotent folk lay, (John 5: 3.) and that those killed, were some of them, or of those who in this pool used to purify themselves for the temple-service, for it was near the temple. Whoever they were, it was a sad story; yet such melancholy accidents we often hear of: for as the birds are caught in a snare, so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falls suddenly upon them, Eccl. 9: 12. Towers, that were built for safety, often prove men's destruction.

2. He cautioned his hearers not to make an ill use of these and such like events, nor from thence to censure great sufferers, as if they were therefore to be accounted great sinners, v. 2, 3. Perhaps they that told Him the story of the Galileans, were Jews, and glad of any thing that furnished matter of reflection on the Galileans, and therefore Christ retorted on them the story of the men of Jerusalem, that came to an untimely end; for with what measure of that kind we mete, it shall be measured to us again. Whether it make for us or against us, we must abide by this rule, that we cannot judge of men's sins by their sufferings in this world; for many are thrown into the furnace as gold, to be purified, not as dross and chaff, to be consumed. We must therefore not be harsh in our censures of those that are afflicted more than their neighbors, as Job's friends were in their censures of Him, lest we add sorrow to the sorrowful; nay, lest we condemn the generation of the righteous, Ps. 73: 14. If we will be judging, we have enough to do to judge our-

(3.) Likewise perish.] 'One faction of the zealots made themselves masters of the inner court of the temple, the other of the outer; whence they annoyed the former with their military engines, from which the darts were shot with such force, that they reached the altar, and even the temple itself, and struck both the priests and the sacrificers: so that many who had come hither from the extremities of the earth, did themselves fall before their sacrifices, and sprinkled with their own blood that holy altar. Then were the bodies of aliens mixed with those of the Jews, and the bodies of the priests with those of the profane; and the blood, flowing from all kinds of carcases, stood in pools within the sacred precincts of the temple.'

6 ¶ He spake also this parable: A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard: and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none.

7 Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?

died by the fall of the tower of Siloam. But certainly it looks further; except we repent, we shall perish eternally, as they perish out of this world. The same Jesus that bid us repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand, bid us repent, for otherwise we shall perish; so that He hath set before us life and death, good and evil, and put us to our choice. (5) The perishing of those who have been most harsh and severe in judging others, will be particularly aggravated.

V. 6-9. This parable is intended to enforce the warning immediately going before, v. 3.

1. It primarily refers to the nation and people of the Jews. God chose them for his own, made them a people near to Him, gave them advantages for knowing and serving Him above any other people, and expected answerable returns of duty and obedience; but they disappointed his expectations, and were a reproach, instead of a credit, to their profession; upon this, He justly determined to abandon them, deprive them of their privileges, and cut them off; but, upon Christ's, as of old, on Moses' intercession, He graciously gave them further time and further mercy; tried them, as it were, another year, by sending his apostles among them, to call them to repentance, and, upon that, in Christ's name to offer them pardon: some were wrought upon to repent, and bring forth fruit, and with them all was well; but the body of the nation continued impenitent and unfruitful, and on them came ruin without remedy: about forty years after, they were cut down, and cast into the fire, Matt. 3:10.

II. Yet it has, without doubt, a further reference, and is designed for the awakening of all that enjoy the means of grace, and the privileges of the visible church, to see to it, that the temper of their minds and the tenor of their lives be answerable to their professions and opportunities, for that is the fruit required. Now observe here,

1. The advantages which this fig-tree had: it was planted in a vineyard, in better soil, and where it had more care and pains bestowed on it, than other fig-trees had, that commonly grew, not in vineyards, but by the way-side, Matt. 21:19. This fig-tree belonged to a certain man, who was at expense upon it. Note, The church of God is his vineyard, distinguished from the common, and fenced about, Isa. 5:1, 2. We are fig-trees planted in this vineyard by our baptism; and this is our distinguishing privilege and happiness. He has not dealt so with other nations.

2. The owner's expectations from it; He came and sought fruit thereon, and had reason to expect it. He did not send, but came Himself, intimating his desire to find fruit. Christ came into this world, came to his own, to the Jews, seeking fruit. Note, The God of heaven requires and expects fruit from those that have a place in his vineyard. He has his eye on those that enjoy the Gospel, to see whether they live up to it; He seeks evidences of their getting good by the means of grace they enjoy. Leaves will not serve; crying, Lord, Lord; blossoms will not serve; beginning well and promising fair; there must be fruit. Our thoughts, words, and actions must be according to the gospel-light and love.

3. The disappointment of his expectation; He found none, at all, not one fig. Note, It is sad to think how many enjoy the privileges of the Gospel, and yet do nothing at all to honor God, nor to answer the end of his intrusting them with those privileges; and it is a disappointment to Him, and a grief to the Spirit of his grace. (1) He here complains of it to the dresser of the vineyard: I come, seeking fruit, but am disappointed; I find none, looking for grapes, but behold, wild grapes; He is grieved with such a generation. (2) He aggravates it, with two considerations: [1.] That He had waited long, and yet was disappointed: applying it to the Jews, He came before, and, after the captivity, and in the preaching of John Baptist and Christ Himself; or it may allude to the three years of Christ's public ministry, which were now expiring. In general, it teaches us, that the patience of God is stretched out to long-suffering, with many that enjoy the Gospel, and do not bring forth the fruits of it; and this patience is wretchedly abused, which provokes God to so much the greater severity. How many times three years has God come to many of us, seeking fruit, but has found none, or next to none, or worse than none! [2.] That this fig tree did not only not bring forth fruit, but cumbered the ground, took up the room of a fruitful tree, and was injurious to all about it. Note, Those who do no good, commonly do hurt by the influence of their bad example; they grieve and discourage the good, they harden and encourage the bad. And the mischief is the greater, and the ground the more cumbered, if it be a high, large, spreading tree, and if it be an old tree of long standing.

4. The doom passed; Cut it down. He

Verses 4-5.

(Marg. Ref. f. g.)—This is commonly supposed to refer to the destruction of the Jews in great multitudes, by the casting down of the walls and towers of Jerusalem, when the city was taken; but the sudden and dreadful slaughter of the Jews at that time, seems in general intended; as the immediate hand of God was gone forth against them. It is observable, that our Lord determines nothing concerning the character and state of the persons in question; they were sinners, but not greater sinners than many others. (Nim. 27:1-4.) No doubt he also intends, to warn all men, in every age, that final and eternal ruin would certainly overtake all the impenitent, to whatever nation, society, or party they belonged.

Verses 6-9.

(Is. 5:1-7. Matt. 21:17-20, 33-44.) In three years' time the young trees were expected to bear; (Lev. 19:23-25.) but the owner of this tree is represented, as coming three subsequent years to seek fruit; and not finding any. It might therefore be concluded to be a barren tree, not fit to occupy the room, or appropriate the nourishment and culture, which might be more profitably employed. Some expositors speak, as if Christ Himself was represented by 'the dresser of the vineyard'; and indeed the long-suffering of God with sinners is the effect of his mediation; yet He seems rather to be the owner of the vineyard, who sentences the barren trees to be cut down. Besides, his intercession is never finally in vain. (Note, John 17:6-10, v. 9.) and the language used may describe the fervent prayers and zealous labors of faithful ministers, who earnestly desire to prevent the ruin of the people. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Jer. 14:10-22. 15:1. Ez. 14:13-21. Matt. 3:7-10.) (9) If it bear fruit.—It is an elliptical form of speaking; and implies, that if it then bare fruit, it would be preserved; but not otherwise. There is nothing for 'well' in the Greek. SCOTT.

(7) Three years.—Kuinöl takes this to denote a long time; a certain for an uncertain number. But fig-trees that bear at all, will by that time produce fruit, before which time they were not to be pruned. Hence, the three years must not be dated from its being planted, but from its having become fruit-bearing. BLOOMFIELD.

'Lord, not now. Lord, do not remove the Dresser, do not withhold the dews, do not pluck up the tree.' Note, [1.] It is desirable to have a barren tree reprieved. Some have yet grace to repent, yet mercy gives them space to repent, as to the old world one hundred and twenty years were allowed them to make their peace with God. [2.] We owe it to Christ, the great Intercessor, that barren trees are not cut down immediately; but for this interposal, the whole world has been cut down upon the sin of Adam; He said, Lord, let it alone; and He upholds all things. [3.] We are encouraged to pray for the merciful reprieve of barren fig-trees. Thus must we stand in the gap, to turn away wrath. [4.] Reprieves of mercy are but for a time; let it alone this year also, a short time, but sufficient to make trial. Though God has borne long, we may hope He will bear yet a little longer, but not always. [5.] The prayers of others may obtain reprieves for us, but not pardons; there must be our own faith, and repentance, and prayers, else no pardon.

(2.) How He promises to improve this reprieve, if it be obtained, v. 8. The Dresser seems to say, 'Lord, may be I have been wanting on my part; but let it alone this year, and I will do more than I have towards its fruitfulness.' Thus in all our prayers we must request God's grace, with a humble resolution to do our duty, else we mock God, and show that we do not rightly value the mercies we pray for. In particular, when we pray to God for grace for ourselves or others, we must follow our prayers with diligence in the use of the means of grace. The Dresser of the vineyard engages to do his part, and therein teaches ministers to do theirs. He will dig about the tree, and will dung it. Unfruitful Christians must be awakened by the terrors of the law, and then encouraged by the promises of the Gospel: the one prepares for the other, and all little enough.

(3.) On what footing He leaves the matter: 'Let us try it, and what we can do with it, one year more, v. 9. It is possible, nay, there is hope, it may yet be fruitful,' in that hope the Owner will have patience with it, and the Dresser take pains with it, and if it should have the desired success, both will be pleased it was not cut down. The word well is not in the original, but the expression is abrupt; If it bear fruit; supply it how you please, so as to express how wonderfully well pleased both the Owner and Dresser will be; but it cannot be better expressed than by well. Note, Unfruitful professors of religion, if, after long unfruitfulness, they will repent, and bring forth fruit, shall find all is well. God will be pleased, for He will be praised; ministers' hands will be strengthened, and such penitents will be their joy now, and their crown shortly. Nay, there will be joy in heaven for it: the ground will be no longer cumbered, but bettered, the vineyard beautified, and the good trees in it made better. It is well for the tree itself; it shall not only not be cut down, but receive blessings from God; (Heb. 6: 7.) shall be purged, and shall bring forth more fruit, for the Father is its Husbandman; (John 15: 2.) and it shall at last be transplanted from the vineyard on earth to the paradise above.

But He adds, If not, then, after that, Thou shalt cut it down. Observe here, though God bear long, He will not bear always, with unfruitful professors; his patience will have an end, and, if abused, will give way to wrath without end. Barren trees will certainly be cut down at last, and cast into the fire. The longer God has waited, and the more cost He has been at upon them, the greater will their destruction be: to be cut down after that, after all these expectations from it, these debates concerning it, this concern for it, will sadly aggravate the condemnation. Cutting down, though work that shall be done, is work God doth not take pleasure in: for observe here, the Owner said to the Dresser, 'Do Thou cut it down, for it cumbereth the ground.' 'Nay,' said the Dresser, 'if it must be done at last, Thou shalt cut it down, let not my hand be upon it.' Those that now intercede for barren trees, and take pains with them, if they persist in their unfruitfulness, will be even content to see them cut down, and will not have one word more to say for them. Their best friends will acquiesce in, nay, will approve and applaud the righteous judgment of God, in the day of its manifestation, Rev. 15: 3, 4.

V. 10-17. Here is,

I. A miraculous cure. Our Lord Jesus spent his Sabbaths in the synagogues, v. 10. We should make conscience of doing so, as we have opportunity, and not think we can spend the Sabbath as well at home in reading a good book, for religious assemblies are a divine institution, we must bear our testimony to, though but of two or three. And when in the synagogues on the Sabbath-day, He was teaching there—it denotes a continuing act; He still taught the people knowledge. He was in his element when teaching. Now, to confirm and recommend the doctrine He preached, He wrought a miracle.

1. The object of charity was, a woman in the synagogue, that had an infirmity, (v. 11.) which an evil spirit, by divine permission, had brought upon her; such, that she was bowed together by strong convulsions; and, having been long thus, and the disease being incurable, she could not stand erect, which is reckoned man's honor above the beasts. Observe, Though she was much deformed, and made to look mean, and, as is supposed, motion was very painful to her, yet she went to the synagogue on the Sabbath day. Note, Even bodily infirmities, unless very grievous indeed, should not keep us from public worship on Sabbath-days; for God can help us, beyond our expectation.

2. The offer of this cure to one that sought it not, bespeaks the preventing mercy and grace of Christ, v. 12. It does not appear that she made any application to Him, or had any expectation from Him; but before she called He

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9. As no place or employment can secure us from the stroke of death, we should always be preparing for it; and instead of considering the sudden or extraordinary deaths of our neighbors or countrymen, as proofs that they were 'sinners above other men,' we should endeavor to improve them as warnings to ourselves; for when dire calamities are reported, it may be said to sinners of every age and nation, 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Nay, whatever we read in the Scriptures, of the misery of the wicked in hell, is intended to speak the same important warning to each of us.—Those who hear the Gospel, and associate with the people of God, and yet continue impenitent and unconverted, are the barren fig-trees in the Lord's vineyard; and it behoves every one of us to inquire, how long we have been favored with the means of grace, and borne with by the long-suffering of God; and to examine, whether we be now bearing fruit to his glory, and the good of men, or be still mere 'cumberers of the ground.' Such inquiries are peculiarly proper to be made at the beginning of a new year, or the return of any other periodical season. And when any are restored from sickness, and spared a little longer, in answer to the prayers of ministers or Christian friends, surely they should take their admonitions in good part, and seek to profit by their endeavors; remembering how short their respite may be, and how soon they may be cut down, if not at length rendered fruitful.—But alas! many of these despise and revile such as pray and labor for their salvation, and watch for their souls as those who must give account, that they may do it with joy and not with grief!'

(3.) Dig about it. [Weinstein has many classical citations, from which it appears that three things were necessary to the cultivation of the fig-tree—digging, dunging, and watering; and especially the first. We are told that fig-trees exhaust the soil.] BLOOMFIELD.

(9.) If it bear fruit, &c. In hypothetical sentences, like this, the latter member is often omitted, even by the best Greek writers, when either the tone of voice, countenance, motions, or gestures of him who employed such expressions, indicate what is wanting, and what must be understood. Verses 10-17.

The calamity, under which this woman had so long labored, would in general have been considered as a very remarkable disease, arising from some known or unknown natural cause; but it was at that time justly ascribed to an evil spirit; so that in fact 'Satan had bent her eighteen years.' (Matt. 8: 28, 29. Mark 9: 18-24.) (13.) Glorious God! (Ps. 14: 1-7. Marg. Ref.—14: 1-6. Matt. 12: 13. Mark 3: 1-5. John 5: 10-18. 7: 19-24. 9: 13-16.

11 And behold, there was a woman, which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself.

12 And when Jesus saw her, he called her to him, and said unto her, Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity.

13 And he laid his hands on her: and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God.

14 And the ruler of the synagogue answered with indignation, because that Jesus had healed on the sabbath-day, and said unto the people, There are six days in which men ought to work: in them therefore come and be healed, and not on the sabbath-day.

15 The Lord then answered him, and said, Thou hypocrite, doth not each one of you on the sabbath loose his ox or his ass from the stall, and lead him away to watering?

16 And ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the sabbath-day?

17 And when he had said these things, all his adversaries were answered. She came to Him, to be taught, and to get good for her soul, and then Christ relieved her bodily infirmity. Note, Those whose first and chief care is for their souls, do best befriend the true interests of their bodies likewise, for other things shall be added to them. Christ in his Gospel calls and invites those to come to Him for healing, that labor under spiritual infirmities, and if He calls us, He will undoubtedly help us when we come to Him.

3. The cure, effectually and immediately wrought, bespeaks his almighty power, v. 13. Let not those despair, whose disease is inveterate, who have been long in affliction, God can at length relieve them; therefore, though He tarry, wait for Him. She was under the power of an evil spirit, but Christ has a power superior. He could lift her up, and enable her to lift up herself. She that had been crooked, was immediately made straight, and the Scripture was fulfilled (Ps. 146: 8.) The Lord raiseth them that are bowed down.

This cure represents the work of Christ's grace on the souls of people. (1.) In the conversion of sinners. Unsansified hearts are under this spirit of infirmity, they are distorted, the faculties of the soul are quite out of place and order; they are bowed down toward things below. They can in no wise lift up themselves to God and heaven: the bent of the soul, in its natural state, is the quite contrary way. Those crooked souls seek not to Christ, but He calls them to Him, lays the hand of his power and grace on them, speaks a healing word, by which He looses them from their infirmity; makes the soul straight, reduces it to order, raises it above worldly regards, and directs its affections and aims heavenward. Though man cannot make that straight, which God has made crooked, (Ecc. 7: 13.) yet the grace of God can make that straight, which the sin of man has made crooked. (2.) In the consolation of good people. Many of God's children are long under a spirit of infirmity, a spirit of bondage; through prevailing grief and fear, their souls are cast down and disquieted within them, they are troubled, they are bowed down greatly, they go mourning all the day long, Ps. 38: 6. But Christ, by his spirit of adoption, looses them from this infirmity in due time, and raises them up.

4. The present effect of this cure, on the soul of the patient as well as on her body; she glorified God, gave Him the praise of her cure, to whom all praise is due. When crooked souls are made straight, they will show it by glorifying God.

II. The offence taken at this by the ruler of the synagogue, v. 14. One would think the miracle should have convinced him; but what light can so shine, as that a spirit of bigotry and enmity to Christ and his Gospel will not shut men's eyes against it? Never was such honor done to the synagogue he was ruler of, as Christ had now done it, and yet he had indignation at it. He had not indeed the impudence to quarrel with Christ, but he reflected on Christ in what he said to the people. How light he made of Christ's miracles, as if they were things of course, and no more than what quacks and mountebanks did every day: 'You may come and be healed, any day of the week.' Christ's cures were become, in his eyes, cheap and common things. See also how he stretches the law beyond its intention, or any just construction that could be put upon it, in making either healing, or being healed with a touch of the hand, or a word's speaking, to be that work which is forbidden on the sabbath-day. This was evidently the work of God; and why God tried us out from working that day, did He tie Himself out? The same word in Hebrew signifies both godly and merciful, to intimate that works of mercy and charity are in a manner works of piety, (1 Tim. 5: 4.) and therefore very proper on sabbath-days.

III. Christ's justification of Himself in what He had done, v. 15. Thou hypocrite. Christ, who knows men's hearts, may call those hypocrites, whom it would be presumption for us to call so, who must judge charitably, and can judge but according to the outward appearance. Christ knew the ruler had a real enmity to Him and his Gospel, which he did but cloak with a pretended zeal for the sabbath-day; and that when He bid the people come on the six days, and be healed, he really would not have them be healed any day. Christ could have told him this, but he vouchsafes to reason the case with him; and,

1. He appeals to the common practice among the Jews, which was never disallowed, that of watering their cattle on the sabbath-day. Not to allow it would be barbarous; for a merciful man regards the life of his beast, his own beast that serves him. Letting the cattle rest on the sabbath-day, as the law directed, would be worse than working them, if they must be made to fast on that day, as the Ninevites' cattle on their fast day, Jon. 3: 7.

2. He applies this to the present case; v. 16. 'Must an ox or an ass, out of compassion to them, have so much time and pains bestowed on them every Sabbath, as to be loosed from the stall, led away perhaps a great way to the water, and then back again; and shall not this woman, only with a touch of the hand and a word's speaking, be loosed from a much greater grievance than that which the cattle undergo, when they are kept a day without water? For consider, 'She is a daughter of Abraham, whom you all pride yourselves in a relation to; she is your sister. She is a daughter of Abraham, and therefore entitled to the Messiah's blessings, to the bread which belongs to the children. She is one whom Satan has bound, and therefore it was not only an act of charity to the poor woman, but of piety to God, to break the power of the devil, and baffle him. She has been in this deplorable condition, lo, these eighteen years, and therefore now that there is an opportunity of delivering her, it ought not to be deferred a day longer, as you would have it, for any of you would have thought eighteen years' affliction full long enough.'

IV. The different effect this had on those that heard Him. He had sufficiently made it out, not only that it was lawful, but that it was highly fit and proper, to heal this poor woman on the sabbath-day, and thus publicly in the synagogue, that they might all be witnesses of the miracle. And now observe,

1. What a confusion this was to the malice of his persecutors; (v. 17.) they were put to silence, and vexed that they were so; it was not shame that worked repentance, but indignation rather. Note, Sooner or later, all the adversaries of Christ, and his doctrine and miracles, will be made ashamed.

2. What a confirmation this was to the faith of his friends, v. 17. The shame of his foes was the joy of his followers; the one fretted at, and the other triumphed in the increase of his interest. The things Christ did, were glorious things; and, though now clouded, perhaps will appear so, and we ought to rejoice in them. Every thing that is the honor of Christ, is the comfort of Christians.

(11.) Having a spirit of infirmity. [That is, laboring under, not merely (as Heinsius, Rosenmueller, and others, maintain) an infirmity, or disorder, but one inflicted by an evil spirit. That the Hebrews, especially the rabbins and Talmudists, attributed presiding spirits and genii to almost every thing, especially water, food, air, war, pestilence, conception, generation, matrimony, ardent desire, felicity, calamity, dreams, health, sickness, death, &c., has been shown by Wagenseil's Nota. And that much the same opinion was entertained by the Greek philosophers, as, Thales, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, Chalcidius, Max. Syr. Alichous, Apuleius &c., others, appears both from Diog. Laert. and the writings of the above-mentioned philosophers. That diseases were especially inflicted by demons, is recorded by Josephus, and the Jewish interpreters on Ps. 91: 6. The cases of Saul and Job will readily occur to any one. This, too, was the opinion of Pythag. and Homer. Od. But in the more violent disorders did they especially recognize demoniacal potency. So Galen somewhere remarks, that apoplexy was called "a demon" and that many attributed something of the kind to epilepsy, is observed by Hippocrates de morbo sacro. Harb. & Moldenhauer observe, that the evangelist speaks of the opinions of his countrymen. Triller thinks this disorder was letanum emprosthotonum, which, in hot countries, is sometimes chronic.]

V. 10-21. We must indeed not rest in means and ordinances, but should thankfully attend on them, especially on God's holy day; and even if we come thither with pain and trouble, we shall not have cause to repent. We are not concerned or competent to determine, what influence Satan has in occasioning or increasing our bodily diseases: but we know, that he has bound our souls with the chain of our own sinful propensities, so that we are not able in any wise to lift up or liberate ourselves: and this has been the case with numbers for many years, while their evil habits have continually been strengthening, and rendering their case more hopeless. But if Jesus speak the word, and put forth his healing power, even these will immediately be loosed, and their crooked judgments and dispositions rectified; and they will, without delay, be able and willing to glorify God by word and deed. This deliverance is most frequently wrought on the Lord's day: and whatever

V. 18-22. Here is, 1. The Gospel's progress foretold in two parables, which we had before, Matt. 13: 31, 33. The kingdom of the Messiah is the kingdom of God, but as yet people were generally under mistakes about it. Now, when we would describe a thing to those that are strangers to it, we do it by similitudes; so here Christ undertakes to show what the kingdom of God is like; (v. 18.) 'Whereunto shall I liken it?' v. 20. It will be quite another thing from what you expect, and will operate, and gain its point, in quite another manner.'

'You expect it will appear great, and arrive at its perfection suddenly; but you are mistaken, it is like a grain of mustard-seed, a little thing, makes but a little figure, and promises but little; yet, when sown in soil proper to receive it, it waxes a great tree,' v. 19. Many perhaps were prejudiced against the Gospel, and loath to come in to the obedience of it, because its beginning was so small; they were ready to say of Christ, Can this man save us? and of his Gospel, Is this likely ever to come to any thing? Now Christ would remove this prejudice, by assuring them that though its beginning was small, its latter end should greatly increase; so that many should come, come on the wing, should fly like a cloud, to lodge in the branches of it with more safety and satisfaction, than in the branches of Nebuchadnezzar's tree, Dan. 4: 21.

'You expect it will make its way by external means, by subduing nations and vanquishing armies; but it shall work like leaven, silently and insensibly, without force or violence,' v. 21. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump, so the doctrine of Christ will strangely diffuse its relish into the world of mankind: in this it triumphs, that the savor of the knowledge of it is unaccountably made manifest in every place, beyond what one could have expected, 2 Cor. 2: 14. But you must give it time, wait the issue of the preaching of the Gospel to the world, and you will find it does wonders, and alters the property of the souls of men. By degrees the whole will be leavened, even as many as are, like the meal to the leaven, prepared to receive the savor of it.'

2. Christ's progress toward Jerusalem recorded, v. 22. Here we find Christ itinerant in his preaching; journeying toward Jerusalem, to the feast of dedication. It was in the winter, when travelling was uncomfortable, yet He would be about his Father's business; and therefore, whatever cities or villages He could make in his way, He gave them a sermon or two. Wherever Providence brings us, we should endeavor to be doing all the good we can.

V. 23-30. We have here,

1. A question put to our Lord Jesus; by whom we are not told, whether a friend or foe; for He gave both a great liberty of questioning Him, and returned answers to the thoughts and intents of the heart. The question was, Are there few that are saved? v. 23. 'If the saved be few? Master, I have heard thou shouldst say so; Is it true?'

1. Perhaps it was a captious question; he put it to Him, to ensnare Him, and lessen his reputation. If He should say that many would be saved, they would reproach Him as too loose; if few, as precise and strait-laced. The Jewish doctors said, All Israel should have a place in the world to come; and would He dare to contradict that? Those that have imbibed a corrupt notion, are ready to make it the standard by which to measure all men's judgments; and in nothing do men more betray their ignorance, presumption, and partiality, than in judging of the salvation of others.

2 Perhaps it was a curious question, a nice speculation, he had lately been disputing upon with his companions, and they all agreed to refer it to Christ. Note, Many are more inquisitive respecting who shall be saved, and who not, than respecting what they shall do to be saved. It is commonly asked, 'May such and such be saved?' But it is well that we may be saved without knowing that.

3. Perhaps it was an admiring question; he had taken notice how strict the law of Christ was, and how bad the world was, and comparing these together, cries out, 'How few are there that will be saved?' Note, We have reason to wonder, that of the many to whom the word of salvation is sent, there are so few to whom it is indeed a saving word.

4. Perhaps it was an inquiring question; 'If there be few that be saved, what then? What influence should this have upon me?' Note, It concerns us all seriously to improve the great truth of the fewness of those that are saved.

II. Christ's answer to this question, which directs us what use to make of this truth. He did not give a direct answer, for He came to guide men's consciences, not to gratify their curiosity. Ask not, 'How many shall be saved?' But be they more or fewer, 'Shall I be one of them?' Not, 'What shall become of such and such, and what shall this man do?' But, 'What shall I do, and what will become of me?' Now in Christ's answer observe,

1. A quickening exhortation and direction, (v. 24.) not to him only that asked the question, but to all, to us, it is in the plural number; Strive ye. Note, All that will be saved, must enter in at the strait gate, must undergo a change of the whole man, such as, amounts to no less than being born again, and must submit to a strict discipline. Those that would enter in, must strive to enter. It is a hard matter to get to heaven; and a point not to be gained without a great deal of care and pains, of difficulty and diligence. We must strive with God in prayer, wrestle as Jacob, strive against sin and Satan; we must strive in every duty of religion, strive with our own hearts, 'Strive as those that run for a prize, exert ourselves to the utmost— Be in an agony.'

labor tends to put men in the way of receiving this blessing, or of being instrumental in its being communicated, must peculiarly accord to the pious and beneficent intention of that sacred season of rest.—But they, who hate the Gospel and its blessed effects, always find some objection to make against every instance of the power of divine grace: and when this is accompanied by a professed exactness in externals, the hypocrisy of it may often be shown, by observing that they do things of the same kind for their own secular interest, which they blame others for doing to promote the salvation of souls. Let enemies, however, be never so numerous or malicious, God's kingdom will continue to increase in the world, till it fills the whole earth; and in every renewed soul, till it has perfectly communicated its heavenly savor and nature to all its faculties, dispositions and affections.

The whole context shows, that no temporal preservation, but deliverance 'from the wrath to come,' and inheriting eternal life, were meant; as the subsequent mention of the strait gate fully proves. 2. Divers awakening considerations, to enforce this exhortation. O that we may be all awakened and quickened by them! They will serve to answer the question, Are there few that shall be saved?

(1.) Think how many take some pains for salvation, and yet perish because they do not take enough. Note, The reason is, because they rest in a lazy seeking of what will not be attained without a laborious striving. Their convictions are weak, they do not consider what they know and believe, and, consequently, their desires are cold, their endeavors feeble, and there is no strength or steadiness in their resolutions; thus they lose the prize, because they do not press forward. Christ avers this on his own word, I say unto you; and we may take his word, for He knows both the counsels of God and the hearts of men.

(2.) Think of the distinguishing day that is coming, and the decisions of that day. The Master of the house will rise up, and shut to the door, v. 25. Christ is the Master of the house, who will take cognizance of all that frequent his house. Now He seems as if He left things at large; but the day is coming when He will rise up, and shut to the door. What door? [1.] A door of distinction. Now, the door is open between carnal and spiritual professors, and they meet promiscuously in the same external performances. But when the Master of the house is risen up, the door will be shut between them, that those who are in the outer court, may be kept out, and left to be trodden under foot by the Gentiles, (Rev. 11: 2.) and that those who are within the veil, may be kept within. The door is shut, to separate between the precious and the vile, that sinners may no longer stand in the congregation of the righteous. Then you shall return, and discern betwixt them, and he that is filthy, shall be filthy still, and he that is holy, shall be holy still. [2.] A door of denial and exclusion. The door of mercy and grace has long stood open to them, but they would not be beholden to the favor of that door, they hoped to climb up some other way, and to get to heaven by their own merits; therefore when the Master of the house is risen up, He will justly shut that door. Thus, when Noah was safe in the ark, God shut the door to exclude all those that depended on shelters of their own in the approaching flood.

(3.) Think how many, who were very confident that they should be saved, will have their confidence deceive them, and be rejected in the day of trial.

[1.] What an assurance they had of admission, and how far their hope carried them, even to heaven's gate; there they stand and knock, knock as if they belonged to the house, saying, 'Lord, Lord, open to us, for we think we have a right to enter; take us in among the saved ones, for we joined ourselves to them.' Note, Many are ruined by an ill-grounded hope of heaven, which they never distrust or call in question, and therefore conclude their state is good. Thus these call Christ Lord, as if they were his servants; nay, in token of their importunity, they do, he it, Lord, Lord; they are desirous now to enter in by that door which they formerly made light of, and they would now gladly come in among those serious

Christians, whom they once secretly despised.

[2.] What grounds they had for their confidence, v. 26. 1st. They had been Christ's guests, and had shared in his favors. Judas ate bread with Christ, and dipped with Him in the dish. Hypocrites, under the disguise of their external profession, receive the Lord's supper, and in it partake of the children's bread, as if they were children. 2dly. They had been Christ's hearers, and had received instruction from Him,—a distinguishing favor, which few had, and surely it might be taken as a pledge of distinguishing favor now; 'wouldst thou teach us, and not save us?'

[3.] How their confidence will fail them, and all their pleas be rejected as frivolous. Christ doth not deny the truth of what they pleaded; they had eaten and drunk in his presence, and He had taught in their streets; but they had despised his instruction, and lifted up the heel against Him. Therefore, 1st. He disowns them; 'I know you not; you do not belong to my family. The Lord knows them that are his, but them that are not, He does not know, He has nothing to do with them; 'I know you not whence ye are. Ye are not of Me, not from above, nor branches of my house, of my vine.' 2dly. He discards them; 'Depart from Me.' It is the hell of hell to depart from Christ; the principal part of the misery of the damned. 3dly. He gives them such a character as is the reason of this doom; 'Ye are workers of iniquity. This is their ruin, that, under a pretence of piety, they kept up secret haunts of sin, and did the devil's drudgery in Christ's lively.

[4.] How terrible their punishment will be,—the utmost degree of grief and indignation; and that which causes and contributes to it, is a sight of the happiness of the saved, v. 28. Observe here, [1.] Old-Testament saints are in the kingdom of God; those had benefit by the Messiah, who died before his coming; for they saw his day. [2.] New-Testament sinners will be thrust out of the kingdom of God. It intimates that they will be thrusting in, and will presume on admission, but in vain; they shall be thrust out with shame, as having no part or lot in the matter. [3.] The sight of the saints' glory will be a great aggravation of sinners' misery; they shall thus far see the kingdom of God, that they shall see the prophets in it, whom they hated and despised, and themselves, who thought themselves sure of it, thrust out. This is that at which they will gnash their teeth, Ps. 112: 10.

(4.) Think who are they that shall be saved, notwithstanding; v. 29, 30.

By what Christ had said, it appeared that but few should be saved, of those whom we think most likely, and who bid fairest for it. Yet do not say then that the Gospel is preached in vain, for though Israel be not gathered, Christ will be glorious. Many from all parts of the Gentile world, shall come and be admitted into the kingdom of grace in his world, and of glory in the other. Plainly thus, when we come to heaven, we shall meet a great many there, whom we little thought to meet there, and miss a great many thence, whom we verily expected to find there.

broad way to destruction' into 'the narrow way to life'; that is, a sinner's conversion and reconciliation to God, by repentance and faith in Jesus Christ. Many difficulties must occur in thus 'passing from death unto life': the gate is beset with enemies; and much must be left behind, broken off, broken through, overcome, and attained, in getting in at it; yet without this there can be no salvation. They, therefore, who would be saved, must 'strive to enter in at the strait gate': they must struggle with all their force, and employ all their attention and circumference, as those did who wrestled in the public games, (Marg. Ref. a.) 'Force your way in at the strait gate.' Campbell. To excite them to this, Christ, the Savior and Judge of men, solemnly assured them, that 'many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able.' Some seek admission into the favor of God and eternal happiness, without conversion, or faith in the divine Savior; others seek the blessing in a slothful manner, or in the use of such means as God has never appointed; others, with reserves for their worldly interest, reputation, or sinful pleasures, or for avoiding reproach and persecution. In these and similar ways, many come short of salvation; notwithstanding convictions, temporary seriousness and earnestness, and partial reformation. But, it is by procrastination especially, that men at last 'will seek to enter in, and not be able.'

While life endures, the Master of the house, the Lord Jesus, sits, as it were, at mercy's gate, over which it is written, 'Knock, and it shall be opened to you.' But at length He rises up, and, by cutting off a sinner in his unconverted state, He 'shuts the door' against him, and bars it forever. (Marg. Ref. d, e.—Gen. 7: 16. Matt. 7: 7—11.) Many, therefore, even of those who then heard Christ, would first 'begin to knock' at the gate, and to seek salvation from Him, when it was too late; and whatever presumptuous confidence they had before entertained, or whatever plea they might have to urge, these would in no wise prevail for admission, (16: 24—26. Matt. 3: 7—10; 21—23, 11: 20—24. 25: 41—46.) (23—30.) (Prov. 1: 20—33. Is. 55: 6, 7. Matt. 8: 10—12. 19: 29—30.) In this address our Lord evidently declared to the people, that their admission into life and happiness, or exclusion from them, entirely and absolutely depended on Him alone (24.) Strive. (John 18: 36. 1 Cor. 9: 25. Col. 2: 1. 29. 4: 12. Tim. 6: 12. 2 Tim. 4: 7. Phil. 1: 30. Col. 2: 1. 1 Thes. 2: 2. 22: 44.) The word every where conveys the idea of sharp conflict, with great exertion, and self-denial, and persevering endurance.

[Practical Observations.]

31 ¶ The same day there came certain of the Pharisees, saying unto him, 'Get thee out, and depart hence: for Herod will kill thee.'

32 And he said unto them, Go ye and tell that fox, 'Behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures, to-day, and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected.'

33 Nevertheless, I must walk to-day and to-morrow, and the day following: for I cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem.

34 O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee: how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her are such as had taken pains to get thither, for they came from far; they had passed through different climates, had broken through many difficulties and discouragements; which shows that they who would enter into that kingdom, must strive to enter into it.

Many who stood fair for heaven, came short, and others who seemed cast behind, and thrown quite out of the way, won the prize; therefore it concerns us to strive to enter. Let us be provoked, as Paul desired the Jews might be, to a holy emulation, by the zeal and forwardness of the Gentiles, Rom. 11:14. Shall I be outstripped by my juniors? Shall I, who started first, and stood nearest, miss of heaven, when others, less likely, enter into it? If it be got by striving, why should not I strive?

V. 31—35. Here is,

I. A suggestion to Christ of his danger from Herod, now that He was in Galilee, within Herod's jurisdiction, v. 31. Some think that these Pharisees framed this lie, to drive Him out of Galilee, where He had a great and growing interest, and into Judea, where they knew there were those that really sought his life. But Christ's answer being directed to Herod himself, it should seem that the Pharisees had ground for what they said, and that Herod was enraged against Him and designed Him a mischief, for the honorable testimony he had borne to John Baptist, and to the doctrine of repentance which John preached. Herod was willing wings, and ye would not!

35 Behold, your house is left unto you desolate: and verily I say unto you, 'Ye shall not see me, until the time come when ye shall say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22—30. When we reflect how very few of the immense multitudes of the human species appear to be in the way of salvation, as that is marked out in the Word of God, the very proposal of the question, considered in all its awful importance, causes the soul to recoil appalled from the reflection. Nor will it avail us how few, or how many shall be saved, if we be not of that number; and if we be, we shall at length approve of the appointments of God, in this and in every other respect. Neither will the awful truth, that few comparatively have hitherto been saved, prevent our being of the happy number, if we seek salvation as our grand object, according to the oracles of God. Every unconverted sinner should then 'strive to enter in at the strait gate,' by earnest prayer, by resisting temptations, by avoiding all occasions of committing sin, or silencing his conscience, and hardening his heart, and by attending diligently on all the means of grace: and every one of us should continue thus to labor and wrestle, that we may make our 'calling and election sure,' especially let all men beware of a proud, a slothful, a hypocritical, a partial seeking; and above all, of procrastination. How dreadful will be the disappointment of those, who hoped and intended, at some future time, to enter the strait gate; but who deferred the grand concern, till it became too late, and the door was forever shut against them! In vain will they call Christ, Lord, Lord, and entreat Him to open to them; in vain will they plead, that they heard and entertained his to get rid of Christ out of his dominions; and when he durst not put Him to death, he hoped to frighten Him away by sending Him this threatening message.

II. His disregard of the rage of Herod and the Pharisees, v. 32. In calling Herod a fox, He gives him his true character; for he was subtle as a fox, noted for his craft, and treachery, and baseness, and preying (as they say of a fox) furthest from his own den. And though it be a black and ugly character, yet it did not ill become Christ to give it him, nor was it in Him a violation of that law, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people. For Christ was a Prophet, and prophets always had a liberty of speech in reproving princes and great men. Nay, Christ was more than a prophet, He was a King, He was King of kings, and the greatest of men were accountable to Him, and therefore it became Him to call this proud king by his own name; but it is not to be drawn into an example by us. 'Go, and tell that fox, yea, and this fox too,' (for so it is in the original,) 'that Pharisee, whoever he is that whispers this in my ear, let him know that I do not fear him nor regard his menaces. For,'

1. 'I know that I must die shortly; I expect it and count upon it, the third day; that is, very shortly; my hour is at hand.' Note, it will help us very much above the fear of death, and of them that have the power of death, to make death familiar to us, to expect it, think of it, ministers, and frequented his table: he will utterly disregard their pleas, and refuse all pity to their anguish; while He shall sentence them 'to depart from Him, as workers of iniquity,' whom He never acknowledged to be in the number of his redeemed people: and even the felicity of those, with whom they formerly associated, as well as that of others whom they disdained, will add poignancy to their misery and despair. As there were such persons among our Lord's hearers, and a Judas even among his own apostles, we ought surely to address our congregations in a similar manner; and to enforce our warnings and exhortations by such alarming topics, addressed to them directly, in the second person; and not merely to speak of such characters in a general way, which may be understood to imply our opinion, that none of them are found in our audience. But especially we ought to examine ourselves, and not to take things for granted by an unwarranted confidence, where such infinite interests are at stake. None, however, ought to yield to despondency, either with respect to himself or others; for, 'behold, there are last who shall be first, and first who shall be last,' and, though few of our immediate relations or neighbors should appear to be in the way of salvation, yet there will be others brought from every part of the earth, and the multitude of the saved will in all be found immensely large. Verses 31—33.

(32.) That fox! That subtle, insinuating, and mischievous man, Marg. R. f. r.—Ez. 13: 1—4. (33.) It cannot be, &c.] As John the Baptist and others had been slain elsewhere, it is evident that this sentence must not be taken strictly; it was a general rule, and Jesus, the Messiah, would not be an exception to it. This message was in fact a defiance sent to Herod; but his wickedness in slaying John the Baptist, contrary to the conviction of his own conscience, being added to all his other crimes, rendered it improper for our Lord to show him any regard. (23: 6—12.) 'I know that subtle tyrant, who hath shed the blood of my forerunner, is hunting after my death also; but tell him from me, that my times are set in the eternal counsel of God; and when my prefixed time is accomplished, for my labors and sufferings, I shall, in spite of all the opposition of earth and hell, be perfected, and enjoy my full glory.' Ep. Hall. The word signifies, I am consecrated to my priestly office, by doing a sacrifice for the sins of the world! Why? The offering of this sacrifice, however, was itself a most essential part of our Lord's priestly office; and introductory to the rest, which having finished on earth, He ascended to heaven,' to appear in the presence of God 'for us.' (Heb. 5: 7—10. 9: 11—14. 24—26.) (31.) Herod will, &c.] (Matt. 14: 5.) Rather, Herod willeth, or wills, to kill thee. Will, thus used, is merely an auxiliary; and the clause, as here rendered, properly means, that Herod would put Jesus to death: but this is far from the real import, which is, 'Herod purposes to kill thee.' Herod intended to kill Jesus: but in fact he did not kill Him; but Pilate, who purposed so much, thing, crucified Him.

(32.) Fox! Indeed was he an old fox, since he had now administered the government thirty years, and personated many parts:—that of a servant to Tiberius, a master to the Galileans, a friend to Sejanus, Artabanus, his brothers Archelaus, Philip, the other Herod, all the wishes and interests of each of whom were diametrically opposite to those of the other, and to the wishes and interests of Herod himself.

Weststein, in BLOOMFIELD.

A fox, among the Jews, appears to have been the emblem of a wicked ruler, who united cunning with cruelty, and was always plotting how he might aggrandize himself, by spoiling the people.

CHAP. XIV.

MEALS, on the Sabbath, heals a man who had the dropsy and justifies Himself in so doing, 6-8. By parabases He teaches humility, 9-11; and hospitality to the poor, 12-14. The problem of the great supper, 15-24. The necessity of self-denial, and renouncing the world, in order to be the disciples of Christ, incited and illustrated by similes, 25-33. AND it came to pass, as he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the sabbath-day, that they watched him.

6 Matt. 23: 37-39. Perhaps this was not said now in Galilee, but the evangelist, not designing to bring it in in its proper place, inserts it here, on occasion of Christ's mentioning his being put to death at Jerusalem.

Note, 1. The wickedness of persons and places that, more eminently than others, profess religion and relation to God, is in a particular manner provoking and grieving to the Lord Jesus. How pathetically does He speak of the sin and ruin of that holy city! O Jerusalem! Jerusalem!

2. Those that enjoy great plenty of the means of grace, if not profited by, are often prejudiced against them. They that would not hearken to the prophets, nor welcome those God sent to them, killed and stoned them. If men's corruptions are not conquered, they are provoked.

3. Jesus Christ hath showed Himself willing, freely willing, to receive and entertain poor souls that come to Him, and put themselves under his protection; How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings; with such care and tenderness!

4. Sinners are not protected and provided for by the Lord Jesus, because they will not; I would, I often would, and ye would not. Christ's willingness aggravates sinners' unwillingness, and leaves their blood on their own heads.

5. The house that Christ leaves, is left desolate. The temple, though richly adorned, though hugely frequented, is yet desolate, if Christ have deserted it; He leaves it to them, they had made an idol of it, and let them take it to themselves, and make the best of it, Christ will trouble it no more.

6. Christ justly withdraws from those that drive Him from them. They would not be gathered by Him, and therefore, saith He, Ye shall not see and converse with it, and see it at the door. 'If Herod should kill Me, He will not surprise Me.'

2. 'I know that death will be not only no prejudice to Me, but that it will be my preferment; therefore tell him, I do not fear him; when I die, I shall be perfected, I shall then have finished the hardest part of my undertaking, I shall have completed my business.'—I shall be consecrated. When Christ died, He is said to have sanctified Himself; He consecrated Himself to his priestly office with his own blood.

3. 'I know that neither he nor any one else can kill Me, till I have done my work. Go, and tell him that I value not his impotent rage. I will cast out devils, and do cures, to-day, and to-morrow; that is, 'now and for some little time to come, in spite of him and all his threats. I must walk, I must go on in my intended journey, and it is not in his power to hinder Me.' Note, It is good for us to look on the time we have before us as but a little, that we may thereby be quickened to do the work of the day in its day. And it is a comfort to us, in reference to the power and malice of our enemies, that they can have no power to take us off, as long as God has any work for us to do. The witnesses were not slain till they had finished their testimony.

4. 'I know that Herod can do Me no harm, not only because my time is not yet come, but because the place appointed for my death is Jerusalem, which is not within his jurisdiction. It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem,' that is, 'any where but at Jerusalem.' As a true prophet was put to death, he was prosecuted as a false prophet; none undertook to try prophets, and to judge concerning them, but the great Sanhedrin, which always sat at Jerusalem.

III. His lamentation for, and denunciation of wrath against Jerusalem, v. 34, 35. This we had, Matt. 23: 37-39. Perhaps this was not said now in Galilee, but the evangelist, not designing to bring it in in its proper place, inserts it here, on occasion of Christ's mentioning his being put to death at Jerusalem.

Note, 1. The wickedness of persons and places that, more eminently than others, profess religion and relation to God, is in a particular manner provoking and grieving to the Lord Jesus. How pathetically does He speak of the sin and ruin of that holy city! O Jerusalem! Jerusalem!

2. Those that enjoy great plenty of the means of grace, if not profited by, are often prejudiced against them. They that would not hearken to the prophets, nor welcome those God sent to them, killed and stoned them. If men's corruptions are not conquered, they are provoked.

3. Jesus Christ hath showed Himself willing, freely willing, to receive and entertain poor souls that come to Him, and put themselves under his protection; How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings; with such care and tenderness!

4. Sinners are not protected and provided for by the Lord Jesus, because they will not; I would, I often would, and ye would not. Christ's willingness aggravates sinners' unwillingness, and leaves their blood on their own heads.

5. The house that Christ leaves, is left desolate. The temple, though richly adorned, though hugely frequented, is yet desolate, if Christ have deserted it; He leaves it to them, they had made an idol of it, and let them take it to themselves, and make the best of it, Christ will trouble it no more.

6. Christ justly withdraws from those that drive Him from them. They would not be gathered by Him, and therefore, saith He, Ye shall not see

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 31-35. It does not in general behove us to speak disrespectfully of any who are invested with authority: yet apostates, persecutors, and crafty dissemblers may, on some occasions, be spoken of in their true characters, that men may beware of them; and we must not flatter the wicked, or fear any man, when performing our bounden duty. We too should 'go about doing good,' while our appointed span of life endures; and, in that case, when life expires we shall be perfected in holiness and felicity.—But how black a mark of human depravity was the extraordinary circumstance, of Jerusalem's being the slaughter-house of God's prophets, and the very place where his beloved Son was crucified! Alas! the visible church has generally been the grand scene of persecution; (Note, Rev. 17: 6.) and those whom the Savior has, with persevering tenderness, invited to take shelter under the shadow of his almighty wings, have not only contemptuously refused his kindness, but have hated and persecuted those who brought the invitation! (Note, Matt. 22: 1-10.) Thus men bring upon themselves swift destruction from the presence of the Lord, as well as the forfeiture of all their privileges: but let us shun this fatal rock, and learn thankfully to welcome and to profit by all those, 'who come in the name of the Lord' Jesus, to invite us to partake of his great salvation. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. v. 1. 'An expression similar to the Hebrew, Gen. 43: 25, 32, 34. That it was not unusual with the Jews to have entertainments, and enjoy themselves with hilarity, on the Sabbath, is proved from numerous rabbinical passages produced by Lightfoot and West.

Verse 2.

There was a certain man before Him.] 'Had conveyed himself thither, in hope of a cure. I do not think, as some suppose,) that he [522]

Me, you shall not hear Me, any more,' as Moses said to Pharaoh, when he forbid him his presence, Exod. 10: 28, 29.

7. The judgment of the great day will effectually convince unbelievers that would not now be convinced; 'Then you will say, Blessed is He that cometh, that is, 'you will be glad to be among those that say so, and will not see Me to be the Messiah till then, when it is too late.'

CHAP. XIV. v. 1-6. In this passage, we find,

I. That the Son of man came, eating and drinking, conversing familiarly with all sorts of people; not declining the society of publicans, nor of Pharisees, but accepting the friendly invitations of both; that, if possible, He might do good to both. Here He went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees, a ruler, it may be, and a magistrate, to eat bread on the sabbath-day, v. 1. See how favorable God is to us, that He allows us time, even on 'His own day, for bodily refreshments; how careful we should be not to abuse that liberty, or turn it into licentiousness. Christ went only to eat bread, to take such refreshment as was necessary on the sabbath-day. Our sabbath-meals must, with a particular care, be guarded against all manner of excess. On sabbath-days we must do, as Moses and Jethro did, eat bread before God, (Exod. 18: 12.) and, as is said of the primitive Christians, on the Lord's day, must eat and drink as those that must pray again before we go to rest, that we may not be unfit for that.

II. That He went about, doing good. Wherever He came, He sought opportunities to do good, and not only improved those that fell in his way; here was a certain man before Him, which had the dropsy, v. 2. We do not find that he offered himself, or that his friends offered him to be Christ's patient, but Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and before he called, He answered him. Note, It is a happy thing to be where Christ is, to be present before Him, though we are not presented to Him. This man had the dropsy, it is probable, in a high degree, and probably, he was some relation of the Pharisee's that now lodged in his house.

III. That He endured the contradiction of sinners against Himself; (v. 1.) They watched Him. The Pharisee that invited Him, it should seem, did it with an evil design; if it were so, Christ knew it, and yet went, for He knew how to order his steps with the most subtilty of his observers. Those that are watched, had need to be wary. It was, as Dr. Hammond observes, contrary to all laws of hospitality, to seek advantage against one invited to be your guest, for such a one you have taken under your protection. These lawyers and Pharisees, like the fowler that lies in wait to snare the birds, held their peace, and acted very silently. When Christ asked them whether they thought it lawful to heal on the sabbath-day, (and herein He is said to answer them, for it was an answer was one of the family; because it is said that Christ dismissed him, or let him go, when he was cured, v. 4.)

Verse 4.

And He took him.] 'Some have imagined that Christ led him aside to avoid contention; but the words do not express this; and, as our Lord speaks of the cure both immediately before and after it, there can be no room to imagine He intended to conceal it. Probably the circumstance of taking him by the hand, is mentioned, as an evidence of his condescension.'

5 And answered them, saying, 'Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the sabbath-day?

6 And they could not answer him again to these things.

7 ¶ And he put forth a parable to those which were bidden, when he marked how they chose out the chief rooms; saying unto them,

8 When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room, lest a more honorable man than thou be bidden of him;

9 And he that bade thee and him come and say to thee, Give this man place; and thou begin with shame to take the lowest room.

10 But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee.

11 For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased: and he that

Him, He had not his heart hot within him, nor was his spirit stirred. We must not only not allow any corrupt communication at our tables, such as that of the hypocritical mockers at feasts, but we must go beyond common, harmless talk, and take occasion from God's goodness to speak to his praise, and learn to spiritualize common things. The lips of the righteous should then feed many.

Verses 7-11.

The scribes and Pharisees seem not to have attended even to that semblance of humility, under which numbers veil their pride and ambition, that they may more successfully gratify them; but they openly contended for precedence; probably on the score of their reputation for wisdom, learning, or piety, or on account of their rank and authority; and they chose out for themselves the chief seats, thus claiming the highest respect as justly due to them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 20:45-47. Matt. 23:5-7.) This disgraceful competition, however, though it rose from the same source, was merely a shadow of that spiritual pride and ambition, which has excluded numbers from the kingdom of Christ, produced the most lamentable effects in the visible church, and done immense injury even to many true Christians and ministers. Our Lord, therefore, in a mild, yet firm and decisive manner reproved the vain-glory of the guests, by a parable addressed, as it were, to each of them, the substance of which was taken from their own Scriptures. (Note, Prov. 25:6, 7.) Thus the Christian should deem it honor enough for him, poor, sinful, and rebellious creature, to be admitted among the redeemed in the lowest form, and not contented for eminent stations, authority, or reputation; for such ambition only to their thoughts, and thoughts are words to Jesus Christ,) they would say neither Yea nor Nay, for their design was to inform against Him, not to be informed by Him. They would not say, It was lawful to heal, for then they would preclude themselves from imputing it to Him as a crime: and yet the thing was so self-evident, they could not for shame say it was not lawful. Note, Good men have often been persecuted for doing that which even their persecutors, would they but give their consciences leave to speak out, could not but own to be lawful and good.

IV. That Christ would not be hindered from doing good by the opposition and contradiction of sinners; v. 4. He took him, and healed him, and let him go. Perhaps He took him aside into another room, because He would neither proclaim Himself, such was his humility, nor provoke his adversaries, such was his wisdom, his meekness of wisdom. Note, Though we must not be driven from duty by the malice of our enemies, yet we should order the circumstances of it so as to make it the least offensive. Or, He took him, that is, laid hands on him—embraced him, to cure him. The cure of a dropsy, as much as of any disease, one would think, should be gradual; yet Christ cured even that disease, perfectly cured it in a moment. He then let him go, lest the Pharisees should fall on him for being healed, though he was purely passive: for what absurdities would not such men be guilty of?

V. That our Lord did nothing but what He could justify, to the conviction and confusion of those that quarrelled with Him, v. 5, 6. He still answered their thoughts and made them hold their peace for shame, who before held their peace for subtilty, by an appeal to their own practice, as He had been used to do on such occasions, that He might show them how, in condemning Him, they condemned themselves, v. 5. Observe, It is not so much out of compassion to the poor creature, that they do it, but a concern for their own interest. It is their own ox, or ass, that is worth money; to save this, they will dispense with the law of the Sabbath. Now this evinced their hypocrisy, and that it was not from any real regard to the Sabbath, that they found fault with Christ for healing on the sabbath-day; but really they were angry at the miraculous good works He wrought, the proof He thereby gave of his divine mission, and the interest He thereby gained among the people. Many can easily dispense with that, for their own interest, which they cannot dispense with for God's glory and the good of their brethren. This question silenced them, v. 6. Christ will be justified when He speaks, and every mouth stopped before Him.

V. 14.—Our Lord here sets us an example of profitable, edifying discourse at our tables, when in company with our friends; nay, with strangers, with enemies that watch us. Though the wicked were before Him, He did not keep silence from good, (as David did, Ps. 39:1, 2,) for, notwithstanding the provocation given

Our Lord Jesus was among persons of quality, yet, as One that had not respect of persons, I. He takes occasion to reprove the guests for striving to sit uppermost, and thence gives us a lesson of humility.

1. He observed how these lawyers and Pharisees affected the highest seats, toward the head-end of the table, v. 7. He had charged that sort of men with this in general, ch. 11:43. Here He brings home the charge to particular persons; for Christ will give every man his own. He marked how every man, as he came in, got as near the best seat as he could. Note, Even in the common actions of life, Christ's eye is upon us, and He marks what we do, not only in our religious assemblies, but at our tables, and makes remarks upon it.

2. He observed how those who were thus aspiring, often exposed themselves, and came off with a slur; whereas those who were modest, and seated themselves in the lowest seats, often gained respect by it, v. 8-11. (1.) Those who, when they come in, assume the highest seats, may perhaps be degraded. Note, Instead of being proud that so many give place to us, we should be humbled, that we must give place to so many; and that so many are more honorable than we. The master of the feast will marshal his guests. Pride will have shame, and at last a fall. (2.) Those who, when they come in, content themselves with the lowest seats, are likely to be preferred. 'The master of the feast will be so just to thee, as not to keep thee at the lower end of the table, because thou wast so modest as to seat thyself there.' Note, The way to rise high, is, to begin low; and this recommends a man to those about Him. 'They will see thee to be an honorable man, beyond what at first they thought; and honor appears the brighter for shining out of obscurity.' They will likewise see thee to be a humble man, which is the greatest honor of all. Our Savior here refers to that advice of Solomon, (Prov. 25:6, 7.) Stand not in the place of great men, for better it is that it be said unto thee, Come up hither, than that thou shouldst be put lower.' And Lightfoot quotes a parable out of one of the rabbins, somewhat like this, 'Three men were bidden to a feast; one sat highest, For, said he, I am a prince; the other next, For, said he, I am a wise man; the other lowest, For, said he, I am a humble man. The king seated the humble man highest, and put the prince lowest.'

3. He applies this generally, and would have us all learn not to mind high things, but to content ourselves with mean things, because pride and ambition are disgraceful, but humility and self-denial really honorable. We see it in other instances, that a man's pride will bring him low, but honor shall uphold the humble in spirit, and before honor is humility.

II. He takes occasion to reprove the master of the feast, for inviting so many rich people, who had wherewithal to dine very well at home, when he should rather have invited the poor, or which was all one, have sent portions to them for whom nothing is prepared, and who could not afford themselves a good meal's meat. See Neh. 8:10. Our Savior here teaches us, that the using of what we have, in works of charity, is better, and will turn to a better tends to disgrace. (Notes, 22:24-27. Acts 8:18-24.) But he ought, in unaffected humility, to take the lowest station, or the meanest service, preferring others to himself; (Notes, Rom. 12:9-13, v. 10. Phil. 2:1-4, v. 4.) and in due time he will, in this manner, obtain 'the honor which cometh from God'; and he will have the approbation of angels and men at the day of judgment. For it is a universal rule of the Lord's dealings with every individual, in respect of the various incidents and actions of their lives, that 'He abases those who exalt themselves,' and advances 'those who abase themselves,' as conscious of their actual and comparative worthlessness, and as willing to be little, despised, neglected, and subjected to others. (Notes, 18:9-14, v. 14. Matt. 18:1-6. 20:24-28. 23:11, 12. Jam. 4:4-6. 1 Pet. 5:5-7.)

(7.) Chose, &c.] 'When custom and law have regulated and settled places in public assemblies, a man who is obliged to attend, may take the place which belongs to him, without injury to himself or to others: when nothing of this nature is settled, the law of humility and the love of order are the only judges of what is proper. To take the highest place, when it is not our due, or obstinately to refuse it, when justly offered, is vanity.'

account, than using it in works of generosity, and in magnificent house-keeping.

1. 'Covet not to treat the rich; (p. 12.) invite not thy friends, and brethren, and neighbors that are rich.' This does not prohibit the entertaining of such; there may be occasion for it, for the cultivation of friendship among relations and neighbors. But, (1.) 'Do not make a common custom of it; spend as little as thou canst that way, that thou mayst not disabuse thyself to lay out in a much better way, in almsgiving. Thou wilt find it very expensive and troublesome; one feast for the rich will make a great many meals for the poor.' Solomon saith, He that giveth to the rich, shall surely come to want, Prov. 22: 16. 'Give' (saith Pliny, Epist.) 'to thy friends, but let it be to thy poor friends, not to those that need thee not.' (2.) 'Be not proud of it.' Many make feasts, only to make a show, as Ahasuerus did; (Esth. 1:3, 4.) and it is no reputation to them, they think, if they have not persons of quality to dine with them, and thus rob their families, to please their fancies. (3.) 'Aim not at being paid again in your own coin.' This is that which our Savior blames in making such entertainments; 'You commonly do it in hopes that you will be invited by them, and so a recompense will be made you; you will be gratified with such dainties and varieties as you treat your friends with, and this will feed your sensuality and luxury, and you will be no real gainer at last.'

2. 'Be forward to relieve the poor; (p. 13, 14.) When thou makest a feast, instead of furnishing thyself with what is rare and nice, get thy table spread with a competency of plain and wholesome meat, which will not be so costly, and invite the poor and maimed, such as have nothing to live upon, nor are able to work for their living. These are objects of charity, they want necessities; furnish them, and they will recompense thee with their prayers; they will commend thy provisions, which the rich, if they be, will despise. They will go away, and thank God for thee, when the rich will go away, and reproach thee. Say not that thou art a loser because they cannot recompense thee, thou art so much out of pocket; no, it is so much set out to the best interest, on the best security, for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.' There will be a resurrection, a future state of the just; a state of happiness reserved for them in the other world: and we may be sure that the charitable will then be remembered, for alms are righteousness. They may not be rewarded in this world, but they shall in no wise lose their reward. The longest voyages make the richest returns, and they will be no losers, but unspeakable gainers, by having their recompense adjourned till the resurrection.

V. 15-24. Here is another discourse of our Savior, in which he spiritualizes the feast He was invited to; which is another way of keeping up good discourse in the midst of common actions.

I. The occasion of the discourse was given by one of the guests, who, when Christ was giving rules about feasting, said to him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God, (p. 15.) which, some tell us, was a saying commonly used among the rabbins. Note, Even those that are not of ability to carry on good discourse themselves, ought to put in a word now and then, to countenance it, and help it forward. What this man said, was a plain and acknowledged truth, and quoted very appositely now they were sitting at meat; for it is good for us, when receiving the gifts of God's providence, to pass through them to the consideration of the gifts of his grace, those better things. This thought will be very reasonable when we are partaking of bodily refreshments; Blessed are they that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God, (1.) In the kingdom of grace, in the kingdom of the Messiah, which was expected

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11-11. We must not even allow the hospitality of those who appear friendly, to interrupt us in our duty, or induce us to be unfaithful; though the contrary conduct will probably, on some occasions, draw on us the censure of rudeness or ingratitude.—It requires reiterated and particular instruction, to bring men to understand the proper connection of piety and mercy, in the observance of the Sabbath; and the wisdom that is from above is requisite to teach us such meek yet firm perseverance in well-doing, amidst malicious and watchful opposers, as may stop their mouths, even when their hearts are not changed.—Ministers ought to copy Christ, in embracing every opportunity of introducing instructive discourse, in all companies to which they are admitted; and in taking occasion to make useful remarks, whenever any fair opening is given for them.—No disposition of the depraved heart of man is more odious and foolish, or more universal, than pride. Yet the vain ambition of honor, which is not a man's due, exposes him to contempt; whilst modesty commonly engages respect and attention. It is indeed far more honorable for a man to begin low, and to be advanced by the verdict of others, than to assume a rank and advance pretensions, from which he is likely to be degraded with shame and contempt. But when we are made thoroughly acquainted with our own hearts, we shall proportionably be disinclined to aspire at chief places, and shall be contented and thankful for the most obscure; nay, made willing to see others honored, and ourselves neglected and slighted in the comparison. This is in reality a far better way of being made useful and honorable, in the Lord's due time, than to aspire after high-sounding titles, or places of authority, popularity and precedence; which cannot be coveted, without forgetting what poor, guilty, polluted, weak, and foolish creatures we are.

(11.) He that humbleth himself shall be exalted. [Not necessarily so among all sorts of men. Among ordinary people, humility is not so much regarded, and a man may humble himself long enough before they will exalt him; that will put him down lower, and keep him down, when he is so. Thus it is very often among vulgar people, upon whom the pearl of humility is but ill bestowed. But among those of better quality, and of more refined education, and who have a juster and more rectified sense of things, it is far otherwise. There the jewel is understood, and valued according to its worth. There the humble finds his due respect, and the lower he depresses himself, the more will he be exalted; and with reason, for humility, besides the excellency of its temper, and the greatness of the virtue, shows a good understanding, and a right judgment of a man's self, and so entitles him to respect; which men are also more willing to pay to the humble man, because he is so little just to himself.]

Norris, in BLOOMFIELD.

Verses 12-14.

The Pharisee had probably prepared an expensive entertainment for the company; though this was on the sabbath-day, and must have been attended with some labor; for perhaps the Pharisees were as ostentatious in their feasts, as in their fasts. Our Lord therefore saw it proper to point out the criminality of the practice; and He counselled his host, when He made a dinner or a supper, not to invite his 'friends, or relations, or rich neighbors,' but on the contrary to invite the poor, and those who, by divers bodily infirmities, were incapable of procuring the necessities or comforts of life. It is not to be supposed that Jesus meant, absolutely and universally, to prohibit men from entertaining their wealthy friends, relations, and neighbors; and poor relations are as proper to be invited as other poor persons; yet they, who are most applauded for their useless generosity in this respect, are seldom very eminent for real charity, not always for strict morality; and our Lord shows his disciples a more excellent way. The profusion occasioned by feasting the rich, serves to gratify a man's pity and pride, and the sensual appetites of his friends, who in return are tempted to run into similar extravagance, of which the consequences are often very fatal, and it renders a man incapable of relieving the poor, in any adequate degree. Such expenses cannot be incurred from love to God, or regard to his authority, favor, or glory; therefore no recompense can be expected from Him: and human applause, or a similar banquet in return, is the only reward of them. (Marg. Ref. p. q. 6: 27-36. Prov. 22: 16. Matt. 6: 1-4.) But when a man, from proper motives, expends his wealth in relieving the distressed and indigent, he derives the greatest satisfaction imaginable from this use of it, and his gracious Lord will abundantly reward it in another world. It certainly is not meant, that God will 'recompense, at the resurrection of the just,' a proud and unbelieving liberality to the poor; but our Lord spoke for the instruction of his disciples in every age; and the less they spend in 'conformity to the world,' by luxurious feasting of the rich, the more they will have to employ in feeding the poor, and in all those fruits of faith and love, which are by Christ Jesus to the praise and glory of God. (Marg. Ref. r-t.) How clearly does it appear, that a future state of retribution was a prominent article of the general or popular creed, among the Jews at this time!

now shortly to be set up. Christ promised his disciples that they should eat and drink with Him in his kingdom. They that partake of the Lord's supper, eat bread in the kingdom of God. (2.) In the kingdom of glory, at the resurrection. The happiness of heaven is an everlasting feast; blessed are they that shall sit down at that table, whence they shall rise no more.

II. The parable our Lord put forth on this occasion, v. 16, &c. Christ joins with the good man in what he said; "It is very true, Blessed are they that shall partake of the privileges of the Messiah's kingdom. But who are they that shall enjoy that privilege? You Jews, who think to have the monopoly of it, will generally reject it, and the Gentiles will be the greatest sharers in it." This He shows by a parable; for, if He had spoken it plainly, the Pharisees would not have borne it.

Now in this parable we may observe,

1. The free grace and mercy of God, shining in the Gospel of Christ; it appears, (1.) In the rich provision He has made for poor souls, v. 16. There is that in Christ and the grace of the Gospel, which, when the soul feels its need, will be as food and a feast to it. It is called a supper, because in those countries supper-time was the chief feasting-time, when the business of the day was over. The manifestation of gospel-grace to the world was the evening of the world's day; and the fruition of the fullness of that grace in heaven is reserved for the evening of our day. (2.) In the gracious invitation given us to come and partake of this provision. Here is, [1.] A general invitation given; He bade many. Christ invited the whole nation and people of the Jews to partake of the benefits of His Gospel. There is provision enough for as many as come; it was prophesied of as a feast for all people, Isa. 25: 6. [2.] A particular memorandum given, when the supper-time was at hand; the servant was sent round to put them in mind of it, v. 17. When the Spirit was poured out, and the gospel-church planted, those who before were invited, were more closely pressed to come in presently. This call is now given us; "All things are now ready, now is the accepted time; it is now, and has not been long, it is now, and will not be long; a season of grace soon over; therefore come now, and delay not; accept the invitation; believe yourselves welcome; eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved."

2. The cold entertainment the grace of the Gospel meets, v. 18. One would have expected they should all with one consent have come to a good supper, when so kindly invited to it; yet, on the contrary, they all found some pretence or other to snuff off their attendance. This bespeaks the general neglect of the Jewish nation to accept Christ's offers of grace, and the contempt they put on the invitation. It speaks also the backwardness of most people to close with the gospel-call. They cannot for shame avow their refusal, but they all straightway (as some supply,) or unanimously, (as others,) desire to be excused; they can give an answer extempore, and with one voice.

(1.) Here were two that were purchasers, in such haste to go and see their purchases, that they could not find time to go to this supper: one had purchased land, which was represented to him to be a good bargain, and he must needs go and see whether it was so or no; his heart was so much on the enlarging of his estate, that he could neither be civil to his friend nor kind to himself. Note, Those that have their hearts full of the world, have their ears deaf to the gospel-invitation. But what a frivolous excuse! He might have deferred going to see his piece of ground till the next day, and have found it in the same place and plight it was now in, if he had so pleased. Another had purchased stock for his land; five yoke of oxen for the plough, and must just now go and try whether they be fit for his purpose. The former intimates inordinate complacency in the world, this inordinate care and concern about it; both which keep people from Christ, and intimate a preference given to the body above the soul, to the things of time above those of eternity. Note, It is very criminal, when called to any duty, to make excuses for neglect of it: it is a sign that there are convictions that it is duty, but no inclination to it. The things here, that were the matter of the excuses, were, little things, and inconsiderable in themselves; yet even such, when the heart is too much set on them, prove fatal hindrances in religion. It is hard so to manage our worldly affairs, that they may not divert us from spiritual pursuits; and this ought to be our great care.

(2.) Here was one that was newly married, and could not leave his wife to go out to supper, no, not for once, v. 20. He pretends that he cannot, when the truth is, he will not. Thus many pretend inability for the duties of religion, when really they have an aversion to them. It is true, he that was married, was excused by the law from going to war for the first year, (Deut. 24: 5.) but would that excuse him from going up to the feasts of the Lord, which all the males were yearly to attend? Much less will it excuse him from the gospel-feast, of which ble, seems to have alluded to the satisfactions to be enjoyed in the days of the Messiah, under the figure of "eating bread in the kingdom of God;" though the thought might occur to him, from what our Lord had spoken of "the resurrection of the just," "Eating bread" was a common expression for any kind of meal, however plentiful or even luxurious; and it is probable, that the man entertained low and carnal expectations concerning the kingdom of God. (Marg. Ref. u.) Our Lord, therefore, to show him how little the blessings to be conferred by the Messiah, would prove suited to the taste of the Jews in general, and how generally they would refuse them, thus describing their present and future conduct respecting his Gospel, spoke the parable here recorded. (Marg. Ref. v.) Prov. 9: 1-5, Isa. 25: 1-5, 55: 1-7, 3 Matt. 22: 1-14. The 'great supper' represented the plentiful provision made for the souls of men in the redemption of Christ; the previous invitation denotes the promises and prophecies of his salvation, to the Jews of old, the ministry of John the Baptist, and that of Christ Himself and his apostles. The servants being sent to call those who had been bidden, when 'all things were ready,' may signify the preaching of the apostles and evangelists after Christ's ascension. The invited persons all 'with one consent' desiring to be excused, though on different pretences, may represent the general rejection of the Gospel by the Jewish nation, especially by their rulers, teachers, and Pharisees; the servants being then sent forth into the streets and lanes of the city, to call in the poor, lame, and blind, may intimate the success of the Gospel among the publicans, and common people of the Jews; and among those, who were dispersed in other countries, and the proselyted Gentiles; and when the servants were sent out to 'the highways and hedges,' to fetch in the poor strangers and travellers, the calling of the Gentiles seems to have been principally intended, with whom the church has since been chiefly replenished: while the Jews, who were first invited, are, through their unbelief, excluded from it. (Marg. Ref. b-l. n.) The whole parable, however, may be applied to the preaching of the Gospel, and the reception which it meets with in every age. The excuses, here stated, were all taken from things lawful in themselves; yet from the manner in which they were attended to, they became the occasion of the greatest contempt being shown to the feast and to Him who made it. The man, who pleaded

'that he had married a wife, and therefore could not come,' is supposed by some, to have meant that his own marriage-feast was fixed for the same time; but as the marriage was past, the feast also may be supposed to have been over. It shows, however, that a carnal mind gives every thing the preference to Christ and his salvation, instead of using all in entire subserviency to them. Indeed all these excuses, thus pointed out, are intended to teach us, that contempt of spiritual blessings, and inordinate attachment to worldly objects, are the real causes of men's negligence and procrastination in religious matters; and the circumstances of those who 'desired to be excused,' when compared with the poverty of such as were the guests at last, especially of those who, pride and self-sufficiency are incompatible with the faith of the Gospel. The servants were ordered 'to compel' those 'from the highways and hedges to come in.' It would be absurd to understand this of compulsive force, which would be a strange way of bringing men to a banquet, though great numbers have thus explained it! and this proves that scriptural arguments for persecution are not to be found. It shows also that the objections against the doctrine of 'special grace,' as if inconsistent with free agency, are wholly groundless; unless the inward blessing of God, on proper means, producing willingness where it did not before exist, inclining the heart and so preventing us that we may have a good will, be more inconsistent with free agency, than urgent and pressing invitations to a feast are. (Notes. Ps. 10: 5, Phil. 2: 12, 13.) It might, however, be supposed that poor travellers, or beggars, would not readily be convinced that the feast was intended for them; and therefore repeated, pressing invitations would be peculiarly proper; and thus our Lord would have his ministers use most earnest and affectionate invitations, persuasions, and exhortations, and whatever can convince the understanding, or affect the heart, or give encouragement; especially when they address those who, by the greatness of their guilt, may be tempted to despair of mercy. (Marg. Ref. m.)

(15.) Eat bread. 'Shall feast. To eat bread is a well-known Hebrew idiom for to share in a repast, whether it be at a common meal, or at a sumptuous feast. The word bread is not understood as suggesting either the scantiness or the meanness of the fare.'

came and snewed his lord these things. Then the master of the house, being angry, said to his servant, 'Go out quickly into the streets and lanes of the city, and bring in hither the poor, and the maimed, and the halt, and the blind.'

22 And the servant said, Lord, 'it is done as thou hast commanded, and yet there is room.'

25 And the Lord said unto the servant, 'Go out into the highways, and hedges, and compel them to come in, that my house may be filled.'

24 For I say unto you, that none of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper.

the other were but types. Note, Our affection to our relations often proves a hindrance to us in our duty to God. He might have gone and taken his wife with him, they would both have been welcome.

3. The account brought to the master of the feast, of the affront put on him by his friends whom he had invited, who now showed how little they valued him, (v. 21.) for though they had timely notice, a good while before, that they might order their affairs accordingly, yet were they engaged to some other business. Note, Ministers must give account of their success: none at the throne of grace; if they see of the travail of their soul, they must go to God with their thanks; if they labor in vain, with their complaints: hereafter at the judgment-seat of Christ; as witnesses against those who persist and perish in unbelief, to prove they were fairly invited; and for those who accepted the call, Behold, I and the children thou hast given me. The apostle urges this as a reason why people should give ear to the word of God sent them by his ministers; for they watch for your souls as those that must give account, Heb. 13:17.

4. The master's just resentment of this affront, v. 21. Note, The ingratitude of those that slight Gospel offers, and the contempt they put upon the God of heaven thereby, are a very great provocation to Him, and justly. Abused mercy turns into the greatest wrath. Their doom (v. 24.) was like the doom of ungrateful Israel, when they despised the pleasant land: God swore in his wrath, that they should not enter into his rest. Note, Grace despised is grace forfeited, like Esau's birthright. They that will not have Christ when they may, shall not when they would. Even those bidden, if they slight the invitation, shall be forbidden; when the door is shut, the foolish virgins will be denied entrance.

5. The care taken to furnish the table with guests, as well as meat. 'Go,' (saith he to the servants,) 'go first into the streets and lanes of the city, and invite to the merchants, or the tradesmen; they will desire to be excused; but invite those that will be glad to come, bring in hither the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind; pick up the common beggars.' The servants object not, that such guests will be a disparagement to the master and his house: for they knew his mind, and soon gather an abundance of such, v. 22. Many Jews are brought in, not scribes and Pharisees, such as Christ was now at dinner with, who thought themselves most likely to be guests at the Messiah's table, but publicans and sinners, these are the poor and the maimed. But yet there is room for more guests, and provision enough for them all. 'Go, then, secondly, into the highways and hedges; go out into the country, and pick up the vagrants, or those that are returning now in the evening from their work in the field, and compel them to come in, not by force of arms but of arguments; be earnest with them: convince them that the invitation is sincere, and not a banter; they will be shy and moment, and will hardly believe they shall be welcome; therefore be importunate with them, and do not leave them till you have prevailed with them.' This refers to the calling of the Gentiles, to whom the apostles were to turn, when the Jews refused the offers, and with them the church was filled.

Now observe here, (1.) The provision made for precious souls in the Gospel of Christ, shall appear not to have been made in vain; for if some reject it, yet others will thankfully accept it. Christ comforts Himself with this, that, though Israel be not gathered, yet He shall be glorious, as a Light to the Gentiles, Isa. 54:5, 6. God will have a church in the world, though there are those that are uncircumcised; for the unbelief of man shall not make the promise of God of no effect. (2.) Those that are very poor and low in the world, shall be as welcome to Christ as the rich and great; nay, and many times the Gospel has greatest success among those that labor under worldly disadvantages, as the poor, and bodily infirmities, as the maimed, the halt, and the blind. Christ here plainly refers to what He had said just before, v. 13. For Christ's condescensions and compassions toward the poor, should engage ours. (3.) Many times the Gospel has the greatest success among those least likely to become the subject of it. Publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of God before scribes and Pharisees; so that the last shall be first, and the first last. Let us not be confident concerning those who are forward, nor despair of such as are least promising. (4.) Christ's ministers must be both very expeditious and very importunate, in inviting to the gospel-feast; 'Go out quickly, (v. 21.) lose no time, because all things are now ready. Call them to come to-day, while it is called to-day. And compel them to come in, by accosting them kindly, and drawing them with the cords of a man, and the bands of love.' Nothing can be more absurd than fetching an

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 12—24. Would any unbiassed observer of mankind have supposed, that Christ had laid down such a rule for the conduct of all his disciples, as we here meet with? (Note, 12—14.) Whilst so many prefer the vain commendation or customs of the world, or an interchange of festive indulgence, to the approbation of Christ; let us observe his precept of feasting 'the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind,' from love to Him, and to them for his sake; and remember, that it is peculiarly blessed to do good to those who cannot recompense us, and to labor in those services for which we receive nothing from man, (6: 27—36, v. 35.)—Let us also consider the example of Christ, as a comment on this precept: He too has 'made a great supper,' by dying on the cross for our sins, that He might rescue us from eternal destruction, and feast us with holy consolations, and substantial, enduring felicity. Was this rich provision made for the wise and the righteous? By no means; but for sinners, rebels, and enemies to God; for the 'poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind.' Indeed, many are invited; yea, many are ready to say, 'Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God!' But the poor in spirit, the broken-hearted sinner, alone will relish this spiritual feast: (Matt. 5: 3.) and while the servants, from age to age, are employed to invite guests, and to assure 'them that all things are ready,' instead of thankfully accepting the invitation, even they, who do not proceed to greater instances of contempt and enmity, begin with one consent to make excuse, and desire leave to continue in sin, at least for some time longer. They have no desire after this feast, or due regard to Him who prepared it; and so are not fearful of being excluded. Not only do men destroy their souls, for great secular advantages, or by gross outward sins; but they so misplace even lawful things, and act so carnally even in the ordinary affairs of life, that they perish by such matters, as might have been attended to with far superior advantage, had they sought first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.—'Alas! that men should be so sensibly alive to their little temporal interests, and yet so careless where eternal happiness or misery are at stake! But 'the god of this world blinds their minds,' and renders them insensible to the awful consequences of their procrastination, till the Lord gives sentence against them; 'that,' after the repeated invitations which they have rejected, 'they shall never taste of his supper.'—These things grieve the hearts of faithful ministers, who go and complain to their Lord, of the folly and perverseness of their hearers; but, though He is angry with obstinate unbelievers, He will not suffer the feast to be provided in vain. Oh! that He would inspire many ministers with that zeal and love, which would animate them to 'compel sinners to come in,' and to be earnest, affectionate and solemn, in calling the vilest of transgressors to repentance, and faith in Christ! But alas! some, mistaking God's secret decrees for their rule of duty, are thus restrained from exhorting, inviting, and persuading sinners at all; and far greater numbers are contented with a cold, unmeaning harangue, as if they did not wish to be thought in earnest, in calling men to that feast, for which, it is to be feared, they themselves have no appetite. (Prov. 1: 21—33. P. O. 20—33. 9. Matt. 22: 1—14.) SCOTT.

(23.) Compel, &c. 'True religion imports an entire change of the heart, and must be founded in the inward conviction of the mind; or it is impossible it should be what yet it must be, a reasonable service. Let it only be considered, what violence and persecution can do toward producing such an inward conviction. A man might as reasonably expect to bind an immortal spirit with a cord, or to beat down a wall with an argument, as to convince the understanding by threats and tortures. Let it ever be the glory of the Protestant church, that it discountenances and abhors all persecution or religious argument from hence for compelling men's consciences, nay, for compelling men against their consciences, in matters of religion; 'You shall receive the Lord's supper, or you shall be fined and imprisoned, and ruined in your estate.' Certainly nothing like this was the compulsion here meant, but only that of reason and love; the weapons of our warfare are not carnal. (5.) Though many be brought to partake the benefits of the Gospel, still there is room for more; for the riches of Christ are unsearchable and inexhaustible; there is in Him enough for all, and for each; and the Gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves. (6.) Christ's house, though large, shall at last be filled: it will be so when the number of the elect is completed, and as many as were given Him are brought to Him.

I. How zealous people were in their attendance on Christ, v. 25. Here was a mixt multitude, like that which went with Israel out of Egypt; such we must expect there will always be in the church, and it will therefore be necessary that ministers should carefully separate between the precious and the vile.

Christ, must count upon the worst, and prepare accordingly.

1. He tells them what the worst is. They expected that He should say, 'If any man come to me, and be my disciple, He shall have wealth and honor'; but He tells them quite the contrary. They must come thoroughly weaned from all their creature-comforts, and dead to them, so as cheerfully to part with them rather than quit their interest in Him, v. 26. A man cannot be Christ's disciple—he is not sincere, he will not be constant and persevering, unless he loves Christ better than any thing in this world, and be willing to part with it, when Christ may be glorified by his parting with it, or he put into a better capacity of serving Christ. Thus Abraham parted with his own country, and Moses with Pharaoh's court. Mention is not made here of houses and lands; philosophy will teach a man to look on those with contempt; but Christianity carries it higher. Every good man loves his relations; and yet, if he be a disciple of Christ, he must comparatively hate them, must love them less than Christ, as Leah is said to be hated, when Rachel was better loved. Not that their persons must be in any degree hated, but our comfort and satisfaction in them must be lost and swallowed up in our love to Christ, as Levi's was, when he said to his father, I have not seen him, Deut. 33:9. When our duty to our parents comes in competition with our evident duty to Christ, we must give Christ the preference. If we must either deny Christ, or

Verses 25-27.

As our Lord journeyed towards Jerusalem, great multitudes flocked about Him; but He knew that they had generally very erroneous notions of his kingdom, and were not prepared to submit to the losses and privations, or to encounter the various dangers and difficulties, which certainly awaited his true disciples. He therefore turned Himself, and addressed them in a manner, which was apparently calculated to drive them from Him. (Note, Josh. 24:19.) Men are in general expressly required to honor and to love their relations, and to take care of their own lives. But this love and regard must be entirely subordinated to the love of Christ; and they must give his favor, will, and glory, a decided preference to the approbation, interests, or comfort of their dearest relatives. (Marg. Ref. q—Notes, Gen. 29:30, 31. Deut. 13:6-11. P. O. Note, 33:9.) Nay, at some times they may be called to be, as it were, cruel to themselves, (in respect to temporal life,) as well as to their friends; exposing themselves to persecution, torture and death, if they will obey Christ. So that unless they are habitually prepared, by a deep sense of their need of his salvation, and of their immense obligations to Him, to venture every consequence, and meet any extremity rather than forsake Him, they 'cannot be his disciples'; for in that case they will refuse to bear their cross and go after Him. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 10:37-39. 16:24-28. Mark 8:31-33. 2 Cor. 5:16.)

(28.) Hate not, &c. 'Owing thing is said to be loved, another hated, in Scripture, when the former is much preferred; and especially when, out of regard to it, the latter is neglected and forsaken. Compare Gen. 29:31. Deut. 21:15-17. Mal. 1:3. Rom. 9:13. Matt. 6:24.' DODDIDGE.

Verses 28-33.

To become the disciple of Christ implies a declaration of war against Satan, sin, and this evil world, which are far too powerful for any man to withstand in his own strength; unless a sinner therefore be led to such a conviction of his own weakness, and of the power of his enemies, as to seek help from God, he will never stand his ground; and in all cases, the warfare will be attended with so many hardships, perils, and losses, that if a man be not aware of them, and instructed how to support them, he will never be able to 'continue to the end.' Though it is, therefore, desperate for him to remain in his present state of subjection to his enemies, yet it will rather make the matter worse, for him to take up a mere profession of the Gospel, without that sincerity, humility, and entire dependence on Christ, which alone can give him victory in the conflict. In like manner, 'whosoever he be of you,' said Jesus, 'that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple.' (Marg. Ref. a.) It would not in general consist with a man's duty, to leave his business and relatives, or to quit possession of his estate; but he must be prepared for this, whenever the commandment or the providence of God may call him to it. In this way a professed disciple will be repeatedly put to the trial; he will be called on, in steadily acting according to his principles and conscience, to blast his opening prospects of preferment, reputation, or riches; to renounce worldly pleasures; to forego relative comforts and agreeable friendships; and to bear losses, reproaches, and various hardships, for the sake of Christ; and in times of fierce persecution, (such as were at hand when this was spoken,) he may be required to renounce his country, friends, and possessions, to become an exile or a captive, and to part with his liberty or his life; otherwise he cannot follow Christ as his true disciple. (Matt. 16:24-28. 19:16-22. Phil. 3:5-11.) The judgment and disposition of a man for every Christian must possess: these will habitually be evinced in inferior concerns; and, when it becomes necessary, God will strengthen him, and enable him to bear the greatest extremities for his sake. Many things may hereafter be expedient and useful, which are not essential to being a Christian; but this decided preference of Christ to the whole world, and to life itself, when placed in competition with Him, is the very heart, or the most vital part, of Christianity. (Matt. 13:44-46.)

(Marg. Ref.—Matt. 5:13. Mark 9:43-50.) Without the preparation of heart above described, professed Christians, or hearers, can be no real credit or advantage to the church, or to the world; and after a temporary profession they generally decline, till they totally apostatize, and become the most worthless of men; and as this subject is of universal importance, it demands the serious attention of every one 'that hath ears to hear.' (Marg. Ref. c.) It is evident, that 'salt' is here spoken of in popular language, according to the uses which are made of it in common life, and not as a chemist would define it; and that the common opinion, that the residuum, when the saline particles were separated, was of no use for manure, or any other purpose, was mentioned merely by way of illustrating the subject. It is clear, that 'salt may lose its savor; and that true Christians might lose the principle of divine life, unless God have engaged to preserve it; (Notes, 22:31-34. 1 Pet. 1:3-5.) but in respect of all those mentioned in Scripture, who became like 'salt which hath lost its savor,' some intimation is annexed that there was previous; a radical defect: 'No root in themselves,' 'no oil in the vessel.' 'They went out from us, because they were not of us.' (Jer. 32:39-41. Ez. 3:20, 21. Matt. 13:20-22. 22:1-14. 26:1-13. John 16:2, 6-8. 1 John 2:18, 19.)

we love better, Christ or our relations and lives; yet even in days of peace, this matter is sometimes brought to the trial. Those that decline the service of Christ, and opportunities to converse with Him, and are ashamed to confess Him, for fear of disobliging a relation or friend, or losing a customer, give cause to suspect that they love them better than Christ.

They must come willing to bear the cross, v. 27. Though the disciples of Christ are not all crucified, yet they all bear their cross, as if they counted upon being crucified. They must be content to be put into an ill name, and to be loaded with infamy and disgrace; for no name is more ignominious than the gibbet-bearer. He must bear his cross, and come after Christ; that is, he must bear it in the way of his duty, whenever it lies in that way. He must bear it when Christ calls him to it; and in bearing it, he must have an eye to Christ, and fetch encouragements from Him, and live in hope of a recompense with Him.

2. He bids them consider it. Joshua obliged the people to consider what they did when they promised to serve the Lord, Josh. 24: 19. It is better never to begin than to proceed; and therefore before we begin, we must consider what it is to proceed. This is to act rationally, and the cause of Christ will bear a scrutiny. This considering of the case is necessary to perseverance, especially in suffering times; and its necessity is illustrated by two similitudes, showing that we must consider both the expenses and the perils of our religion.

When we make a profession of religion, we are like a man that undertakes to build a tower, and therefore must consider the expense of it, v. 28-30. And he must be sure to count upon a great deal more than his workmen tell him it will cost. Let him compare the charge with his purse, lest he be laughed at for beginning to build what he is not able to finish. Note, [1.] All that take upon them a profession of religion, undertake to build, as it were, a tower. Let them then begin low, and lay the foundation deep, lay it on the rock, and make sure work, and then aim as high as heaven. [2.] Those that intend to build this tower, must sit down, and count the cost; let them consider, it will cost them the mortifying of their sins, even the most beloved lusts, it will cost them a life of self-denial and watchfulness, and a constant course of holy duties; it may, perhaps, cost them their reputation among men, their estates and liberties, and all that is dear to them in this world, even life itself. And if it cost us all this, what is it in comparison with what it cost Christ to purchase the advantages of religion for us, which come to us without money and without price? [3.] Many that begin to build this tower, do not persevere in it, and it is their folly; they have not courage and resolution, have not a rooted, fixed principle, and so bring nothing to pass. It is true, we have none of us in ourselves sufficient to finish this tower; but Christ hath said, My grace is sufficient for thee, and that grace shall not be wanting to any who seek for, and use it. [4.] Nothing is more shameful than for him that has begun well in religion to break off; every one will justly mock him, as having lost all his labor hitherto, for want of perseverance. We lose the things we have wrought; (2 John 8.) and all we have done and suffered, is in vain, Gal. 3: 4.

When we undertake to be Christ's disciples, we are like a man that goes to war, and therefore must consider the hazard of it, and the difficulties to be encountered, v. 31, 32. Note, [1.] The state of a Christian in this world, is a military state. Is not the Christian life a warfare? We have many passes in our way, that must be disputed with dint of sword; nay, we must fight every step we go, so restless are our spiritual enemies in their opposition. [2.] We ought to consider whether we can endure the hardness which a good soldier of Christ must count upon, before we enlist under Christ's banner; whether we are able to encounter the forces of hell and earth, which come against us fully armed and strong. [3.] Of the two, it is better to make the best terms we can with the world, than pretend to renounce it, and afterward, when tribulation and persecution arise because of the Word, to return to it. That young man who could not find in his heart to part with his possessions for Christ, did better to go away from Christ sorrowing, than to have staid with Him dissembling.

This parable is applicable another way, and may be taken as designed to teach us to begin speedily to be religious, rather than to begin cautiously, (Matt. 5: 25.) Agree with thine adversary quickly. Note, Those that persist in sin, make war against God, and rebel against their lawful Sovereign, whose government is perfectly just and good. What is the proudest and most daring sinner in the hand of God? Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than He? Who knows the power of his anger? It is our interest then to make peace with Him; we need not send to desire conditions of peace, they are offered to us, are unexceptionable, and infinitely to our advantage; let us acquaint ourselves with them, and be at peace; do this in time, while the other is yet a great way off; delay is dangerous, and makes after-applications difficult.

But this parable is here (v. 33.) applied to the consideration to be exercised when we take on us a profession of religion. Solomon saith, With good advice make war; (Prov. 20:18.) so with good advice, enter on a profession of religion, as those who know, that, except you forsake all you have, you cannot be Christ's disciples; that is, except you count on forsaking all, and consent to it, for all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution, and yet continue to live godly.

3. He warns them against apostasy and degeneracy from the truly Christian spirit and temper, for that would make them utterly useless, p. 34, 35. (1.) Good Christians are the salt of the earth, and good ministers especially; (Matt. 5: 13.) by their instructions and examples they season all they converse with. (2.) Degenerate Christians, who, rather than part with what they have in the world, will throw up their profession, and then of course become carnal, and worldly, and wholly destitute of a Christian spirit, are like salt that has lost its savor, the most useless, worthless thing in the world. [1.] It can never be recovered; Wherewith shall it be seasoned? You cannot salt it. This intimates that it is extremely difficult, and next to impossible, to recover an apostate, Heb. 6: 4-6. If Christianity will not prevail to cure men of worldliness and sensuality, their case must be concluded desperate. [2.] It is of no use; it is not fit for the land, to manure that, nor will it be the better if laid in the dunghill to rot, nothing is to be got out of it. A professor of religion, whose mind and manners are depraved, is the most insipid animal. If he speak of the things of God, which he hath had some knowledge of, it is so awkwardly, that none are the better for it: it is a parable in the mouth of a fool. [3.] It is abandoned; men cast it out. Such scandalous professors ought to be cast out of the church, because there is danger that others will be infected by them. Our Savior concludes this with a call to all to notice it, and take warning; He that hath ears to hear, let him hear. Now, can the faculty of hearing be better employed than in attending to the Word of Christ, particularly to the alarms He has given us of the danger we are in of apostasy, and run ourselves into by it?

CHAP. XV. v. 1-10. Evil manners, we say, beget good laws; so, in this chapter, the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 25-35. Though men are bound to use every proper means, God alone can prevail with sinners to partake of his salvation. Great multitudes may attend on the Gospel; and the opportunity should be embraced, of warning and instructing them; but, unless they are taught of God supremely to value spiritual blessings, and to feel their perishing need of Christ, they will by no means become his true disciples. Indeed by the greater number of teachers state this matter very conveniently; and whilst many follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth is evil spoken of, it is almost become obsolete, (at least very unfashionable, even where some doctrines of the Gospel are preached,) to declare the necessity of acting, as if we hated our nearest relatives, or our own lives, when we aspire to be Christ's disciples. It is to be feared, many dream that they are interested in the cross of Christ, who were never willing to bear the cross for Him; and who neither renounce their worldly interests, nor mortify their lusts, in order to follow Him. But, if we be not prepared to give up iniquitous gain, forbidden indulgences, and the friendship of the world, and to bear ridicule and reproach, and the displeasure or loss of friends; how should we be able to forsake all, and lay down our lives for Christ? (Jer. 12: 5, 6. P. O. Heb. 12: 4-8.) While men shrink from the perils and sufferings of a warfare with sin and Satan, let them reflect how dreadful their case must be, if they continue exposed to the wrath of God! If on any terms they have made their peace with Him, they may bear, resist, and overcome every thing by his grace; but who can help them against his omnipotent indignation?

most innocent and excellent persons, but on the most innocent and excellent actions, and we must not think it strange.

III. Christ's justifying Himself, showing that the worse the people were to whom He preached, the more glory there would be to God, and the more joy in heaven, if, by his preaching, they were brought to repentance. It would be a more pleasing sight in heaven, to see Gentiles brought to the worship of the true God, than to see Jews go on in it; and to see publicans and sinners live an orderly life, than to see scribes and Pharisees go on in living such a life.
This He illustrates by,

1. The parable of the lost sheep. Something like it we had, Matt. 18:12.
There the care God takes for the preservation of saints, was shown, as a reason why we should not offend them; here the pleasure God takes in the conversion of sinners, as a reason why we should rejoice in it.

(1.) The case of a sinner that goes on in sinful ways; he is like a sheep gone astray; lost to God, who has not the honor and service He should have from him; lost to the flock, which has not communion with him; lost to himself, murmuring of the scribes and Pharisees at the grace of Christ and the favor He showed to publicans and sinners, gave occasion for a more full discovery of that grace than perhaps otherwise we should have had, in the three parables in this chapter; the scope of all which is the same, to show, not only what God hath said and sworn in the Old Testament, that He hath no pleasure in the death and ruin of sinners, but that He has great pleasure in their return and repentance, and rejoices in the gracious entertainment He gives them thereupon.

Here is,

I. The diligent attendance of the publicans and sinners on Christ's ministry. The publicans, who collected the tribute paid to the Romans, were perhaps some of them bad men, but they were all industriously put into an ill name, because of the prejudices of the Jewish nation against their office; they are sometimes ranked with harlots, (Matt. 21:32,) as here and elsewhere with sinners, openly vicious. Some think sinners here means heathens, and that Christ was now on the other side Jordan, or in Galilee of the Gentiles. These droop near, within hearing; not as some, from curiosity to see Him, nor as others, to solicit cures, but to hear his excellent doctrine. Note, In all our approaches to Christ, this we must have in our eye, to hear Him; to hear the instructions He gives us, and his answers to our prayers.

II. The offence the scribes and Pharisees took at this. They turned it to the reproach of our Lord, v. 2. 1. They were angry that publicans and heathens were allowed the means of grace, called to repent, and encouraged to hope for pardon on repentance; they looked upon their case as desperate, and that none but Jews had the privilege of repenting and being pardoned, though the prophets preached repentance to the nations, and Daniel particularly to Nebuchadnezzar. 2. They thought it a disparagement to Christ, and inconsistent with the dignity of his character, to make Himself familiar with such sort of people. They could not, for shame, condemn Him for preaching to them, though at that they were the most enraged; therefore they reproached Him for eating with them, which was more expressly contrary to the tradition of the elders. Censure will fall, not only on the

verses 3-7.

The lost sheep represents the sinner, as departed from God, exposed to certain ruin, if not brought back to Him, and utterly without either power or inclination to return. (7.) More than over ninety and nine, &c. This may be differently explained, as referring to angels who are perfectly righteous and need no repentance; or to the company of the redeemed, who are already brought home, and have no further occasion for that entire repentance from dead works, which the newly-awakened sinner exercises. But doubtless our Lord intended more immediately to address the Pharisees, according to their own opinion of themselves. They proudly fancied that they needed no repentance; yet the conversion of one publican or harlot was far more pleasing and honorable to God, and matter of far greater joy in heaven, than the formality and decency of any number of those, who yet thought themselves exclusively 'the sheep of his pasture'; and the publican's tears of godly sorrow, and broken cries for mercy, were far more acceptable, than all their long prayers and ostentatious austeri-ties. (8-10, 22-32. Jer. 31:18-34. Matt. 21:28-32.) Scott.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. v. 1, 2. Some suppose that the term 'sinners' is here meant of the Gentiles; but this is highly improbable, for 'He received and ate with' the 'sinners' here mentioned; (2.) whereas had He eaten with Gentiles, his apostles would hardly have scrupled it after his ascension, as they most evidently did, (Acts 10: 9-16, 27-33. 11: 1-3.) It is probable He ate with the Samaritans, when He staid two days at Sychar, and accordingly we find that the apostles readily went along with them as he embraced the Gospel. But these were circumcised, and observed the distinction of meats; though they were heretics and schismatics, and abhorred by the Jews. Our Lord was 'sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel'; did He then 'come to call the Gentiles' exclusively 'to repentance'? (5: 32.) Was Zachæus a Gentile? (19: 7-9.) Was Paul a Gentile before his conversion? or did Jesus come to save only Gentiles? (1 Tim. 1: 15.) In fine, the word a sinner' is applied to our Lord Himself; but did the Jews suppose Him to be a Gentile? (John 9: 16, 24, 25, 31.) Scott.

(1.) Then. 'The same day Christ dined with the Pharisees. (ch.
14: 1-14,) which, being the sabbath-day, would give the publicans, &c., other days were employed in their office, a more convenient opportunity of attending.' DODDIDGE.

(2.) Receiveth sinners. 'The sinners here are not Gentiles, but Jews of the order of tax-gatherers, and other persons of bad reputation.
Even supposing any such converted, to associate with them was directly contrary to the custom of the Pharisees. 'Our doctors promulgated this law,' says Tanchuma, cited by Schoettgen, 'Thieves and usurers, even though they repent, are not to be received;'

7 I say unto you, That likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance.

8 ¶ Either what woman, having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she find it?

9 And when she hath found it, she calleth her friends and her neighbors together, saying, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost.

ty-nine to one of God's creation, in whom He is praised, and never was dishonored. O the numberless beings, for aught we know, numberless worlds of beings, that never were lost, or steeped aside from the laws and ends of their creation!

That which is lost, is a piece of silver—the fourth part of a shekel. The soul is of intrinsic worth; not of base metal, as iron or lead, but of silver. The Hebrew word for silver, is taken from the desirableness of it. It is silver coin, for so the drachma was; it is stamped with God's image and superscription, and therefore must be rendered to Him. Yet it is comparatively but of small value; intimating that if sinful men were left to perish, God would be no loser. This silver was lost in the dirt; a soul plunged in the world, and overwhelmed with the love of it, and care about it, is like a piece of money in the dirt; any one would say, It is a thousand pities it should lie there.

Here is a great deal of care and pains taken in quest of it, v. 8. This represents the various means and methods God makes use of to bring lost souls home to Himself.

Here is a great deal of joy for the finding of it, v. 9. Those that rejoice, desire that others should rejoice with them. The pleasing surprise of finding it, put her, for the present, into a kind of transport. So the expression intimates.

The explication of these two parables is to the same purport; v. 7, 10. Observe,

1. The repentance and conversion of sinners on earth, are matter of joy and rejoicing in heaven. The greatest sinners may be brought to repentance; while there is life, there is hope, and the worst, if they repent and turn, shall find mercy. Yet that is not all. God will delight to show them mercy; will reckon their conversion a return for all the expense He has been at upon them. There is always joy in heaven; God rejoiceth in all his works, but particularly in the works of his grace. He rejoiceth, not only in the conversion of churches and nations, but even over one sinner that repenteth, though but one. The good angels will be glad that mercy is shown them; so far are they from repining at it, though those of their nature that sinned, be left to perish; though sinners that are so mean, and have been so vile, are, on their repentance, to be taken into communion with them, and shortly to be made like and equal to them. The conversion of sinners is the joy of angels, who gladly be, as ministering spirits to them for their good, on their conversion. The redemption of mankind was matter of joy in the presence of the angels; for they sung, Glory to God in the highest, Luke 2:14.

2. There is more joy over one sinner that repenteth, and turneth to be religious, from a course of life notoriously vile and vicious, than over ninety-nine just persons, who need no repentance. More joy for the redemption and salvation of fallen man, than for the preservation and confirmation of the angels that stand, and indeed need no repentance. More joy for the conversion of sinners of the Gentiles, and those publicans that now heard Christ preach, than for all the praises and devotions, and all the God, I thank Thee, of the Pharisees, and other self-justifying Jews, who thought that they needed no repentance. Nay, more joy for the conversion of one such great sinner, such a Pharisee as Paul, than for the regular conversation of one that had always conducted himself decently and well, and comparatively needs no repentance, needs not such a universal change of the life as those great sinners need. Not but that it is best not to go astray; but the power and pity of the grace of God is most manifested in the reducing of great sinners, more than in the conducting of those that never went astray. And many times those that have been great sinners before their conversion, prove more eminently and zealously good after; of which Paul is an instance, and, therefore, in him God was greatly glorified, Gal. 1:24. They to whom much is forgiven, will love much. It is spoken after the manner of men; we are moved with a more sensible joy for the recovery of what we had lost, than for the continuance of what we had always enjoyed; for health out of sickness, than for health without sickness. It is as life from the dead. Now if there is such joy in heaven, for the conversion of sinners, then the Pharisees were very much strangers to a heavenly spirit, who did all they could to hinder it, were grieved at it, and exasperated at Christ when doing a piece of work, of all others, most grateful to heaven.

V. 11—32. The scope of this parable, as of

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. When the chief of sinners draw near to hear the Gospel, they should be addressed with compassion, as well as plainness, and never be driven away with contempt and upbraidings: nor should we shun to go among them for their good, however the self-wise and self-righteous may murmur or revile. Nay, it is reasonable for us to bestow peculiar attention on them. We 'all have been as sheep going astray,' and He 'on whom were laid the iniquities of us all,' comes to seek us, and rejoices in bringing us back to his chosen flock; and He requires all who love Him, to rejoice over every instance of this abundant grace. Let us then leave it to those, who think that 'they need no repentance,' to refuse their tribute of joyful praise, on such occasions. We know, it we be indeed true believers, that there is joy in heaven over every weeping penitent, more than over ninety and nine formal professors of Christianity.—But shall Christians, ministers, angels, yea, the Lord of angels, do so much for the repentance of one sinner, and judge it a matter of such high importance and cordial rejoicing; and shall sinners themselves not think it worth while to bestow any pains in seeking the inestimable blessing? Shall they not desire to cause holy joy in heaven by repenting, who have excited a malignant joy in hell by their crimes? We may likewise conclude, that the powers of darkness will never rejoice in the final ruin of those, over whom angels have thus rejoiced: and we may be excited to employ our labors, and pour out our prayers with all earnestness, for the conversion of sinners around us; for if one only should be rescued by our means, it will incalculably overpay all the labors of our whole lives.—Nor should we yield to discouragement, when our labors seem but little successful: for, perhaps, while we complain and grieve, and with others suppose we are doing little or nothing, angels are rejoicing over one and another, by our means brought to true repentance. In this, as far as we can know it, we are bound to be joyful and thankful, while we take encouragement to labor and pray with redoubled earnestness, for more extensive usefulness.

SCOTT.

(7.) 'Undoubtedly, the ninety-nine who are spoken of as needing no repentance or universal change of heart and life, are confirmed and established saints.'

VERSES 8—10.

The purport of this parable is nearly the same with that of the preceding; it shows the value Christ puts on the souls of his people. They are his property, the fruit of his toil and sufferings; and He will use suitable means, and render them effectual, to bring them home to his church; and then all who love Him will be called on to rejoice with Him on that account. The repentance of a sinner implies his deliverance from eternal misery, and his being made an heir of everlasting felicity. It is a trophy of Christ's victory over the powers of darkness, and a blessed effect of his atoning sacrifice. As then angels love the Lord, and hate iniquity; are free from pride, enmity, and envy, and filled with benevolence; they must rejoice with the divine Savior, whenever they are made acquainted with a work of his grace, even the repentance of one single sinner; and all true Christians rejoice, and praise God, in exact proportion to the degree of their humility, zeal, and love. In this declaration, the Pharisees might see, as in a glass, the hatefulness of their own temper and conduct; and nothing could be more suited to give encouragement to the poor sinners, who came to hear our Lord's instructions. Some expositors seem to confine the 'joy in heaven' to God Himself, who rejoices in the presence of his angels. But the good shepherd called on all his friends to rejoice with him; and the whole family rejoiced when the prodigal returned; so that, doubtless, angels and 'the spirits of just men made perfect,' participate the joy of God our Savior when one sinner repents; as it is intimated in each of these parables. (Marg. Ref. n. 3—7, v. 6, 7, 22—24.) This consideration should inflame the zeal, and quicken the industry, of the spiritual shepherd, for the conversion of sinners; as knowing this is a work so highly acceptable to the God of heaven, and that for which He sent 'the great Shepherd of the sheep' into the world.' Whitby. (Jam. 5:19, 20. P. O. 12—20.)

(8.) Light a candle. 'It will not seem strange that the woman should have needed to light a candle, in order to search for the coin, when we consider how exceedingly lit were the houses of the lower ranks in ancient times. This is manifest from the relics of Heracleum and Pompeii, where many of the smaller houses have windows at all, and in such as have them, they are rather loop-holes (like those found in our barns) than windows.'

VERSES 11, 12.

(Matt. 21:28—32.) The preceding parables chiefly illustrate the importance of conversion; but this further shows the nature of

BLOOMFIELD.

12 And the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living.

13 And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living.

14 And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want.

those before, is to show how pleasing the conversion of sinners is to God, and how ready He is, on their repentance, to receive and entertain them; but the circumstances of the parable much more largely and fully set forth the riches of gospel-grace, and it has been, and will be, while the world stands, of unspeakable use, both to direct and encourage poor sinners, in repenting and returning to God.

I. The parable represents God as a common Father to all mankind; we are all his offspring; one God created us, Mal. 2: 10. In Him we have our being; and from Him we receive our maintenance. He has the educating and portioning of us, and will put us in his will, or leave us out, according as we are, or are not, dutiful children. Our Savior hereby intimates that these publicans and sinners, whom those proud Pharisees thus despised, were their brethren, partakers of the same nature, and that therefore they ought to be glad of any kindness shown them. God is the God, not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles; (Rom. 3: 29.) the same Lord over all, rich in mercy to all that call upon Him.

II. It represents men as of different characters, though all related to God as their common Father. He had two sons, one of them a solid, grave youth, reserved and austere, sober, but ill-humored, one who would adhere to his education; but the other volatile and mercurial, impatient of restraint, roving, willing to try his fortune, and, if he fell into ill hands, likely to be a rake, notwithstanding his virtuous education. Now this latter represents the publicans and sinners, whom Christ would bring to repentance, and the Gentiles to whom the apostles were to be sent forth, to preach repentance. The former represents the Jews in general, and particularly the Pharisees, whom He was endeavoring to reconcile to the grace of God.

The younger son is the prodigal, whose character and case are designed to represent that of a sinner, of every one of us in our natural state, but especially of some.

Now, observe,

1. His riot and ramble when a prodigal, and the extravagances and miseries he fell into. We are told,

(1.) What his request to his father was; v. 12. He said to his father, proudly and pertly enough, 'Father, give me, (he might have put a little more in his mouth, and have said, Pray give me, or, Sir, if you please, give me,) give me the portion of goods that falleth to me; not so much as you think fit to allot me, but what falls to me as my due.' Note, It is bad, and the beginning of worse, when men look upon God's gifts as due debts. 'Give me the portion, all my child's part, that falls to me; not, Try me with a little, and see how I can manage that, and accordingly trust me with more; but, Give it me all at present.' Note, The great folly and ruin of sinners is, being content to have their portion by hand; now in this life-time to receive their good things. They look only at things seen, and temporal, covet only a present gratification, but have no care for a future felicity.

And why did he desire to have his portion in his own hands? [1.] He was weary of his father's government, and fond of liberty, falsely so called.

tance, and the gracious reception, which the truly penitent experience from our merciful God and Father. In those, the exposed and helpless condition of lost sinners is represented; in this, their rebellion and ingratitude. The distinction between formal and moral persons, and those of more scandalous lives, is found in every country, and the two companies include all, except the remnant of penitent believers. We are led to consider 'the younger son' as having been well educated, and kindly treated, by a pious, prudent, and affectionate father, in whose family he had every profitable indulgence; but, without cause, he ungratefully demanded 'the portion of goods that fell to his share.' This accords to the foolish and perverse conduct of many children; who vainly suppose they can manage better for themselves, than their parents do for them, and think themselves entitled to a 'portion of goods,' as if they had a legal claim to it. But it also aptly describes the temper of sinners respecting God; who, notwithstanding his providential kindness and the reasonableness of his commands, cast off all regard to his authority, break loose from restraint, count themselves entitled to a large share of worldly possessions, and foolishly imagine that they shall best enjoy themselves when they cannot forget or rebel against Him. The father's division of his substance between his sons, shows that God often indulges men in their carnal inclinations, that they may be more inexcusable in rebellion, and may know by experience the folly of their own choice. It is said that there is a custom, or law, in the East, by which the son may demand his portion, in the lifetime of his father, who cannot legally refuse compliance. Nothing of this, however, is at all intimated in Scripture.

(12.) Divided.] It was not unusual for fathers to divide all their substance even in their life-time. This custom is alluded to by Theophrastus.

Verdes 13-16.

The removal of the younger son with all his property into a far country, as if to traffic with it, but in such a way that he might receive no more counsel or control from his father, represents the prosperous sinner's increasing impiety, and disregard of God; and his 'wasting his substance in riotous living, shadows forth the abuse men make of the bounty of Providence, by spending it on their lusts, ruining their health, and shortening their lives, by excess. (Marg. Ref. r. s.) The prodigal's having 'spent all,' and a famine at the same time prevailing in the land, his deserting by companions and flatterers, and beginning to be destitute, show the wasting, transient nature of ungodly pleasure and prosperity, and the tendency of sin to produce misery; also that the Lord often visits the sinner with additional afflictions, especially when He proposes to bring him to repentance. (Marg. Ref. t.—Hos. 2: 6, 7.) Feeding swine was a mean employment in itself; but among the Jews, to whom those animals were ceremonially unclean, it might be considered as the greatest debasement imaginable, especially to one who had been brought up in affluence. Yet, as if the hardship and disgrace had been too little, the prodigal was scarcely allowed to satisfy the cravings of his appetite with the husks, or mast, the coarse wild fruits, on which the swine fed; though for want of other food, he earnestly desired it; so that he was reduced to the danger even of perishing by hunger. Thus the sinner often plunges into the basest crimes, and sells himself to Satan, to work iniquity; and yet sometimes can hardly obtain the meanest sustenance, and grows more and more despicable and miserable, having nothing but destruction before his eyes!

(13.) Riotous living.] 'This was among harlots, (v. 30.) the readiest way to exhaust the body, debase the mind, ruin the soul, and destroy the substance.'

(15.) To feed swine.] An employment contemptible among the Jews, as it had been with the Egyptians. Thus Herodot. So Sota, "Cursed is he who feeds swine." Equally contemptible was it among the Greeks. So Martial.

Rom. 2:4. m Ps. 51:4. 149:2. 1 Cor. 8:12.

Observe what he considered.

[1.] How had his condition was; I perish with hunger. Not only, 'I am hungry', but, 'I perish with hunger'; I see not what way to expect relief. Note, Sinners will not come to Christ, till brought to see themselves just ready to perish in sin; Master, save us, we perish. And though we be thus driven to Christ, He will not therefore reject us, nor think Himself dishonored, but rather honored, by his being applied to in a desperate case.

[2.] How much better it might be, if he would but return; the meanest in my father's family, the very day-laborers, have bread enough, and to spare: such a good house he keeps! Note, 1st. In our Father's house, is bread for all his family; that was taught by the twelve loaves of shew-bread, even on the holy table in the sanctuary, a loaf for every tribe. 2dly. There is enough and to spare, for all, for each, for such as will join themselves to his domestics, for charity. Yet there is room; crumbs fall from his table, which many would be glad of, and thankful for.

3dly. Hired servants in God's family are well provided for; even the meanest that hire themselves into his family, and depend on his reward, shall be well provided for.

4thly. This consideration should encourage sinners, astray from God, to return to Him.

(3.) The purpose of it. Since his condition is so bad, and may be bettered by returning, his conclusion is, I will arise, and go to my father. Note, Good purposes are good things, but good performances all in all.

He will take no longer time to consider of it, but will forthwith arise and go. Though in a far country, a great way off, yet, far as it is, he will return; every step of backsliding from God, must be a step back again in return to Him. Though joined to a citizen of this country, he makes no difficulty of breaking his bargain. We are not debtors to the flesh, are under no obligation to give warning, but are at liberty to quit the service of our Egyptian task-masters when we will. Observe with what resolution he speaks, I will; I am resolved, whatever the issue be, rather than stay here, and starve.

True repentance is a rising, and coming to God; Behold, we come unto thee. But what words shall we take with us? He here considers what to say. Note, In al. our addresses to God, it is good to deliberate beforehand what we shall say, that we may order our cause before Him, and fill our mouth with arguments. We have liberty of speech, and we ought to consider seriously with ourselves, how we may use that liberty to the utmost, and yet not abuse it.

Let us observe what he purposed to say.

1st. He would confess his fault and folly; I have sinned. Note, As we have all sinned, so we all ought to own it. It is required and insisted on, as a necessary condition of peace and pardon. If we plead not guilty, we put ourselves on trial by the covenant of innocence, which will certainly condemn us. We plead guilty, with a contrite, penitent, and obedient heart, we refer ourselves to the covenant of grace, which offers forgiveness to those that confess their sins.

Verses 20, 21.

According to his determination, the prodigal set out on his journey home; distressed, we may conceive, with fears of many hardships to endure, and lest his father should reject or upbraid him. But, being received, and made the more ashamed of his own misconduct by his father's kindness, he acknowledged his guilt and unworthiness, in the words he had premeditated, save that he omitted the latter clause; e. the: interrupted by his kind father, or not counting it necessary, see-foolish hopes; and they are, of all diseased persons, most enemies to their own cure.

2. His return from this ramble, his penitent return to his father. When brought to the last extremity, he bethought himself how much it was his interest to go home. The grace of God can soften the hardest heart, and give a happy turn to the strongest stream of corruption. Now observe here,

(1.) The occasion of his return and repentance: it was his affliction, when he was in want, then he came to himself. Note, Afflictions, when sanctified by divine grace, prove happy means of turning sinners from the error of their ways. By them the ear is opened to discipline, and the heart disposed to receive instruction; and they are sensible proofs, both of the vanity of the world, and of the mischievousness of sin. Apply it spiritually; when we find the insufficiency of creatures, and have tried all other ways of relief for our poor souls in vain, then it is time to think of returning to God. When we see what miserable comforters, physicians of no value, all but Christ are, for a soul that groans under the guilt and power of sin, and no man gives unto us what we need, then surely we shall apply ourselves to Jesus Christ.

(2.) The preparative for it: it was consideration. He reasoned within himself, when he recovered his right mind, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough! Note, Consideration is the first step towards conversion, Ezek. 18: 28. He considers and turns. To consider, is to retire into ourselves, to reflect on ourselves, to compare one thing with another, and determine accordingly.

2dly. He would aggravate it; so far from extenuating the matter, he would load himself for it; I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee. Let those that are unconscious to their earthly parents, think of this; they sin against heaven, and before God. Offences against them are offences against God. Let us all think of this, as that which renders our sin exceeding sinful, and should render us exceedingly sorrowful for it. 1. Sin is committed in contempt of God's authority; We have sinned against heaven. God is here called Heaven, to signify how highly He is exalted, and the dominion He has over us, for the Heavens do rule. The malignity of sin aims high, against Heaven. The daring sinner is said to have set his mouth against the Heavens, Ps. 73: 9. Yet it is impotent malice, foolish malice; what is shot against the Heavens, will return on the head of him that shoots it, Ps. 7: 16. Sin is an affront to the God of heaven, a forfeiture of the glories and joys of heaven, a contradiction to the designs of the kingdom of heaven. 2. It is committed in contempt of God's eye upon us; I have sinned against heaven, and yet before thee, under thine eye; than which there could not be a greater affront.

3dly. He would judge and condemn himself, and acknowledge himself to have forfeited all the privileges of the family, v. 29. He does not deny the relation, (that was all he had to trust to), but owns his father might justly shut his doors against him. He had, at his own demand, his portion of goods, and had reason to expect no more. Note, It becomes sinners to acknowledge themselves unworthy to receive any favor from God, and to humble and abase themselves before Him.

5thly. In all this, he would have an eye to his father as a father; I will arise, and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father. Note, Eying God as a Father, and our Father, will be of great use in our repentance, and return to Him. It will make our sorrow for sin genuine, our resolutions against it strong, and encourage us to hope for pardon. God delights to be called Father; Is not Ephraim a dear son?

(4.) The performance of this purpose; He arose, and came to his father. His good resolve he put in execution without delay. Note, It is our interest speedily to close with our convictions. Have we said, We will arise, and go? Let us immediately. He did not come half way, and then pretend he was tired, and could go no further; but weak and weary as he was, he made a thorough business of it. If thou wilt return, O Israel, return unto Me and do thy first works.

3. His reception and entertainment with his father; He came to his father; but was he welcome? Yes, heartily. And by the way, it is an example to parents whose children have been foolish and disobedient, if they repent and submit, not to be harsh and severe with them, but to be governed in such a case by the wisdom that is from above, which is gentle ing he was welcomed as a son. Thus the penitent sinner nulls the bondage of Satan, and returns ¹armed by faith and prayer, ²against a variety of fears and difficulties; and the Lord graciously meets him with unexpected tokens of his forgiving love. These conduct still further to humble his heart, though they inspire him with more confidence of hope, in the mercy of his gracious Lord. (Marg. Ref. 1, m.—Ps. 2 3-5. Is. 55: 6-9. 57: 15, 16. Ez. 16: 60-63, v. 63.) Scorr.

22 But the father said to his servants, Bring forth, the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet:

23 And bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat and be merry:

24 For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to bemoan.

but the tender father ran to meet him with his encouragements. [4.] Here were arms of mercy, and those stretched out to embrace him; He fell on his neck; though guilty, and deserving to be beaten, though dirty, and newly come from feeding swine, that any one who had not the strongest and tenderest compassions of a father, would have loathed to touch him; yet he thus takes him in his arms, and lays him in his bosom. Thus dear are true penitents to God, thus welcome to the Lord Jesus. [5.] Here are lips of mercy, and those dropping as a honey-comb; He kissed him. This kiss not only assured him of his welcome, but sealed his pardon; his former follies shall be all forgiven, and not mentioned against him, nor is one word said in way of upbraiding. This was like David's kissing Absalom, 2 Sam. 14:33. And this inculcates how ready and free and forward the Lord Jesus is to receive and entertain poor, returning, penitent sinners, according to his Father's will.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 17-24. Happy are they, who, by means of any afflictions, are made to see the madness and folly of their rebellion against God! With what new eyes do they then begin to behold the divine character and law, their own obligations and conduct, their interest and duty, their state and prospects! The sinner, when 'he is come to himself,' is made sensible that he is a wretch undone; and that the meanness of those servants of God, whom he formerly despised, is happy, compared with him. He discovers that there is no hope of escaping destruction, except by repentance, and returning unto God through Jesus Christ, and by faith in his blood; the riches of whose goodness and mercy give him his sole encouragement to repent, and hope for pardon: he sees and confesses the greatness of his guilt, and its manifold aggravations, which before he palliated, excused, or gloried in: he allows himself to be utterly unworthy of those blessings, which, from the goodness of God, he enjoyed and ungratefully despised: and he is rendered willing to submit to any abasement, or self-denial, if he may be admitted into the number of the Lord's servants, and be preserved from impending destruction. Nor does he rest in recollections, or good purposes to be realized at some future period (Ps. 119: 57-63.) without delay, he arises, breaks his league with sin, encounters difficulties, ceases to do evil, learns to do well; uses the means of grace, mortifies sinful propensities, and performs self-denying duties, even on a peradventure that he Lord may have mercy on him: and he proceeds in this course, though harassed with fears, lest his sins should be un-

(2.) The poor prodigal's penitent submission; v. 21. As it commends the good father's kindness, that he showed it before the prodigal expressed his repentance so it commends the prodigal's repentance, that at he expressed it after his father had showed him so much kindness. When he had received the kiss which sealed his pardon, yet he said, Father, I have sinned. Note, Even those that have received the pardon of their sins, and the comfortable sense of their pardon, must have in their hearts sincere contrition, and with their mouths make penitent confession. David penned Psalm 51: after Nathan had said, The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die. Nay, the comfortable sense of the pardon of sin should increase our sorrow for it; and that is ingenuous, evangelical sorrow, which is increased by such a consideration. See Ezek. 16: 63. Thou shalt be ashamed and confounded, when I am pacified toward thee. The more we see of God's readiness to forgive us, the more difficult it should be to us to forgive ourselves.

(3.) The splendid provision this kind father made for the returning prodigal. He was going on in his submission, but one word we find in his purpose to say, (v. 19.) which we do not find that he did say, (v. 21.) and that was, Make me as one of thy hired servants. We cannot think that he forgot it, much less that he changed his mind; but his father interrupted him, prevented his saying it; 'Hold, son, talk no more of thine unworthiness, thou art heartily welcome, and shalt be treated as a dear son, as a pleasant child.' He who is thus entertained at first, needs not ask to be made as a hired servant. Thus when Ephraim bemoaned himself, God comforted him, Jer. 31: 18, 20. It is strange that here is not one word of rebuke; 'Why not stay with your harlots and your swine? You could never find the way home, till beaten hither with your own rod.' Here is nothing like this; intimating that, when God forgives the sins of true penitents, He forgets them, thy shall not be mentioned against them, Ezek. 18: 22.

But this is not all; here is rich, royal provision made for him, according to his birth and quality, far beyond what he did, or could, expardonable, or lest he should finally be rejected. But when our gracious Lord has thus humbled sinners, He will not delay to come to their relief and comfort. He sees all their remorse and anguish. He witnesses their groans and tears, He hears and accepts their broken petitions and confessions; and He never upbraids those, who loathe and abhor themselves. This genuine repentance is increased by every fresh discovery of the Lord's goodness and mercy: every token of forgiveness renders the heart more contrite, godly sorrow more ingenuous, and confessions of guilt more unreserved. Thus a blessed reconciliation takes place between an offended God and a heinous transgressor of his laws: and while the broken-hearted penitent feels himself unworthy of the least favor, his heavenly Father puts him in full possession of all the blessings of his salvation, 'seals him with the Spirit of adoption,' and comforts him beyond his largest hopes. Thus he is encouraged, animated, and even constrained, by redeeming love, to walk with pleasure in the ways of holy obedience: and his services will be as much superior to those of formal Pharisees, as his joy in the Lord exceeds their conception and experience. Then angels and saints rejoice, that the lost sinner is found, that the dead is raised, and that the rebel is reconciled.—And let it be here hinted, that this is an example, which parents especially are called to imitate in their conduct towards their children: when, having been even very disobedient and profligate, they 'come to themselves,' desire to return to their duty, and to obtain forgiveness of the past. SCOTT.

(22.) The best robe. 'Or, long robe, which servants never wore; the ordering of which, therefore, by the father, was a most moving declaration how far he was from intending to treat the prodigal like a servant. He mentioning the ring and the shoes spake the same language.'

DODDRIDGE.

Verse 23.

Kill it. Literally, sacrifice it. In ancient times, the animals provided for public feasts were first sacrificed to God. The blood of the beast being poured out before God, by way of atonement for sin, the flesh was considered as consecrated, and the guests were considered as feeding on divine food. This custom is observed among the Asiatics to this day.

Dr. A. CLARKE.

Though some think Christ spoke this parable to an assembly composed of Gentiles principally—and Elser urges that it was customary to offer a sacrifice at the birth, and sometimes at the unexpected recovery of a child, yet as this was said in presence of Jews—among whom no sacrifice of this kind was appointed, Raphael, Wolf, Doddridge, and Bloomfield think there is no such classical allusion here. The righteousness of Christ is the robe, that principal robe, with which they are clothed; they put on the Lord Jesus Christ, are clothed with that Sun. The robe of righteousness is the garment of salvation, Isa. 61: 10. A new nature is this best robe, true penitents are clothed with that, being sanctified throughout. 2dly. The earnest of the Spirit, by whom we are sealed to the day of redemption, is the ring on the hand. After that ye believed, ye were sealed. They that are sanctified, are adorned and dignified, put in power, as Joseph by Pharaoh's giving him a ring; 'Put a ring on his hand, to be before him a constant memorial of his father's kindness, that he may never forget it.' 3dly. The preparation of the Gospel of peace, is shoes for our feet; (Eph. 6: 15.) so that, compared with this here, signifies (saith Grotius) that God, when He receives true penitents into his favor, makes use of them for the convincing and converting of others by their instructions, at least, by their examples. David, when pardoned, will teach transgressors God's ways, and Peter, when converted, will strengthen his brethren. Or, it intimates that they shall go on cheerfully, and with resolution, in the way of religion, as a man does when he has shoes on his feet, above what he does when he is barefoot.

[2.] He came home hungry, and his father not only fed him, but feasted him, v. 23. Cold meat might have served, or the leavings of the last meal; but he shall have fresh meat, and hot meat, and the fatted calf can never be better bestowed. Note, Excellent food is provided by our heavenly Father for all who arise and come to Him. Christ Himself is the Bread of life; his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed; in Him there is a feast for souls, a feast of fat things. It was a great change with the prodigal, who a while ago would fain have filled his belly with husks. How sweet the supplies of the new covenant, and the relish of its comforts, to those who have been laboring in vain for satisfaction in the creature! Now he found his own words made good, In my father's house there is bread enough, and to spare.

(1.) The great joy and rejoicing that were in his return. The bringing of the fatted calf was designed to be not only a feast for him, but a festival for the family, v. 23, 24. Note, [1.] Conversion is the raising of the soul from death to life, the finding of that which seemed to be lost, a great, wonderful, happy change. What was in itself dead, is made alive; what was lost to God and his church, is found, and what was unprofitable, becomes profitable, Philem. 11. It is such a change as that on the face of the earth, when the spring returns. [2.] The conversion of sinners is greatly pleasing to God; and al. that belong to his family, ought to rejoice in it, those in heaven do, and those on earth should. Observe, the father began the joy, and all the rest rejoiced. Therefore we should be glad of the repentance of sinners, because it accomplishes God's design; it is the bringing of those to Christ, whom the Father had given Him, and in whom He will be forever glorified. We joy for your sakes before our God, with an eye to Him, (1 Thess. 3: 9.) and ye are our rejoicing in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Master of the family, 1 Thess. 2: 19.

The family complied with the master; They began to be merry. Note, God's children and servants ought to be affected with things as He is.

4. The repining and envying of the elder brother, is described by way of reproof to the scribes and Pharisees, for their discontent at the repentance and conversion of the publicans and sinners, and the favor Christ showed them, but so represented as not to aggravate the matter, but as allowing them still the privileges of elder brethren, which the Jews had, (though the Gentiles were favored,) for the preaching of the Gospel must begin at Jerusalem. Christ accosted them mildly, to soothe them into a good temper toward the poor publicans. But by the elder brother here, we may understand those who are really good, and have been so from their youth up, and never went astray into any vicious course of living; who comparatively need no repentance: to such these words in the close, Son, thou art ever with me, are applicable without any difficulty, but not to the scribes and Pharisees. Observe,

(1.) How foolish and fretful the elder brother was, on occasion of his brother's reception, and how disgusted at it. It seems he was abroad

Verses 25-32.

In the subsequent part of this parable, the character of the Pharisees is delineated, as to the most prominent feature of it. Had they been as righteous as they thought themselves, their conduct towards the publicans and sinners would have been very unreasonable. (Note, 1, 2.) On this ground, our Lord took the opportunity of expostulating with them; as, on other occasions, He exposed their hypocrisy and wickedness. The elder son is represented as having been in the field employed in labor; but when he returned, and heard the unexpected expressions of festive rejoicing, he incurred the reason; and being told on what account the feast was made, he was angry, and would not go in. This represented the Pharisees though not them alone. They were exact in external duties, but proud of their goodness; they deemed themselves the peculiar favorites of heaven, and could not endure that publicans and abandoned sinners should receive any encouragement. (Marg. Ref. a.—7: 37-39. 18: 9-14. 19: 1-10, v. 7.) Thus, were angels, and the Lord of angels, and all the friends of God, were rejoicing over penitent and pardoned sinners, they envied, murmured, and raged! The father is next described, as going out to entreat his son to come in; but he answered with boasts and complaints. This represents the condescension of the Lord, and the arrogant manner in which his invitations and persuasions are often received. The Pharisees supposed that there was great merit in their services; and because not guilty of the outward scandals they charged on the publicans, they thought themselves exempt from all blame; yet they had never experienced those joys in religion, to which the penitent sinner professed to be admitted. (Marg. Ref. b.—f.—Matt. 20: 1-16, v. 12. 25: 24-30, v. 24, 25.) It is well known that the Jews in general were of the same spirit, respecting the converted Gentiles; and numbers, in every age, object to the Gospel and its preachers, on similar grounds. To this proud, rude, ungrateful reply, the father meekly answered, that as his son he was the acknowledged heir of all his substance, though no feast had expressly been made on his account, because he had never left home. But, that it was meet that they should all rejoice over his 'brother,' who had so unexpectedly been reclaimed from his evil courses, and restored to the family, as one that was alive from the dead. (Marg. Ref. g.—i.) Some expositors have been greatly perplexed in applying this latter part of the parable; yet the difficulty will vanish, if we advert to the general scope of it. Had it been true, that the Pharisees were the favorites of heaven, and had always been obedient and deserving their present privileges, would have been continued to them, and their future inheritance secure and undiminished by the favor shown to the publicans. The same would have been the case with the Jews, notwithstanding the calling of the Gentiles, if they had been indeed the children of believing Abraham. So that they could not be deprived of the blessing, except they were found among unbelievers and hypocrites. In the mean time, it was meet, that all the servants of God should rejoice with Him over the repentance and reconciliation of the poor publicans and harlots, by which his name would be glorified, and immortal souls saved. They were of the same nature and nation with the Pharisees, who disinclined them; and the less hope there was of their conversion, the more heartily it ought to be rejoiced in. Thus our Lord closed the subject, not seeing good at that time to push the argument further. The elder son is not represented as having returned any answer to his father, and it is not said that he went in, or that he did not; we may therefore suppose our Lord to mean, that they ought to be satisfied with this statement of the matter, and that some of them would be so; but that others would remain sullen and untractable, after all that could be said to convince them. 'The elder son, in this parable, representeth not the just, or righteous; for they are not angry either that sinners do return to God, or that He graciously entertains them when they do so, but rather are industrious to bring them home to Him, and rejoice at their return.' Whately says.

*I, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment: and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends:

30 But as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf.

31 And he said unto him, Son, thou art over with me, and all that I have is thine.

32 It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

it comparatively; he had not been so disobedient as his brother had been. O what need have good men to take heed of pride, a corruption that arises out of the ashes of other corruptions! Those that have long served God, and been kept from gross sins, have a great deal to be humbly thankful for, but nothing proudly to boast of.

2dly. He complained of his father, as if he had not been so kind to him as he ought, v. 29. He was out of humor now, else he would not have made this complaint; for, no question, had he asked a kid at any time, he might have had it at first word; and we have reason to think he did not desire it, but the killing of the fatted calf induced him to make this peevish reflection. Men in a passion are apt to reflect, as they would not, if in their right mind. Note, Those that think highly of themselves and their services, are apt to think hardly of their master, and meanly of his favors. We ought to own ourselves utterly unworthy of the mercies God hath thought fit to give us, much more of those He hath not thought fit to give us, and therefore we must not complain.

3dly. He was very ill-humored to his younger brother, and harsh in what he thought and said of him. Some good people are liable to this fault, nay, to indulge in it; to look with disdain on those who have not preserved their reputation so clean as they have done, and to be sour and morose to them, yea, though they have given very good evidences of repentance and reformation; this is not the spirit of Christ, but of the Pharisees. Observe the instances of it:

1. He would not go in, except his brother be turned out; one house shall not hold him and his own brother, nor his father's house. The language of this was that of the Pharisee, (Isa. 65:5.) Stand by thyself, come not near me, for I am holier than thou; and, (Luke 18:11.) I am not as other men are, nor even as this publican. Note, Though we are to shun the society of those sinners whom we are in danger of being infected by, yet we must not that of penitent sinners, whom we may get good by. Note, We think too well of ourselves, if we cannot find in our hearts to receive those whom God hath received, and to admit those into favor, and friendship, and fellowship with us, whom we have reason to think God has a favor for, and who are taken into friendship and fellowship with Him.

2. He would not call him brother; but this thy son, which sounds arrogantly, and not without reflection on his father, as if his indulgence had made him a prodigal. Note, Want of regard to the relation we stand in to our brethren, as brethren, is the bottom of all our neglects of duty to them. Let us give our relations, both in the flesh and in the Lord, the titles that belong to them.

3. He aggravated his brother's faults, and endeavored to incense his father against him; He is thy son, who hath devoured thy living with harlots. It is true, he had spent his portion foolishly enough; (whether on harlots, or no, we when his brother came, and by the time he was returned home, the mirth was begun, v. 25. He inquired what those things meant, (v. 26.) and was informed that his brother was come, and received safe and sound, v. 27. It is but one word in the original; he had received him in health, well both in body and mind; a penitent, returned to his right mind, well reconciled to his father's house, cured of his vices and his rakish disposition. Now this disobliterated him to the highest degree; He was angry, and would not go in, (v. 28.) not only because he would not himself join in the mirth, but because he would show his displeasure at it, and intimate to his father, that he should have kept out his younger brother. This shows what is a common fault, [1.] In men's families, that those who have always been a comfort to their parents, think they should have the monopoly of their parents' favor, and are apt to be too sharp on those who have transgressed, and to grudge their parents' kindness to them. [2.] In God's family, those who are comparatively innocent, seldom know how to be compassionate toward those who are manifestly penitent. The language of such is what the elder brother said, (v. 29, 30.) written for warning to those who, by the grace of God, are kept from scandalous sin, that they sin not after the similitude of this transgression. Observe particularly,

1st. He boasted of himself, of his own virtue and obedience. He had not only not run from his father's house, as his brother did, but had made himself as a servant in it, and had done so long, v. 29. Note, It is too common for those that are better than their neighbors, to boast of it, yea, before God Himself, as if He were indebted to them for it. This elder brother said more than was true, when he gloried that he had never transgressed his father's commands, for then he would not have been so obstinate as now to his father's entreaties. However, admit are not told before, perhaps that was only the language of the elder brother's jealousy and ill will; but that he had devoured all his father's living, was false, the father had still a good estate; now this shows how apt we are, in censuring our brethren, to make the worst of every thing, and to set it out in the blackest colors; which is not doing as we would be done by, nor as our heavenly Father does by us, who is not extreme to mark iniquities.

4. He grudged him the kindness his father showed him: Thou hast killed for him the fatted calf, as if he were such a son as should be. Note, It is a wrong thing to envy penitents the grace of God, and to have our eye evil because his is good: we must not envy them their pardon, peace, and comfort, no, nor any gift God bestows on them, which makes them eminently acceptable or useful. Paul, before his conversion, had been a prodigal; yet, when, after his conversion he received greater measures of grace, and more honor than the other apostles, they who were the elder brethren, who had been serving Christ when he was persecuting Him, and had not transgressed at any time his commandments, did not envy him his visions and revelations, nor his more extensive usefulness, but glorified God in him; which ought to be an example to us, as the reverse of this elder brother.

(2.) Let us now see how favorable and friendly his father was to him, when he was thus sour and ill-humored; this is as surprising as the former. Methinks the mercy and grace of God in Christ shine almost as bright, in his tender and gentle bearing with peevish saints, represented by the elder brother here, as before, in his reception of prodigal sinners on their repentance, represented by the younger brother. The disciples of Christ themselves had many infirmities, and were men subject to like passions as others, yet Christ bore with them, as a nurse with her children; see 1 Thess. 2:7.

[1.] When he would not come in, his father came out, and entreated him, accosted him mildly, and desired him to come in. He might justly have shut the doors against him, and sent him to seek a lodging where he could find it; but no, as he went to meet the younger son, so now he goes to court the elder. did not send a servant, but went himself. Now, 1st. This is designed to represent the goodness of God; how strangely gentle and winning He has been toward those that were strangely forward and provoking. He reasoned with Cain; Why art thou wrath? He bare Israel's manners in the wilderness, Acts 13:18. How mildly did God reason with Elijah, when he was on the fret, (1 Kings 19:4-6,) and especially with Jonah, who was disquieted at the repentance of Nineveh, and the mercy showed it, as the elder brother here; and those questions, Dost thou well to be angry; and, Should not I spare Nineveh? are not unlike these expostulations of the father with the elder brother here. 2dly. It is to teach all superiors to be mild and gentle with their inferiors, even when in fault, and passionately justifying themselves: even in that case, let fathers not provoke their children to more wrath, let masters forbear threatening, and both show all meekness.

[2.] His father assured him that the kind entertainment he gave his younger brother, was neither any reflection on him, nor should be any prejudice to him, v. 31. The reception of him is no rejection of thee, nor what is laid out on him, any sensible diminution of what I design for thee; thou shalt still remain entitled to the double portion; all that I have is thine, by an indefeasible title. If he had not given him a kid, to make merry with his friends, he had eaten bread at his table continually; and it is better to be happy with our Father in heaven, than merry with any friend we have in this world. Note, 1st. It is the unspeakable happiness

(31.) All that I have is thine. Rosenmueller explains, Thou art my heir, and therefore "master of all." Kuinoel, however, lays down the following sense: "Thou mayest use mine as thy own. For he had every thing in common with his father, lived in the family—on his father's property."

(32.) This thy brother. There is a lovely opposition between '5361.

this and the 30th verse; the elder son had there indecently said, This thy son; and the father in his reply tenderly says, This thy brother. And it is a moving intimation, that the best of men ought to look on the most abandoned sinners, as, in some respects, their brethren still; and especially when there appears any inclination to return.

The parable of the unjust steward; and the instructions deduced from it. 1-13. Jesus reproves the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, who deride Him; and speaks of the introduction of the Gospel, 14-18. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus, 19-31.

and his father put him in mind that he was his brother; This thy brother.

Note, A good man, though he have not such command of himself at all times, as to keep his temper, yet will, with the grace of God, recover his temper; though he fall, yet shall he not be utterly cast down. But as for the scribes and Pharisees, for whose conviction it was primarily intended, for aught that appears, they continued the same disaffection to the sinners of the Gentiles, and to the Gospel of Christ because it was preached to them.

CHAP. XVI. v. 1-18. The scope of Christ's discourse in this chapter is, to awaken and quicken us all, so to use this world as not to abuse it; so to manage all our possessions and enjoyments here, as that they may make for us, and not against us, in the other world; I. If we do good with them; and lay out what we have in works of piety and charity, we shall reap the benefit of it in the world to come; and this He shows in the parable of the unjust steward. II. If instead of doing good with them, we make them the food and fuel of our lusts, and deny relief to the poor, we shall certainly perish eternally, and the things of this world, which were thus abused, will but add to our misery and torment. This He shows in the other parable of the rich man and Lazarus, which has likewise a further reach, to awaken us all to take the warning given us by the written Word, and not to expect immediate messages from the other world.

We mistake, if we imagine that the design of the Gospel is, merely to amuse us with notions. No, it is intended to engage and quicken us to the practice of Christian duties, and, as much as any one thing, to the duty of beneficence, or of doing good to those who stand in need of any thing that either we have, or can do for them. To this our Savior is here pressing us, by reminding us that we are but stewards of the manifold grace of God; and since we have been of all the children of God, who keep close to their Father's house, that they are, and shall be, ever with Him; they are so in this world by faith, they shall be so in the other world by fruition, and all that He has, is theirs; for if children, then heirs, Rom. 8: 17. 2dly, Therefore we ought not to envy others God's grace, because we shall have never the less for their sharing in it. If we be true believers, all that God is, and all that He has, is ours; and if others come to be true believers, all is theirs too, and yet we have not the less; as they that walk in the light and warmth of the sun, have all the benefit they can have by it, and yet not the less for others, having as much: for Christ in his church is like, as they say of the soul in the body, the whole in the whole, and yet the whole in each part.

[3.] His father gave him a good reason for this uncommon joy in the family, v. 32. He might have insisted on his own authority; but it does not become even those that have authority, to be vouching and appealing to it on every occasion, it makes it cheap and common; it is better to give a convincing reason, as the father does here. Any family would be much more transported with joy at the raising of a dead child to life, yea, or at the recovery of a child from sickness that was adjudged mortal, than for the continued life and health of many children. Note, God will be justified when He speaks, and all flesh shall, sooner or later, be silent before Him. We do not find any reply that the elder brother made to what his father said, which intimates that he was entirely satisfied, and acquiesced in his father's will, and was well reconciled to his prodigal brother; and his father put him in mind that he was his brother; This thy brother.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 25-32. How hateful that disposition in a sinner, which leads him to repine at an event, that fills all heaven with rejoicing! which excites him to despise and abhor those, for whom the Savior shed his precious blood, who are the objects of the Father's special choice, and the temples of the Holy Spirit! and which induces a worm on earth to disdain him as a brother, whom the God of heaven has numbered among his children. (Acts 9: 17-22, p. 17).—Where this disposition is habitual and allowed, it far more than counterbalances all external decency of conduct: and he who boasts of his obedience, complains of the Lord's dealings with him, grudges the favor shown to return ag prodigals, and disdains their company; and who quarrels with the Gospel itself, or with those who preach it, for giving them encouragement: this man is of a more hateful disposition, than the profligates whom he abhors and as far from the spirit of Christ, and the temper of angels, as the most abandoned debauchee on earth; however moral he may be, and exact in forms of godliness. But a degree of the same temper may be found in men of a better character. Even believers are sometimes apt to limit the mercies of God, and to give up, as hopeless, those who are abandoned to crimes, from which they themselves have been graciously preserved. Many who have been long preserved from any remarkable inconsistency of conduct, seem to have little tenderness for those who have been foiled by temptation, even when they give clear evidence of deep repentance. Others look with suspicion on those unfaithful, and forfeit the favor of our Lord, is our wisdom to think how we may, some way, make what we have in the world turn to a good account. Parables must not be forced beyond their primary intention, and therefore we must not hence infer, that any one can befriend us if we lie under the displeasure of our Lord; but that, in general, we must so lay out what we have, in works of piety and charity, as that we may meet it again with comfort, on the other side death and the grave. If we would act wisely, we must be as diligent and industrious to employ our riches in the acts of piety and charity, in order to promote our future and eternal welfare, as worldly men are in laying them out to the greatest temporal profit, in making to themselves friends with them, and securing other secular interests. So Dr. [S.] Clarke.

Now let us consider,

I. The parable itself, in which all the children of men are represented as stewards—and we are but stewards; whatever we have, the property of it is God's, we have only the use of it, and that according to the direction of our great Lord, and for his honor. Rabbi Kimchi, quoted by Lightfoot, saith, 'This world is a house; heaven, the roof; the stars, the lights; the earth with its fruits, a table spread; the Master of the house is the holy and blessed God; man is the steward, into whose hands the goods of this house are delivered; if he behave himself well, he shall find favor in the eyes of his Lord; if not, he shall be turned out of his stewardship.'

Now, 1. Here is the dishonesty of this steward. He embezzled and misapplied his lord's goods, or through carelessness suffered them to be lost and damaged, and for this was accused to his lord, v. 1. We are all liable to the same charge; not having made a due improvement of what God has intrusted us with, but perverted his purpose. And that we may not be for this judged of our Lord, it concerns us to judge ourselves.

2. His discharge, v. 2. His lord speaks as one sorry to find himself disappointed in him, and under a necessity of dismissing him from his service: it troubles him to hear it, but the steward cannot deny it, and therefore there is no remedy, he must make up his accounts, and be gone in a little time. Now this is designed to teach us, (1.) That we must all shortly be discharged from our stewardship in this world. Death will come, and deprive us of the abilities and opportunities we now have of doing good, and others will come in our places, and have the same. (2.) That our discharge from our stewardship at death, is just, and what we have deserved, having wasted our Lord's goods, and thereby forfeited our trust. (3.) That when our stewardship is taken from us, we must give an account of it to our Lord; after death the judgment; of which, both our discharge and of their brethren, however deep their repentance, or however unexceptionable their conduct, who have been reclaimed from very immoral practices; and sometimes they are even surprised or offended, to see them assured of their acceptance, and rejoicing in the Lord! In these, and numberless other ways, the remains of the Pharisee may be discerned; and every feature of his countenance is most hateful, in one who must be saved by unmerited grace, or else perish forevermore. If a man be a true Christian, his present privileges and future inheritance will not be diminished, by the admission of the lowest profligates to the same felicity: but the prevalence of self-preference, on any ground whatever; of contempt, of envy, and such other malignant tempers, gives proportionable ground to suspect, that a man is a stranger to the true grace of God.—But how adorable is the condescension of the Lord, in thus continuing to reason the case with perverse worms of the earth, and in beseeching them to accept the blessings of his salvation! Happy will it be for those, who are at length won over, thankfully to accept of his invitation, and to come to the feast and rejoicing, of which repenting prodigals participate, and in which adoring angels join! But as for those, who persist in their enmity and contempt, their hoastings will speedily be silenced, and their portion allotted them 'with the devil and his angels'; with whom alone they accord in repining, when 'those that were dead are alive again, and those who were lost are found.'

Scott.

3 Then the steward said within himself,

'What shall I do? for my lord taketh away from me the stewardship: I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed.'

4 I am resolved what to do, that, when I am put out of the stewardship, they may receive me into their houses.

5 So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord?

6 And he said, An hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty.

7 Then said he to another, And how much owest thou? And he said, An hundred measures of wheat. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and write fourscore.

8 And the lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely: for the children of this world, we are fairly warned, and ought frequently to think.

3. His after-wisdom. Now he began to consider, What shall I do? v. 3. He would have done well to have considered that before; but it is better to consider late than never. Note, Since we have all received notice that we must shortly be turned out of our stewardship, we are concerned to consider what we shall do then.

(1.) He knows that he is not industrious enough to get his living by work; 'I cannot dig'. But why? The truth is, he is lazy; his cannot is a will not; not a natural, but a moral disability. He cannot dig, for he was never used to it! Now this intimates that we cannot get a livelihood for our souls by any labor for this world; nor, indeed, can do any thing to purpose for our souls by any ability of our own.

(2.) He knows that he is not humble enough to get his bread by begging; To beg I am ashamed. This was the language of his pride, as the former of his slothfulness; those whom God, in his providence, has disabled to help themselves, should not be ashamed to ask relief of others. This steward had more reason to be ashamed of his cheating his master, than of begging his bread.

(3.) He therefore determines to make friends of his lord's debtors, or tenants that were behind with their rent, and had given notes for it; (v. 4.) 'I am resolved what to do. I am acquainted with my lord's tenants; now I will do them one more good turn, which will so oblige them, that they will bid me welcome to their houses, so long as I live, at least till I can better dispose of myself.' So now he would make them his friends, by striking off a considerable part of their debt to his lord, and giving it in his accounts so much less than it was. Accordingly, he sent for one, who owed his lord a hundred measures of oil; (in that commodity he paid his rent); and reduced his debt one half, v. 6. Observe, He was in haste to have it done; 'Sit down quickly, and do it, lest we be taken treacherous, and suspected.' He took another, who owed his lord a hundred measures of wheat, and from his bill he cut off a fifth part; (v. 7.) probably, he did the like by others, abating more or less, according as he expected kindness from them. See here what uncertain things our worldly possessions are; they are most so to those who have most of them, who devolve on others the care of them, and so put it in their power to cheat them. See also what treachery there is, even among those in whom trust is reposed. How hard is it to find one that can be confided in! Let God be true, but every man a liar. Though this steward is turned out for dealing dishonestly, yet still he does so. So rare is it for men to mend of a fault, though they smart for it.

4. The approbation of this, v. 8. It may be that servant, who, though he could not but be angry at his knavery, yet was pleased with his ingenuity and policy for himself; but, taking it so, the latter part of the verse must be the words of our Lord, and therefore I think the whole is meant of him. Christ did, as it were, say, 'Now commend me to such a man as this, that knows how to do well for himself, how to improve a present opportunity, and how to provide for a future necessity.' He does not commend him because he had done falsely to his master, but because he had done wisely for himself.

Now, this forecast of his, for a comfortable subsistence in this world, shames our improvidence for another world; The children of this world, who choose and save their portions in it, are wiser for their generation, act more con-siderately, and better consult their worldly interest, than the children of light, who enjoy the Gospel, in their generation, that is, in the concerns of their souls and eternity. Note, (1.) The wisdom of worldly people in the concerns of this world, is to be imitated by us in the concerns of our souls: it is their principle to improve their opportunities; to do that first, which is most needful; to trust the faithful, and not the false. O that we were thus wise in our spiritual affairs! (2.) The children of light are commonly outdone by the children of this world. Not that the children of this world are truly wise, it is only in their generation; but in that they are wiser than the children of light in theirs: for though we are told that we must shortly be turned out of our stewardship, yet we live as if we were to be here always, not solicitous, as this steward was, to provide for hereafter; though, as children of the light, that light to which life and immortality are brought by the Gospel, we cannot but see another world before us, yet we do not prepare for it, as we should.

II. The application of this parable, and the inferences drawn from it, v. 9. Observe,

1. What our Lord here exhorts us to; to provide for our comfortable reception to the happiness of another world, by making good use of our possessions and enjoyments in this world. It is the wisdom of the men of this world so to manage their money, as that they may have the benefit of it hereafter, and not for the present only; therefore they put it out to interest, buy land with it, put it into this or the other fund. Now we should learn of them to make use of our money, so as that we may be the better for it hereafter in another world; so cast it upon the waters, as that we may find it again after many days, Eccl. 11: 1. And in our case, though whatever we have is our Lord's goods, yet, as long as we dispose of them among our Lord's tenants and for their advantage, it is so far from being a wrong to our Lord, that it is reckoned duty to Him, as well as policy for ourselves.

Note, (1.) The things of this world are the mammon of unrighteousness, or the false mammon; not only because often got by fraud and unrighteousness, but because those who trust to it for satisfaction and happiness, will certainly be deceived; for riches are perishing things, and will disappoint those that raise their expectations from them. (2.) Though this mammon of unrighteousness is not to be trusted to for happiness, yet it may and must be made use of in subserviency to our pursuit of that which is our happiness. Though we cannot find true satisfaction in it, yet we may make to ourselves friends with it, not by way of purchase or merit, but recommendation; so we may make God and Christ our friends, the good angels and saints our friends, and the poor our friends; and it is a desirable thing to be befriended in the account and state to come. (3.) At death we must all fail. Death eclipses us. A tradesman is said to fail, when he becomes a bankrupt; we must all thus fail shortly; death shuts up the shop, seals up the hand. Our comforts and enjoyments on earth will all fail us; flesh and heart fail. (4.) It ought to be our great concern to make it sure to ourselves, that, when we fail at death, we may be received into everlasting habitations in heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. v. 6. Bill.] Obligation, bond. 'These bonds, it seems, were kept in the hands of the steward; and of this, says Grotius, we have instances in the Roman law.'

BLOOMFIELD.

Verse 8.

The lord commended, &c.] Not for his iniquity, but for his policy; in this respect alone is it proposed for our imitation; for our Lord addeth, that 'the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light.' (Morg. Ref. v. 1.—Note, Eph. 5: 8—14.) In the choice of their object, they are emphatically foolish; but in the selection of means, in assiduity and perseverance, in subordinating every other concern to the favorite pursuit, and rendering every thing subservient to it; in politic contrivances to prevent disappointment, to get over untoward circumstances, and to elude advantages from them; in these and various other particulars, they are exceedingly 'wise in their generation;' yea, far wiser even than real believers, who are not so sincerely given up to the pursuit of their great object, nor so active, earnest, and persevering in the choice and use of means, in order to the attainment of it. Much more, then, are they wiser than men in general are about their religious concerns; and than professed Christians are in improving their advantages.—'The Lord seems in this place to teach us, that the good things pertaining to this present life were granted to us by God; not that we should, as proprietors, spend them according to our own will; but that we should dispose of them, as intrusted to us by the Lord, in entire faithfulness. The proper way of averting this doom (of unfaithfulness), procuring the continuance of our stewardship, and obtaining the means of greater beneficence, is, to make amends to the poor, by a charitable use of them. Thus it will come to pass, that God, perceiving that we more properly use those perishing things, will count us worthy of more valuable endowments.' Beza. The name annexed to this quotation, is a sufficient pledge that nothing inconsistent with the doctrines of salvation by grace, and justification by faith alone, was intended. But it proves, that the first reformers considered many practical instructions, and even a kind of language in inculcating them, consistent with these doctrines, of which many at present would scarcely admit. Psalm world are 'in their generation wiser than the children of light.'

[Practical Observations.]

9 And I say unto you, 'Make to yourselves friends' of the 'mammon of unrighteousness: that, when ye fail they may receive you 'into everlasting habitations.

10 He that is 'faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much.

The habitations in heaven are everlasting; not made with hands, but eternal, 2 Cor. 5: 1. Christ is gone before, to prepare a place for those that are his, and is there ready to receive them; and the poor saints, that are gone before to glory, will receive those that in this world distributed to their necessities. (5.) This is a good reason why we should use what we have in the world for the honor of God, and the good of our brethren, that thus we may with them lay up in store a good bond, or security, a good foundation for the time to come, for eternity. See 1 Tim. 6: 17-19, which explains this here.

2. With what arguments he presses this exhortation, he abounds in works of piety and charity.

(1.) If we do not make a right use of the gifts of God's providence, how can we expect those present and future comforts, which are the gifts of his spiritual grace? Our Savior here compares these, and shows that though our faithful use of the things of this world cannot be thought to merit any favor at the hand of God, yet our unfaithfulness in the use of them may be justly reckoned a forfeiture of that grace necessary to bring us to glory, v. 10-12.

[1.] The riches of this world are the less; grace and glory, the greater. Now if we be unfaithful in the less, if we use the things in this world to other purposes, than those for which they were given us, it may justly be feared that we shall be so in the gifts of God's grace, that we shall receive them also in vain, and therefore they will be denied us, v. 10. He that serves God, and does good, with his money, will serve God, and do good, with the more noble and valuable talents of wisdom and grace, and spiritual gifts, and the earnest of heaven; but he that buries the one talent of this world's wealth, will never improve the five talents of spiritual riches. God withhold his grace from covetous, worldly people more than we are aware of.

[2.] The riches of this world are deceitful and uncertain, the unrighteous mammon, hastening from us apace, of which, if we will, make any advantage, we must bestir ourselves quickly; but if we do not, how can we expect to be intrusted with spiritual riches, which are the only true riches? v. 11. Let us be convinced of this, that those are truly rich, and very rich who are rich in faith, and rich toward God, rich in Christ, in the promises, and in the earnest of heaven; and therefore let us lay up our treasure in them, expect our portion from them, and mind them in the first place, the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, and then, if other things be aided to us, use them with a spiritual reference; so that, by using them well, we may take the faster hold of the true riches, and be qualified to receive yet more grace from God; for God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, a free-hearted, charitable man, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy; (Eccl. 2: 26.) that is, to a man that is faithful in the unrighteous mammon. He gives the true riches.

[3.] The riches of this world are another man's; not our own, foreign to the soul, its nature and interest; not our own, for they are God's, his title to them is prior and superior to ours; the property remains in Him, we are but usufructuaries; they are another man's; we have them from others, use them for others, and must shortly leave them to others, we know not who. But spiritual and eternal riches are our own, (they enter into the soul that becomes possessed of them,) and inseparably; they are a

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8. All men are only stewards to the great Lord of all: yet alas! very few duly consider this; and numbers are continually 'accused to Him of having wasted his goods.' The Lord is also frequently calling on them, and reminding them that ere long, 'they must give account of their stewardship, and be no longer stewards.' If not prepared for that solemn event, the consequences will be awful beyond conception: we should therefore now seriously inquire, What shall we do, that when 'put out of our stewardship,' we may be received into a better habitation? The Lord Himself has shown us what we should do: and though we need the prudent foresight, yet we have no occasion for the dishonest policy, of the unjust steward; for the way of acceptance and of duty are plainly marked out for us.—The believer, though he knows that he can do nothing 'himself,' will yet 'work out his salvation with fear and trembling,' depending on God alone, 'for it is He that worketh in us to will and do, of his good pleasure.' The true believer also shows his faith in Christ by love to his brethren. Thus he attains 'a good hope through grace,' that 'everlasting mansions' are prepared for him, 'when flesh and heart shall fail.' But alas! in this respect, as well as in very many other instances, 'the children of this world are wiser in their generation, than the children of light;' and though the security and advantage to a man's present comfort, to his family, and in respect of eternity, of communicating gladly and largely to the relief of the necessitous, be demonstrable; yet how scantily do most professed Christians 'lend to the Lord,' in comparison of the sums wasted in needless embellishments, and indulgence, and in feasting the rich! (14: 12-14.) It would be well, if 'the children of light' would, on scriptural principles, learn wisdom from the men of the world: and, having chosen their object, pursue it as singly and constantly, as they do their worthless interests. In this case, what a privilege would wealth be! How much good might be done with it! How much honor would redound to the Gospel! How many thanksgivings would be rendered to the Lord! and how many prayers, by those whose souls and bodies were benefited, for the felicity of their benefactors! (2 Cor. 9: 8-15.) And with what satisfaction might 'the faithful steward' expect the hour of dissolution, or the coming of his Lord; and anticipate the joy of being then welcomed by such friends to the regions of perfect felicity!

SCOTT.

Verses 9-13.

The mammon of unrighteousness is those worldly riches which men hoard, as if they worshipped a deity called Mammon; and in setting, keeping, or spending of which, they commit all kind of unrighteousness. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. u. x.—Matt. 6: 24. 1 Tim. 6: 6-10, v. 9, 10.) Some indeed interpret the expression, of the deceitfulness of riches, which impose on those who expect happiness from them; and the clause, 'the Mammon of unrighteousness,' afterwards called, 'the unrighteous Mammon,' is exactly similar to that before rendered 'the unjust steward,' which is literally, 'the steward of unrighteousness.' The disciples of Christ, however, are directed to use riches, in 'making to themselves friends;' that is, to expend them in acts of piety and charity, that many, being benefited by them, may pray for blessings on them as their benefactors. This alludes to the steward's failing of his former resources, by being discharged from his place, yet, 'having made himself friends,' by his use of his master's property, 'he was received into their houses.' Thus, when the believer 'shall fail,' and be removed from his stewardship by death, those whom he has made his friends, by his charitable assistance, 'will receive him into everlasting habitations.' Not that this will in any measure merit that blessed recompense, or that the poor whom he has relieved can have the disposal of it; or that all whom he has relieved were pious persons, or all removed to heaven; but, as the cries of the oppressed and neglected poor will testify against unfaithful stewards to their condemnation, so the prayers of widows and orphans, for their pious benefactors, will testify for them, that they were faithful; and such believers who have died before them, may be considered as standing ready to welcome their benefactors to their everlasting habitations, when they quit this world. And if any man were 'faithful in a very little,' and consulted the will and honor of his Lord in the use of it, he would as certainly be accepted and rewarded, as if much had been committed to him; and the same disposer of mind would also render him faithful, if he should afterwards receive more. On the other hand, he who was unjust in the least, spending even small sums on his own vanity and indulgence, or wasting them through improvidence, and thus robbing God and the poor, would as certainly be condemned, as if he had been an unfaithful steward, in abusing a larger property; and the same temper of mind would render him unjust in much, if it were committed to him. Indeed, if men were unfaithful in 'the unrighteous mammon, who would commit to their trust the true riches?' 'The true riches' signify those blessings, which ennoble and satisfy the soul forever. Faith gives the sinner a title to these riches, and grace is the earnest of them and meetness for them; but faith and grace always render a man proportionably 'faithful in the unrighteous mammon.' If, therefore, a man spend his riches on himself, or hoard them in avarice, what evidence can he have that he is an heir of God through Christ? Or what reason to expect, that God will give him that eternal felicity? The verse indeed may signify, that they who were not faithful, as stewards of this world's riches, were improper persons to be made 'stewards of the mysteries of God,' to whom are committed the true riches, that they 'may make many rich.' If, however, any persons were unfaithful in the things intrusted to them for a time, and which an account must be rendered, how could they expect the Lord to give them at last an inheritance to be their own forever, by an unalienable tenure? (Marg. Ref. a-h.) This application of the parable our Lord closed by repeating a solemn warning, which has already been considered. (Matt. 6: 24.) 'At least he will attend to the one, and neglect the other.' Campbell.

(9.) When ye fail.—After your discharge. The word fail is obscure and indefinite; discharge not only bears a manifest reference to the act whereby a trustee is divested of his trust, but is also strictly applicable to our removal out of this world, which is the circumstance referred to.

mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?

12 And if ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?

13 No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon.

14 ¶ And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things; and they derided him.

15 And he said unto them, Ye are they which justify yourselves before men, but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is highly esteemed among men, is abomination in the sight of God.

16 The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and good part that will never be taken away from us. If we make Christ our own, the promises our own, and heaven our own, we have what we may truly call our own. But how can we expect God should enrich us with these, if we do not serve Him with our worldly possessions, of which we are but stewards?

(2.) We have no other way to prove ourselves the servants of God, but to give up ourselves so entirely to his service, as to make mammon, that is, all our worldly gain, serviceable to us in it; v. 13. If a man will love the world, and hold to that, it cannot be but he will hate God, and despise Him. He will make all his pretensions of religion truckle to his secular interests and designs, and the things of God shall be made to help him in serving and seeking the world; but, on the other hand, if a man will love God, and adhere to Him, he will comparatively hate the world, (whenever God and the world come in competition,) and despise it, and make all his business and success in the world some way or other conducive to his furtherance in the business of religion, serving God and working out his salvation. The matter is here laid plainly before us; he cannot serve God and mammon. So divided are their interests, their services can never be compounded. If therefore we be determined to serve God, we must disclaim and abjure the service of the world.

3. What entertainment Christ's doctrine met with among the Pharisees, and what rebuke He gave them.

(1.) They wickedly ridiculed Him, v. 14. Let us consider this, 1st, As their sin, and the fruit of covetousness, their reigning sin. Note, Many make a great profession of religion, have much knowledge, and abound in exercises of devotion, yet are ruined by love of the world; nor does anything harden the heart more against the word of Christ. These covetous Pharisees could not bear to have that touched, which was their Delilah, their darling lust; for this they derided Him: an expression of the utmost scorn; the Word of the Lord was to them a reproach, Jer. 6: 10. They laughed at Him for going so contrary to the opinion and way of the world, for endeavoring to recover them from a sin they were resolved to hold fast. Note, It is common for those to make a jest of the Word of God, who are resolved not to be ruled by it; but they will find at last it cannot be turned off so. 2dly, As his suffering. Our Lord endured not only the contradiction of sinners, but their contempt; they had Him in derision all the day. He that spake as never man spake, was bantered and ridiculed, that his faithful ministers, whose preaching is unjustly derided, may not be disheartened at it. It is no disgrace to a man, to be laughed at, but to deserve to be laughed at. Christ's apostles were mocked, and no wonder; the disciple is not greater than his Lord.

(2.) He justly reproved them; not for deriding Him, (He knew how to despise the shame,) but for deceiving themselves with the show of piety, while strangers to the power of it, v. 15. Here is,

[1.] Their specious nay, splendid outside. 1st, They justified themselves before men; denied whatever ill was laid to their charge, even by Christ Himself. They claimed to be looked upon as men of singular sanctity and devotion, and justified themselves in that claim, 'Ye are they that make it your business to court the opinion of men, and, right or wrong, will justify yourselves before the world; you are notorious for this.' 2dly, They were highly esteemed among men; men not only acquitted but applauded them, and had them in veneration, not only as good men, but as the best of men. Their sentiments were esteemed as oracles, their directions as laws, their practices as inviolable prescriptions.

[2.] Their odious inside, which was under the eye of God. Note, 1st. It is folly to justify ourselves before men, and to think it enough, that men know no ill of us; for God, who knows our hearts, knows that ill of us, no one else can. This ought to check our value for, and confidence in ourselves, that God knows our hearts, and how much deceit is there. 2dly, It is folly to judge of persons and things by the opinion of men, and to go down with the stream of vulgar estimate; for that which is highly esteemed among men, who judge according to outward appearance, is perhaps an abomination in the sight of God, who sees things as they are, and whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth. On the contrary, there are those whom men despise and condemn, who yet are accepted and approved of God, 2 Cor. 10: 18.

(3.) He turned from them to the publicans and sinners, as more likely to be wrought upon, v. 16. 'The Old-Testament dispensation was confined to you Jews, and you seemed to have the monopoly of righteousness and salvation; with this you are puffed up, and this gains you esteem among men, that you are students in the law and prophets; but since John, the kingdom of God is preached; a New-Testament dispensation, which values men not at all for their being doctors of the law; a kingdom into which every man, Gentile, as well as Jew, presses; and no man thinks himself bound to let his betters go in before him, or to stay till the rulers and the Pharisees have led the way. It is not so much a political, national constitution as the Jewish economy was, when salvation was of the Jews; but is made a particular, personal concern, and therefore every man that is convinced he has a soul to save, and an eternity to provide for, thrusts to get in, lest he should come short by trifling and complimenting.' Some give this sense of it; they derided Christ for speaking in contempt of riches, for, thought they, were there not many promises of riches and other temporal good things in the law and the prophets? And were not many of the best of God's servants very rich, as Abraham and David? 'True,' saith Christ, 'but now that the kingdom of God is begun to be preached, things take a new turn; now, blessed are the poor, the mourners, and the persecuted.' The Pharisees allowed the people in a cheap, easy, formal religion; 'But,' saith Christ, 'now that the Gospel is preached, the eyes of the people are opened, and as they cannot now have that veneration for the Pharisees they had, so they cannot content themselves with such indifference to religion as they have been trained up in, but press with holy violence into the kingdom of God.' Note, That they would go to heaven, must Verbs 14, 15.

The Pharisees were addicted to covetousness, in proportion as they desired to be thought exempt from licentiousness. (1, 2. Matt. 5: 27, 28, 31, 32.) When, therefore, they heard our Lord discourse in this manner on the use of riches, they treated his instructions with the utmost derision and contempt; sneering at Him, 'as a visionary, who did not understand human life, or only appeared to despise the world, because (as they supposed) it was out of his reach.' Doddridge. But He calmly replied to their disdain, that they indeed 'justified themselves' by various plausible pretences, and preserved a fair appearance before men; but 'God knew their hearts,' which were full of hypocrisy, pride, and wickedness; and, though their forms, austerities, superstitions and traditions were highly esteemed 'among men,' as if they were of great excellency; yet they were an 'abomination in the sight of God.' This is also the case with a variety of endowments, dispositions, and achievements, which men 'highly esteem,' but which God abhors: such, for instance, is the thirst for glory, the ambition of conquest, the desire of revenge, called a quick sense of honor; the disposition to grasp after riches as the grand object, if not attended with gross injustice or excessive penuriousness; and a lavish generosity, though not directed to any valuable purpose. In these and innumerable other instances God abhors what man highly esteems. SCOTT.

Verbs 16-18.

The Pharisees were very zealous for the ceremonial law, as well as for their own traditions; and they opposed Christ, supposing that his doctrine was contrary to it; but He intimated to them, that a more spiritual dispensation was about to be introduced. (Marg. Ref. o-q. —Matt. 11: 12-15.) They ought not, however, to suppose, that this new dispensation would interfere with the law of Moses. (Marg. Ref. r, s. —Matt. 5: 17-20.) The ceremonial law would not fail of being accomplished, in that great Antitype which it prefigured; and the moral law would be magnified by his obedience unto death, and established in its full authority by his religion, as well as vindicated from corrupt interpretations. (Note, Rom. 3: 29-31, v. 31.) But what they contended for as 'the law,' was frequently a perversion of it. This our Lord showed in one instance, which has been before considered; (Marg. Ref. t. —Matt. 5: 31, 32. 19: 3-9. Mark 10: 2-12.) for in this matter the real meaning of the moral law was contrary to the doctrine, which they grounded on a misinterpretation of a judicial regulation, a 'permission for the hardness of their heart.' So that, while they imposed on the people by an apparent zeal for the law, they were, in fact, supplanting its authority, and perverting its meaning by their traditions.

ed by similitudes borrowed from worldly things; but here, spiritual things themselves are represented in a narrative or description of the different state of good and bad, in this world and the other. We need not call it a history of a particular occurrence, it is matter of fact, true every day; that poor godly people, whom men neglect and trample on, die and go to heavenly bliss, made the more pleasant by preceding sorrows; and that rich epicures, who live in luxury, and are unmerciful to the poor, die and go into a state of insupportable torment, the more grievous and terrible, because of their sensual lives; and that there is no relief from their torments. The discourse, indeed, between Abraham and the rich man is only an illustration of the description, to make it the more affecting, like that between God and Satan in the story of Job. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9-18. Those who are in lower circumstances should not forget that they too are the Lord's stewards. Something almost all might spare, that is now wasted, with which to prove their faithfulness 'in a little'; and this would insure a gracious recompense, equally with the larger liberalities of our more wealthy brethren. But there are very many other things besides 'the unrighteous mammon,' in which they may prove themselves faithful or unfaithful. Some, being intrusted with a stewardship of the true riches, may in deep poverty be more useful, than those who are intrusted with great worldly riches; and need not aspire to or desire their advantageous situation. (1 Cor. 4:1, 2. 2 Cor. 6:3-10.) But surely they are unfit to be intrusted with 'the true riches,' who are 'unfaithful in the unrighteous mammon.' In vain do men attempt to serve two masters, or to worship God and Mammon: 'if the Lord be God,' let us decidedly serve Him, and devote all we have to his glory. (Josh. 24:14, 15. 1 Kings 18:21.)—When ministers discourse on such topics, the covetous will be sure to deride, if they do not revile them. But they little think how entirely the take pains, must strive against the stream, must press against the crowd that are going the contrary way.

(4.) Yet still He protests against any design to invalidate the law; v. 17. The moral law is confirmed and ratified, and not one tittle of that fails; the duties enjoined by it are duties still; the sins forbidden by it are sins still. Nay, the precepts of it are explained and enforced by the Gospel, and made to appear more spiritual. The ceremonial law is perfected in the Gospel, and its shades filled up with gospel-colors; not one tittle of that fails, for it is found printed off in the Gospel, where, though the force of it as a law is taken off, yet its figure as a type shines very bright; witness the epistle to the Hebrews. Some things were connived at by the law, for the preventing of greater mischiefs, of which the Gospel has indeed taken away the permission, but without any detriment or disparagement to the law, having thereby only reduced them to the primitive intention of the law, as in the case of divorce, (v. 18.) which we had before, Matt. 5:32. 19:9. Christ will not allow divorces, for his Gospel is intended to strike at the bitter root of men's corrupt appetites and passions, to kill them and pluck them up; and therefore they must not be indulged, for the more they are indulged, the more impetuous and headstrong they grow.

V. 19-31. As the parable of the prodigal son set before us the grace of the Gospel, encouraging us all; so this sets before us the wrath to come, and is designed for our awakening! and very fast asleep those are in sin, that will not be awakened by it. The Pharisees made a jest of Christ's sermon against worldliness; here, therefore, He intends to make those mockers serious. The tendency of the Gospel is both to reconcile us to poverty and affliction, and to arm us against temptations to worldliness and sensuality; both of which this parable, by drawing the curtain, and letting us see what will be the end in the other world, goes very far to accomplish.

In Christ's other parables, (except that of the sheep and goats,) spiritual things are represented by similitudes borrowed from worldly things; but here, spiritual things themselves are represented in a narrative or description of the different state of good and bad, in this world and the other. We need not call it a history of a particular occurrence, it is matter of fact, true every day; that poor godly people, whom men neglect and trample on, die and go to heavenly bliss, made the more pleasant by preceding sorrows; and that rich epicures, who live in luxury, and are unmerciful to the poor, die and go into a state of insupportable torment, the more grievous and terrible, because of their sensual lives; and that there is no relief from their torments. The discourse, indeed, between Abraham and the rich man is only an illustration of the description, to make it the more affecting, like that between God and Satan in the story of Job. Our Savior came to acquaint us with another world, and to show us the reference this world has to that; and here He does it.

In this description, (for so I call it,) observe I. The different condition of a wicked rich man, and a godly poor man, in this world. We know that, as some of late, so the Jews of old, were ready to make prosperity one of the marks of a true church, a good man, and a favorite of heaven, so that they could hardly have any favorable thoughts of a poor man. This mistake Christ, on all occasions, corrects, and here very fully; we have,

1. A wicked man, one that will be forever miserable, in the height of prosperity; (v. 19.) There was a certain rich man, from the Latin we commonly call him Dives—a rich man; but, as Bp. Tillotson observes, he has no name gives him, as the poor man, because it had been invidious to name any particular rich man in such a description as this, and apt to provoke ill-will. But others observe, that Christ would not do the rich man so much honor as to name him. This rich man, (1.) Was clothed in purple, and fine linen, for pleasure, clean, no doubt, every day. He had purple for state, for that was the wear of princes; whence some conjecture that Christ had an eye to Herod in it. (2.) He fared sumptuously every day. His table was furnished with all the varieties and dainties of nature and art; his side-table richly adorned with plate, his servants, who waited at table, in rich liveries, and the guests at his table, no doubt, such as he thought graced it.

Well, what harm in all this? It is no sin to be rich, to wear purple and fine linen, nor to keep a plentiful table, if a man's estate will afford it. Nor are we told that he got his estate by fraud, oppression, or extortion, no, nor that he was drunk, or made others drunk; but, [1.] Christ would hereby show that a man may have great wealth, and pomp, and pleasure of this world, and yet perish forever under God's wrath and curse. We cannot infer from men's living great, either that God loves them in giving them so much, or that they love God for it; happiness consists not in these things. [2.]

That plenty and pleasure are a very dangerous, and to many a fatal temptation to luxury, sensuality, and forgetfulness of God and another world. This man might have been happy, if he had not had great possessions and enjoyments. [3.] That the indulgence of the body, and the ease and pleasure of that, are the ruin of many a soul. It is true, eating good meat and wearing good clothes are lawful; but it is as true, that it often becomes the food of pride and luxury, and so turns into sin to us. [4.] That feasting ourselves and friends, and, at the same time, forgetting the poor and afflicted, are very provoking to God and damning to the soul. The sin of this rich man was not so much his dress or his diet, but his providing for himself only.

servant of God disregards their contempt and ridicule, and pities their ungodly prosperity. Some indeed of this character are zealous professors of evangelical truth: and if ministers preach against covetousness, or exhort to liberality, they 'justify themselves' by a variety of excuses, and so make the matter out 'before men' as well as they can: but God knows the wickedness of their hearts; and to Him it must be left, when we have reminded them, that 'those things which are highly esteemed among men, are abomination in the sight of God,' as is every thing exalted, self-sufficient, or haughty. Persons of this description are commonly the bitterest enemies to the power of godliness: and while those, who know the worth and the danger of their souls, are pressing through difficulties and temptations into the kingdom of God; they are objecting to the doctrine or exhortations of faithful ministers, and explaining away those Scriptures which run counter to their sins; 'making void the law' of God by their own notions or traditions, and attempting to prejudice better disposed persons against the truth.

Beggar.] 'In the time of Christ, beggars were found sitting in the streets, at the doors of the rich, at the gates of the temple, and the entrance of synagogues; though there is no reason to suppose that there existed then that class of persons called vagrant beggars, found at the present day in the East, and more frequently in Europe. The first express mention of mendicants in the Bible, is in Psalms. See Ps. 109:10. Moses made abundant provision for the poor; but it does not appear that he says any thing in respect to beggars.'

man. He was poor, but poor in spirit, contentedly poor. He did not lie at the rich man's gate, complaining, and bawling, and making a noise, but modestly desiring to be fed with the crumbs. This miserable man was a good man, in favor with God. Note, It is often the lot of some of the dearest of God's saints to be greatly afflicted in this world, while wicked people prosper, and have abundance; see Ps. 73: 7, 10, 14. Here is a child of wrath and an heir of hell sitting in the house, faring sumptuously; and a child of love and an heir of heaven, lying at the gate, perishing for hunger. And is men's spiritual state to be judged of then by their outward condition? 2dly. The temper of the rich man toward him; we are not told that he abused him, forbid him his gate, or did him any harm, but it is intimated that he had no concern for him. Here was a real object of charity, and a very moving one. A little thing would be a great kindness, and yet he took no cognizance of the case. Note, It is not enough not to oppress and trample on the poor; we shall be found unfaithful stewards of our Lord's goods in the great day, if we do not succor and relieve them. The reason given for the most fearful doom is, I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat. I wonder how those rich people who have read the Gospel of Christ, and say that they believe it, can be so unconcerned as they often are, in the necessities and miseries of the poor and afflicted!

2. The usage he had from the dogs; The dogs came and licked his sores. The rich man kept a kennel of hounds, it may be, or other dogs, for his diversion, and those were fed to the full, when poor Lazarus could not get enough to keep him alive. Note, It is a great aggravation of the uncharitableness of many rich people, that they bestow that on their fancies and follies, which would supply the necessity, and rejoice the heart, of many a good Christian in distress. Those offend God, nay, put contempt on human nature, that pamper their dogs and horses, and let the families of their poor neighbors starve. Now those dogs came, and licked the sores of poor Lazarus; which may be taken, 1st. As an aggravation of his misery. His sores were bloody, which tempted the dogs to come and lick them, as they did the blood of Naboth and Ahab, 1 Kings 21: 19. And we read of the tongue of the dogs dipped in the blood of enemies, Ps. 68: 23. They attacked him while he was yet alive, as if he had been already dead, and he had not strength himself to keep them off, nor would any of the servants be so civil as to check them. The dogs were like their master, and thought they fared sumptuously when they regaled themselves with human gore. Or, it may be taken, 2dly. As some relief to him in his misery; the master was hard-hearted to him, but the dogs, more kind, came and licked his sores, which mollified and eased them.

II. The different condition of this godly poor man, and this wicked rich man, at, and after death.

Crumbs. 'Anciently, they made no use of napkins, but wiped their hands [which they dipped into the dishes] with the soft and fine part of the bread; this they afterwards threw to the dogs.'

Abraham's bosom. The joys of heaven are here represented as a feast; Abraham, 'the father of the faithful,' is placed, as it were, at the head of the table; so that 'Abraham's bosom' denotes a place in [542] heaven near to that distinguished patriarch, and intimates that the poor man was an eminent believer, a saint of superior excellency.

The Jews, as well as Romans, reclined on couches at table, the upper part of the body resting upon the left elbow. Some say the worthiest reclined first,—Lightfoot says in the middle; the next in dignity lay with his head reclining on the bosom of the first; (John 13: 23.) and hence the phrase, to be in Abraham's bosom, to signify the highest state of felicity, next to that of Abraham himself. BURDEN.

1. They both die; v. 22. Death is the common lot of rich and poor godly and ungodly; there they meet together. One dieth in his full strength, and another in the bitterness of his soul; but they lie down alike in the dust, Job 21: 26. Death favors not the rich man for his riches, or the poor man for his poverty; it concerns both to prepare for it. Death blends the sceptre with the spade. Saints die, that they may bring their sorrows to an end, and may enter on their joys. Sinners die, that they may go to give up their account.

2. The beggar died first. God often takes godly people out of the world, when He leaves the wicked to flourish still. It was an advantage to the beggar, that such a speedy end was put to his miseries; and since he could find no other shelter or resting-place, he was hid in the grave, where the weary are at rest.

3. The rich man died, and was buried. Nothing is said of the interment of the poor man; they dug a hole any where, and tumbled his body in, without any solemnity; nay, it is well if they that let the dogs lick his sores, did not let them gnaw his bones. But the rich man had a pompous funeral, lay in state, had a train of mourners to attend him to his grave, and a stately monument set up over it; probably, he had a funeral oration in praise of him, and the good table he kept, which those would commend, that had been feasted at it. It is said of the wicked man, that he is brought to the grave with no small ado, and laid in the tomb, and the clouds of the valley, were it possible, are made sweet to him, Job 21: 32, 33. How foreign is the ceremony of a funeral to the happiness of the man!

4. The beggar died, and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. How much did the honor done to his soul, by this convey of it to its rest, exceed the honor done to the rich man, by the carrying off his body with so much magnificence to its grave! Observe, (1.) His soul existed in a state of separation from its body. It did not die, or fall asleep, with the body, but lived, and acted, and knew what it did, and what was done to it. (2.) His soul removed to another world, to the world of spirits; it returned to God who gave it, to its native country; this is implied in its being carried; the spirit of a man goes upward. (3.) Angels took care of it; it was carried by angels. They are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation, not only while they live, but when they die. One angel, one would think sufficient, but here are as many as were sent for Elijah. Amasis, king of Egypt, had his chariot drawn by kings; but what was that honor to this? Saints ascend in the virtue of Christ's ascension; but this convey of angels is added for state and decorum, saints shall be brought home, not only safely, but honorably. The angels were not shy of touching Lazarus, for his sores were not on his soul; that was presented to God, without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. 'Now, blessed angels,' said a good man just expiring, 'now come, and do your office.' (4.) It was carried into Abraham's bosom. The Jews expressed the happiness of the righteous at death, three ways; they go to the garden of Eden; they go to be under the throne of glory; and they go to the bosom of Abraham; and this our Savior here makes use of. Abraham was the father of the faithful; and whither should the souls of the faithful be gathered but to him, who, as a tender father, lays them in his bosom, especially at their first coming, to bid them welcome, and to refresh them when newly come from the sorrows and fatigues of this world? He was carried to his bosom, that is, to feast with him, for at least the guests are said to lean on one another's breasts; and the saints in ment, and they are the eyes of his mind that are lifted up. This same aggravation of the miseries of the damned we had before; (ch. 13: 28.) Ye shall see Abraham, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out. To see Abraham, we should think a pleasing sight; but to see him afar off, was a tormenting sight. Near himself he saw devils and damned companions, frightful sights, and painful; afar off he saw Abraham. Every sight in hell is aggravating. That same Lazarus whom he had looked upon with so much contempt, as not worthy his notice, he now sees preferred, and to be envied. This brought to his mind his own cruel and barbarous conduct toward him, and the sight of him in that happiness made his own misery the more grievous.

III. What passed between the rich man and Abraham in the separate state—a state of separation one from another, and of both from this world. It is probable there will not be, nor are, any such dialogues or discourses between glorified saints and damned sinners, yet it is very proper, and what is usually done in descriptions, especially such as are designed to be pathetic and moving, to represent, by such dialogues, what will be the mind and sentiments both of the one and the other. And since we find damned sinners tormented in the presence of the Lamb, (Rev. 14: 10.) and the faithful servants of God looking on them that have transgressed the covenant, there where their words die not, and their fire is not quenched. (Isa. 66: 23, 24.) such a discourse as this is not incongruous to be supposed. In it we have,

1. The request the rich man made to Abraham for some mitigation of his present misery; (v. 24.) he cried to him, cried aloud, as one in earnest, one in pain and misery, mixing shrieks with his petitions, to enforce them by moving compassion. He that used to command aloud, now begs aloud; louder than ever Lazarus did at his gate. The songs of his riot and revels are all turned into lamentations. Observe,

(1.) The title he gives Abraham: Father Abraham. Note, There are many in hell, that can call Abraham father; that were Abraham's seed after the flesh; nay, that were, in name and profession, children of the covenant made with Abraham. Perhaps this rich man, in his carnal mirth, had ridiculed Abraham and the story of Abraham, as the scoffers of later days do; but now he gives him a title of respect, Father Abraham. Note, The day is coming, when wicked men will be glad to become acquainted with the righteous, and to claim kindred to them, though now they slight them. Abraham in this description represents Christ, for to Him all judgment is committed, and it is his mind that Abraham here speaks. Those that now slight Christ, will shortly make their court to Him, Lord, Lord.

Verses 24—26.

It is not needful to determine, whether condemned spirits actually know or see what takes place in the realms of bliss; the representation is intended to show the hopeless misery, to which they are reduced. The Jews were prone to confide in their relation to Abraham, even though not partakers of his faith; (Marg. Ref. o.—Matt. 3: 7—10. John 8: 30—40. v. 33, 37, 39.) and when the rich man in hell claimed him for his father, Abraham did not deny the relation, yet showed him no compassion. The rich man despaired of mercy from God, yet cried to Abraham to have mercy on him; as if Abraham had been more merciful than his Maker, and was either able or willing to favor and help the irreconcilable enemies of God! This is the only scriptural instance of a prayer, offered to a departed saint, and it gives small encouragement to that prevalent species of idolatry. (24.) Drop the tip, &c. A man scorched by intense heat, and parched with exquisive thirst, might crave such a small and momentary alleviation; thus this poor, condemned sinner sought a transient abatement of his exquisite misery; being all he could hope for. His desire that Lazarus might be sent, may either intimate, that he retained his haughty spirit in his deepest misery, or a conviction that Lazarus had been a benevolent man, who wished him well, and was glad to do any one a service when he had it in his power; or, as some think, he considered Lazarus under obligation to him for his charitable donations. (Marg. Ref. p.—v. 25.) Us and you. Both of them were finally and eternally fixed in their respective states, by the unchangeable decrees of God. (Marg. Ref. y.) Many in different ages have endeavored, as it were, to fill up or make a bridge over this great gulf; and multitudes have wished them success in the enterprise, as this was their only hope of escaping the rich man's doom; but it has been and must be forever as vain as his expectation of a drop of water from Lazarus.

(2.) The representation of his deplorable condition; I am tormented in this flame. He complains of the torment of his soul, and therefore of such a fire as will operate on souls; and such a fire the wrath of God is, fastening on a guilty conscience; such a fire horror of mind is, and the reproaches of a self-accusing, self-condemning heart. Nothing is more painful and terrible to the body, than to be tormented with fire; by that, therefore, the miseries and agonies of damned souls are represented.

(3.) His request in consideration of this misery; Have mercy on me. Note, The day is coming, when those that make light of divine mercy, will beg hard for it. O for mercy, mercy, when the day of mercy is over, and offers of mercy are no more made. He that had no mercy on Lazarus, yet expects Lazarus should have mercy on him. The particular favor he begs is, Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue.

[1.] Here he complains of the torment of his tongue particularly, as if he were more tormented there than in any other part, the punishment answering the sin. The tongue is one of the organs of speech, and by the torments of that he is put in mind of all the wicked words he had spoken against God and man; his cursing, and swearing, and blasphemy, all his hard speeches, and filthy speeches; by his words he is condemned, and therefore in his tongue he is tormented. The tongue is also one of the organs of tasting; and therefore the torments of that will remind him of his inordinate relish of the delights of sense, which he had rolled under his tongue. [2.] He desires a drop of water to cool his tongue. He does not say, "Father Abraham, send for me to thy bosom;" unsanctified souls do not, cannot, truly desire the happiness of heaven; nay, he does not say, "Father Abraham, order me a release from this misery, help me out of this pit;" for he utterly despair'd of that; but he asks as small a thing as could be asked, a drop of water to cool his tongue for one moment. [3.] He desires that Lazarus might bring it. He names him, because he knows him, and thinks Lazarus, therefore, will not be unwilling to do him this good office. Grotius here quotes Plato describing the torments of wicked souls, and among other things he saith, They are continually raving on those whom they have murdered, or been any way injurious to, calling on them to forgive them the wrongs they did them. Note, There is a day coming, when those that now hate and despise the people of God would gladly receive kindness from them.

2. The reply of Abraham to this request. In general, he did not grant it. He would not allow him one drop of water to cool his tongue. Note, The damned in hell shall not have any the least abatement or mitigation of their torment. If we now improve the day of our opportunities, we may have a full and lasting satisfaction in the streams of mercy; but if we now slight the offer, it will be in vain in hell to expect the least drop of mercy. See how justly this rich man is paid in his own coin: He that denied a crumb, is denied a drop. Now it is; said to us, Ask, and it shall be given you; but if we let slip this accepted time, we may ask, and it shall not be given us. But this is not all; Abraham

(1.) Calls him son; a kind and civil title, but here it only aggravates the denial which shut up a father's bowels of compassion from him. He had been a son, but a rebellious one, site thirst, might crave such a small and momentary alleviation; thus this poor, condemned sinner sought a transient abatement of his exquisite misery; being all he could hope for. His desire that Lazarus might be sent, may either intimate, that he retained his haughty spirit in his deepest misery, or a conviction that Lazarus had been a benevolent man, who wished him well, and was glad to do any one a service when he had it in his power; or, as some think, he considered Lazarus under obligation to him for his charitable donations. (Marg. Ref. p.—v. 25.) Us and you. Both of them were finally and eternally fixed in their respective states, by the unchangeable decrees of God. (Marg. Ref. y.) Many in different ages have endeavored, as it were, to fill up or make a bridge over this great gulf; and multitudes have wished them success in the enterprise, as this was their only hope of escaping the rich man's doom; but it has been and must be forever as vain as his expectation of a drop of water from Lazarus.

26 And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence.

[Practical Observations.]

27 Then he said, I pray thee therefore, father, that thou wouldest send him to my father's house:

1 Sam. 25:36. Ps. 49:14. Mal. 3:19. 2 Thes. 1:4-10. Jam. 1:11, 12. 19:50. Ps. 50:22. Mat. 23:45. Jam. 3:28. 2 Cor. 1:9. Rev. 22:10.

wouldst not accept? He is here reminded, [1.] That from us they [the sinners] received their good things. Not he had given them, but he had received them. Remember what a bountiful benefactor God has been to thee, how ready to do thee good; thou canst not therefore say, He owes thee any thing, no, not a drop of water. What He gave thee, thou receivedst, and that was all; thou never gavest Him a receipt for them, in a thankful acknowledgment of them, much less didst thou ever make any grateful return for them, or improvement of them: thou hast been the grave in which God's blessings were buried; not the field, in which they were sown. Thou receivedst thy good things; and usedst them, as if they had been thine own, and thou wert not at all accountable for them. Or rather, they were the things thou didst choose for thy good things, thy best things, didst content thyself with, and portioned thyself in, and hadst no thought of better things in another life, and therefore hast no reason to expect them. The day of thy good things is past and gone, and now is the day of thine evil things, of recompense for all thine evil deeds. Thou hast already had the last drop of the cup of mercy, that thou couldst expect to fall to thy share; and there remains nothing but trials of wrath without mixture. [2.] Remember, too, what evil things Lazarus received. Thou hadst as much good as could fall to the lot of so good a man, and he as much evil as could fall to the lot of so good a man. He received his evil things: received them patiently from the hand of God, as Job did: (Job. 2:10.) he received them as physic appointed for the cure of his spiritual distempers, and the cure was effected. As wicked people have good things only in this life, and at death are forever separated from all good; so godly people have evil things only in this life, and at death they are forever put out of the reach of them. Now Abraham, by putting him in mind of both together, awakening his conscience to remind him how he had behaved toward Lazarus, when revelling in his good things, and Lazarus greening under his evil things; he cannot forget that then he would not help Lazarus, and how could he expect Lazarus should now help him? Had Lazarus in his life-time afterward grown rich, and he poor, Lazarus would have thought it his duty to relieve him, and not have upbraided him with former unkindness; but in the future state of recompense and retribution, those that are now dealt with, both by God and man, better than they deserve, must expect to be rewarded every man according to his works.

(3.) He puts him in mind of Lazarus' present bliss, and his own misery, that by comparing one thing with another, he might observe the incomprehensibility of God, in recompensing tribulation to them who trouble his people, and to those who are troubled, rest, 2 Thess. 1:6, 7. Observe, [1.] Heaven is comfort and bliss; torment: heaven is joy, hell is weeping and mourning, and pain in perfection. [2.] The soul, as soon as it leaves the body, goes immediately to heaven or hell, to comfort or torment, and does not sleep, or go into purgatory. [3.] Heaven will be heaven indeed to those that go thither through many and great calamities in this world; of those that had grace, but little of the comfort of it here. In heaven there is everlasting consolation. And, on the other hand, hell will be hell indeed to those that go thither from the midst of the enjoyment of all the delights and pleasures of sense; to them the torture is the greater, as temporal calamities are described to be to the tender and delicate woman, Deut. 28:56.

[4.] He assures him that it was to no purpose to think of any relief by the ministry of Lazarus: for (17, 26.) Besides all this, worse yet, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, an impassable one; a great chasm, that so there can be no communication between glorified saints and damned sinners. [1.] The

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19-26. It is most astonishing, that any man can read this chapter, and profess to believe it to be 'the Word of God,' and continue to spend his life in those very courses, of which the consequences are so awfully and expressly declared! Yet, what numbers are there, in our prosperous cities, of these 'rich men!' and how many more would there be, if men could attain the objects of their wishes! Multitudes go to the utmost limits of their ability, nay, beyond what they can afford; and then fret continually to see themselves outdone by their more prosperous neighbors!—What person of common sense would deliberately prefer the rich man's lot, in life, death, and eternity, to that of Lazarus? yet how few prefer 'suffering affliction with the people of God, to the enjoyment of the pleasures of sin for a season?' Heb. 11:24-26. 'Let no man deceive himself.' He who said, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away,' has here stated, that when any one dies, his soul immediately is received into heavenly felicity, or cast into the fire of hell: that whilst the bodies of rich sinners are entombed, often with the vain ostentation of the survivors, 'they lift up their eyes in hell, being in torment;' that neither God, nor saints, nor angels, will show them any more mercy; that even pious parents, who here prayed for and wept over their children, will hereafter approve of their final condemnation: that not the least mitigation of their misery can be obtained; that with the dying sinner's breath all his hopes expire, and an end is put to all 'his good things;' and that 'a great gulf is fixed,' and all escape rendered forever impossible.—Plausible objections to these truths, or direct contradictions of them, may be advanced; and those 'who speak according to the oracles of God,' will be ridiculed and reviled, as melancholy or malevolent men: for numbers feel it their interest, (according to the tenor of their present conduct,) that any view of this subject should be true, rather than that of revelation: but when one after another dies, and 'lifts up his eyes in hell,' he awfully finds whose words have been accomplished, the Lord's, or those of such as dared to contradict Him. Instead, therefore, of presumptuously speculating on the brink of this tremendous precipice, let us copy the example of those, who fled from the gaping earth, 'lest it should swallow them up also.' Num. 16:34. If there were only a per- adventure of sinking into everlasting misery, or of obtaining eternal life; a wise man would surely relinquish (if needful) the greatest affluence, submit to abject poverty, and endure far severer miseries than those of Lazarus, without a murmur or hesitation. But the matter is as certain as the Word of 'God who cannot lie.' And should the Lord call the believer to poverty, pain and sickness, He will not leave him comfortless. Nay, should want or neglect (which rarely happens) even shorten his life, the believer will only be the sooner removed from 'his evil things,' and introduced to the enjoyment of complete felicity: so that, in every possible case, they, and they only, 'are blessed, who have the Lord for their God.' (Ps. 84:11, 12. P. O.)

(25.) Five brethren. They are represented as thus indulging themselves on earth, while he [the rich man] was in a place of torment. This fully proves the separate state between death and judgment; unless any man can think that our Lord would decorate a parable, in a manner suited to mislead the upright inquirer. It is intimated in this representation, that the rich man died young: for nothing is said of a family left behind him, and his brethren are supposed to continue together in their father's house, as joint heirs of his estate. We cannot imagine that there is any clarity, or even natural affection in hell; we must therefore either consider this as a mere circumstance, intended to introduce the subsequent instruction, or else we must conclude that they, whose exalted discourse, or seductive have led others into infidelity, impiety, and profligacy, will be rendered more miserable hereafter, by the upbraidings of those whose souls they have murdered; they would therefore most anxiously prevent their destruction, for fear of an addition to their own intolerable misery. Many admired writers would now be willing to publish recantations of their apostical, berelical, or licentious works; many actors would wish to come on the stage again, to act a different part from those, by which they informed the passions, and corrupted the principles and morals of mankind; and many false teachers, to innuendate and defend a more sacred creed, than once they propagated. For men will be accommodate for all the effects of their conduct, however wicked they may spread, or fatally they may last. Circumstances occur to every one, which sufficiently evince, that temptations, arguments, or communications can effect no repentance, without the special grace of God renewing the sinner's heart (1 Sam. 25:11-25.)

sinner is made to know that the sentence they are under is just, and they cannot alleviate their own misery by making any objection against it. And since he cannot obtain a drop of water to cool his tongue, we may suppose he gnawed his tongue for pain, as those on whom one of the vials of God's wrath is poured out, Rev. 16: 10. But he will improve his opportunity of speaking to Abraham, for his relations whom he had left behind.

(1.) He begs that Lazarus might be sent on an errand to his father's house, v. 27. And in this request he is importunate; 'I pray thee. O deny me not this.' When he was on earth, he might have prayed, and been heard, now he prays in vain. 'Therefore, because thou hast denied me the former request, surely thou wilt be so compassionate as not to deny this: or, Therefore, because there is a great gulf fixed, seeing there is no getting out hence when they are once here, O send to prevent their coming hither.' or, 'Though there is a great gulf fixed between you and me, yet since there is no such gulf fixed between you and them, send him thither. Send him back to my father's house; he knows well enough where it is, has been there many a time, having been denied the crumbs that fell from the table. He knows I have five brethren there; if he appear to them, they will know him, and will regard what he saith, for they knew him to be an honest man; let him testify to them; let him tell them what condition I am in, and that I brought myself to it by my luxury and sensuality, and my unmercifulness to the poor; let him warn them not to tread in my steps, nor to go on in the way wherein I led them, and left them, lest they also come into this place of torment,' v. 28. Some observe, that he speaks of five brethren only, whence they infer he had no children, else he would have mentioned them, and then it was an aggravation of his uncharitableness, that he had no children to provide for. Now he would have them stopped in their sinful course. He does not say, 'Give me leave to go, he knew there was a gulf fixed, and despaired of a permission so favorable to himself: his going would frighten them; but, 'Send Lazarus, whose address will be less terrible, and yet his testimony sufficient.'

Now he desired the preventing of their ruin, partly in tenderness to them, for whom he could not but retain a natural affection, and partly in tenderness to himself; for their coming to him, to that place of torment, would but aggravate kindest saint in heaven cannot make a visit to the congregation of the dead and damned, to comfort or relieve any there, who once were their friends. 'They that would pass from hence to you, cannot; they cannot leave beholding the face of their Father, nor the work about his throne, to fetch water for you; that is no part of their business.' [2.] The most daring sinner in hell cannot force his way out of that prison, cannot get over that great gulf. They cannot pass to us, that would come from thence: It was not to be expected, for the door of mercy is shut, the bridge is drawn; there is no coming out on parol or bail, no, not for one hour. In this world, blessed be God, there is no gulf fixed between a state of nature and grace, but we may pass from one to the other, from sin to God; but if we die in our sins, if we throw ourselves into the pit of destruction, there is no coming out. It is a pit in which there is no water, and out of which there is no redemption. The decree and counsel of God have fixed this gulf, which all the world cannot unfix. This abandons this miserable creature to despair; it is now too late for any change of his condition, or any the least relief: it might have been prevented in time, but it cannot now be remedied to eternity. The state of damned sinners is fixed by an irreversible and unalterable sentence.

3. The further request to his father Abraham; not for himself, his mouth is stopped, and he has not a word to say in answer. Damned his misery, as did the sight of Lazarus. When partners in sin come to be sharers in woe, as tares bound in bundles for the fire, they will be a terror to one another.

(2.) Abraham denies him this favor too. There is no request granted in hell. Those who make the rich man's praying to Abraham, a justification of their praying to departed saints, as they are far to seek for proofs, when the practice of a damned sinner must be valued for an example, so they have little encouragement to follow the example, when all his prayers were made in vain. Abraham leaves them to the ordinary means of conviction and conversion; they have the written Word, which they may read and hear read; 'Let them attend to that sure word of prophecy, for God will not go out of the common method of his grace for them.' Here is their privilege; They have Moses and the prophets, and their duty; 'Let them hear them, and mix faith with them, and that will be sufficient to keep them from this place of torment.' By this it appears that there is sufficient evidence in the Old Testament, in Moses and the prophets, to convince those that will hear them impartially, that there is another life after this, and a state of rewards and punishments for good and bad men.

(3.) He urges his request yet further, v. 30. 'It is true, they have Moses and the prophets, and would they but regard them, it would be sufficient; but they do not, they will not; yet it may be hoped, if one went to them from the dead, they would repent; this would be a new thing, and more startling. Note, Foolish men are apt to think any method of conviction better, than that which God has chosen and appointed.

(4.) Abraham insists on the denial of it, with a conclusive reason, v. 31. 'If they regard not the public revelation, which is confirmed by miracles, neither would they be wrought upon by a private testimony to themselves.' [1.] The matter was long since settled on trial, that God should speak by Moses and such prophets, and not by immediate messengers from heaven. Israel chose it in mount Sinai, because they could not bear the terrors of such expresses. [2.] A messenger from the dead could say no more than what is said in the Scriptures, nor with more authority. [3.] There would be every jot as much reason to suspect that to be a cheat and a delusion, as to suspect the Scriptures to be so, and much more; and infidels in one case would certainly be so in another. [4.] The same strength of corruption that breaks through the convictions of the written Word, would certainly triumph over those by a witness from the dead; and though a sinner might be frightened at first by such a testimony, when the fright was over, he would soon return to his hardness. [5.] The Scripture is now the ordinary and sufficient way of God's making known his mind to us; and it is presumption for us to prescribe any other way, nor have we any ground to expect or pray for the grace of

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 27-31. It is vain to imagine, that other evidence, or means of instruction, would induce men to repentance, while they neglect 'the Word of God,' the best and the only means of converting souls, which God has promised to bless and prosper. Though the witness of saints or angels is great, the witness of God is greater: 'the same things are testified to in the sacred Scriptures, which would be told us by 'one that should come from the dead.' He that rejects this testimony, 'makes God a liar,' and further proof would be improper: an apparition might produce a greater temporary alarm, but it would not afford so solid and permanent a ground of conviction; and therefore if men 'believe not Moses and the prophets, neither would they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.' Instead then of indulging unwarranted speculations, let every one take heed to the sure Word of truth, and pray to God for that new heart and humble spirit, without which all means must prove ineffectual: and let us conclude by seriously inquiring, 'What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?' (P. O. Matt. 16: 21-28.)

SCOTT.

(31.) If they hear not, &c. 'It is true, Moses no where expressly asserts a future state of rewards and punishments; yet the facts recorded by him strongly enforce the natural arguments in proof of it, and the prophets speak plainly of it in many places. (See Ps. 16: 9-11. 17: 15. 23: 6. 49: 14, 15. 73: 17. Prov. 14: 32. Eccl. 3: 17-21. 11: 9. 12: 7, 13, 14, and Ezek. 18: 19-21.)'

Which injury has been done to our Savior's instructions, by ill-judged attempts to improve and strengthen them. In this parable, many, dissatisfied with its simplicity, and to vindicate the Judge from the charge of severity, would load the rich man with all the crimes that can blacken hum in nature. But for this they have no authority, and in doing it they pervert the design of the parable; which is, to admonish us, not that a waster of wickedness shall be punished in another world, but that the man who, though not chargeable with doing much ill, does little or no good, and who, though not perhaps intemperate, or sensual, is yet careless about the situation of others, and exists only for the gratification of himself, the indulgence of his own appetites and vanity, shall not escape punishment. It shows the danger of living in the neglect of duties, though not chargeable with the commission of crimes; and particularly, the danger of considering the gifts of Providence as our own property, and not as a trust from our Creator, to be employed in his service, [i. e. in doing his will], and for which we are accountable to Him. These appear to be the reasons for which our Lord has here shown the evil of a life which, so far from being universally detested, is, at this day but too much admired, envied, and imitated.

CAMPBELL.

CHAP. XVII.

Jesus teaches his disciples carefully 1 to avoid giving offences, 1, 2; and to forgive one another, 3, 4. Being asked by the apostles to increase their faith, He shows the power of faith, 5, 6; and that man's best obedience is to have faith in God, 7-10. He cleanses ten lepers; of whom one only, and he a Samaritan, returns to give thanks to God, 11-19. The spiritual nature of being "sons of God," 20-22. The sinner in which it was about to be washed, and with the ruin of all who are saved, it, 23-37.

THEN said he unto the disciples, 'It is impossible but that offences will come; but woe unto him through whom they come!

2 It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones.

3 Take heed to yourselves: if thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him.

4 And if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him.

5 And the apostles said unto the Lord, Increase our faith.

6 And the Lord said, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye might say unto this sycamore-tree, Be thou

God to work on us in any way abstracted from that, and when that is rejected. What our Savior here said, was soon after verified in the unbelieving Jews, who would not hear Moses and the prophets, Christ and the apostles, and then would not be persuaded, though Lazarus rose from the dead; (and perhaps it was with some eye to him, that Christ named this poor man Lazarus;) nay, they consulted to put Him to death, and did put Him that raised him, to death, and would not be persuaded by Him neither, though He also rose from the dead. When Eutychus was raised to life, the people that were present continued to hear Paul preach, but did not turn to inquire of him, Acts 20: 10, 11. Let us not therefore desire visions and apparitions, nor seek to the dead, but to the law and to the testimony, (Isa. 1: 19, 20.) for that is the sure word of prophecy, which we may depend on.

CHAP. XVII. v. 1-10. We are here taught, I. That the giving of offences is a great sin, which we should every one of us carefully watch against and avoid, v. 1, 2. We can expect no other than that offences will come, considering the perverseness and frowardness of man's nature, and the wise purpose and counsel of God, who will carry on his work even by those offences, and bring good out of evil. But the doom of him, through whom the offences come, will be more terrible than that of the worst of the malefactors, condemned to be thrown into the sea, for they perish under a load of guilt more ponderous than that of millstones, v. 2.

This speaks a woe, 1. To persecutors, who discourage any the least of Christ's little ones, or endanger their apostasy. 2. To seducers, who corrupt the truths and ordinances of Christ, and so trouble the minds of the disciples. 3. To those who, under the profession of the Christian name, live scandalously, and thereby weaken the hands, and sadden the hearts of God's people: for by all these, offences come, and it is no abatement of their guilt, nor will be any of their punishment, that it is impossible but offences will come.

II. That we should every one of us make conscience of forgiving offences, (v. 3.) Take heed to yourselves. This may refer either to what goes before, or to what follows. Ministers must be very careful not to say or do any thing that may discourage weak Christians; and they ought to speak and act very considerately, for fear of this: or, 'When your brother trespasses against you, is necessary to any damage done you in your property or reputation, take heed lest you be put into a passion; lest, when provoked, you speak unadvisedly, and rashly vow revenge, Prov. 24: 29. Take heed what you say at such a time, lest you say amiss.'

1. 'If permitted to rebuke him, you are advised to do so. Smother not the resentment, but give it vent; show him wherein he has not done well nor fairly by you, and, it may be, you will perceive (and you must be very willing to perceive) that you mistook him, that it was not a trespass against you, or not designed, but an oversight, and then you will be glad his pardon for misunderstanding him;' as Josh. 22: 30, 31.

2. 'You are commanded, on his repentance, to forgive him, and to be perfectly reconciled to him; if he repent, forgive him; forget the injury, never think of it again, much less upbraid him with it. Though he do not repent, you must not therefore bear malice to him, or meditate revenge; but if he do not at least say that he repents, you are not bound to be so free and familiar with him as you have been. If guilty of gross sin, to the offence of the Christian community he is a member of, let him be gravely and mildly reproved for his sin, and, in his repentance, received into friendship and communion again.' This the apostle calls forgiveness, 2 Cor. 2: 7.

3. 'You are to repeat this every time he repeats his trespass, v. 4. If he could be supposed to be either so negligent, or so impudent, as to trespass against thee seven times in a day, and as often professes himself sorry for his fault, and promises not again to offend in like manner, continue to forgive him.' To err is human. Note, Christians should be of a forgiving spirit, willing to make the best of every body, and all about them easy; forward to extenuate faults, and not to aggravate them, and should contrive as much to show that they have forgiven an injury, as others to show that they resent it.

III. That we all need to get our faith strengthened, because, as that grace grows, all other graces grow. The more firmly we believe the doctrine, and the more confidently we rely on the grace of Christ, the better it will be with us every way. Now observe here,

1. The address the disciples made to Christ, for the strengthening of their faith, v. 5. The apostles themselves, so they are here called, though prime ministers of state in Christ's kingdom, yet acknowledged the weakness and deficiency of their faith, and saw their need of Christ's grace for the improvement of it: they said unto the Lord, 'Increase our faith, and perfect what is lacking in it. Let the discoveries of faith be more clear, the desires more strong, the dependences more firm and fixed, the dedications more entire and resolute, the delights more pleasing.' Note, We should earnestly desire and pray for increase of faith. Some think they pray to Christ on occasion of his pressing on them the duty of forgiving injuries; 'Lord, increase our faith, or we shall never be able to practise such a difficult duty.' Faith in God's pardoning mercy will enable us to get over the greatest difficulties that lie in the way of forgiving our brother. Others think it was on some other occasion, as Matt. 17: 16, &c. To Him that blamed them they must apply themselves for grace to mend them.

2. The assurance Christ gave them of the wonderful efficacy of true faith; (v. 6.) 'With faith as a grain of mustard-seed,—so small or so sharp,—so pungent, so exciting to all other graces, as mustard to the animal spirits, you might do wonders much beyond what you now do; nothing would be too hard for you, that were fit to be done for the glory of God, and the confirmation of the doctrine you preach, yea, though it were the transplanting of a tree from the earth to the sea.' See Matt. 17: 20. As with God nothing is impossible, so are all things possible to him that can believe.

IV. That whatever we are in Christ's service, we must be very humble, not imagining we can

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. v. 3, 4. 'This contains a strong and important intimation, how much sin and scandal is occasioned by a severe, quarrelsome temper in the disciples of Christ; as it not only sires up the corruptions of those with whom they contend, but leads others to think meanly of our assistance, which has so little efficacy to soften and sweeten the temper of those who maintain it.' Doddridge. (3.) 'forgive, &c.' (Matt. 6: 12, 14, 15. 18-35.) We are required to forgive those who do not repent, so as to pray for them, and to wait for an opportunity of doing them good: but our friendly intercourse with such as have been evidently injurious, and obstinately persist in evil, and our confidence in them, or esteem of their character, must necessarily be in some measure interrupted. (Marg. Ref. 6: 27-38. 1 Sam. 26: 28-31. Matt. 5: 43-48. Rom. 12: 14-21.) Scott.

Verses 5, 6.

The apostles perceived the excellency, and the difficulty of the command prescribed to them; and that faith was the principle from which must proceed: they therefore besought Jesus to 'increase their faith.' (Mark 9: 16-24. v. 24.) True faith is 'the gift of God,' and the work of his power; nor can it be conceived possible for one mere man, or creature, so to influence the mind of another, by any direct act of power, as to produce faith, where it did not before exist, or to increase it when weak and wavering. (Marg. Ref. 1-1 Cor. 2: 3-5. Eph. 2: 4-10. v. 8.)

Heb. 12: 2, 3. According, therefore, to the system of Arians and Socinians, our Lord would have repented the disciples for attributing too much to Him; but, on the contrary, his answer evidently implied an approbation of their petition; and was a further recommendation to them of that powerful principle, to which 'all things are possible.' The idea of a tree being planted, taking root, and growing, in the unstable ocean, is a most emphatical figure to represent to us, that by faith 'we may do all things, through Christ who strengtheneth us.' (Marg. Ref. k.—Notes, Matt. 17: 19-21. 21: 21, 22. Mark 11: 22-26. 2 Cor. 12: 7-10.) (5.) 'Increase our faith.' 'Add to us faith.' (3: 20. Matt. 6: 27. Acts 2: 41.) 'Give us faith; and if we have any true faith, add to it, and increase our faith.' Scott.

(6.) This sycamore. 'Probably the same as the sycamore. The tree falsely so called with us, is the acer majus, greater maple. The true sycamore is the ficus Pharaonis, or Ægyptia; Pharaoh's, or Egyptian fig-tree; called also, from its similitude in leaves and fruit, plucked up by the root and be thou planted in the sea, and it should obey you.

7 But¹ which of you, having a servant ploughing, or feeding cattle, will say unto him by and by, when he is come from the field, Go and sit down to meat?

8 And wilt not rather say unto him, 'Make ready wherewith I may sup,' and gird thyself, and serve me, till I have eaten and drunken; and afterward thou shalt eat and drink?

9 Doth he thank that servant because he did the things that were commanded him? I trow not.

10 So likewise ye, when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do.

[Practical Observations.]

11 ¶ And it came to pass as he went to Jerusalem, that he merit any favor, or claim it as a debt; even the apostles, who did so much more than others for Christ, must not think they had thereby made Him their debtor.

1. We are all God's servants; (his apostles and ministers are so in a special manner;) and, as servants, are bound to do all we can for his honor; our whole strength and time are to be employed for Him; for we are not our own, nor at our own disposal, but at our Master's.

2. As God's servants, it becomes us to fill up our time with duty, and we ought to make the end of one service the beginning of another, v. 7, 8.

3. Our principal care here must be to do the duty of our relation, and leave it to our Master to give us the comfort of it, when and how He thinks fit. No servant expects that his master should say to him, Go and sit down to meat; it is time enough to do that, when we have done our day's work. Let us be in care to finish our work well, the reward will come in due time.

4. It is fit Christ should be served before us, v. 8. Doubting Christians say they cannot give Christ the glory of his love as they should, because they have not yet obtained the comfort of it; but this is wrong; first, let Christ have the glory of it, and then we shall have the comfort of it, and in that is a feast.

5. Christ's servants, when they are to wait on Him, must free themselves from every thing entangling or encumbering, and fit themselves by a close application of mind to go on, and go through, with their work. When we have made ready for Christ's entertainment, we must then gird ourselves, to attend Him. This is expected from servants, and Christ might require it from us, but He does not insist on it. He came not, as other masters, to take state, and to be ministered unto, but to minister; witness his washing his disciples' feet.

6. Christ's servants do not so much as merit his thanks for any service they do Him: 'Doth He thank that servant?' Doth he reckon Himself indebted to him for it? By no means.' No good works of ours can merit any thing at the hand of God. We expect God's favor not because we have by our services made Him a debtor to us, but because He has by his promises made Himself a debtor to his own honor, and that we may plead with Him, but let Him more.

7. Whatever we do for Christ, though more perhaps than some others, yet it is no more than our duty. Though we should do all things that are commanded us, and alas! in many things we come short of that, yet there is no work of supererogation, it is but what we are bound to by that first and great commandment, of loving God with all our heart and soul, which includes the utmost.

8. The best servants of Christ, even when they do the best services, must humbly acknowledge, that, though they are not those unprofitable servants that bury their talents, and shall be cast into utter darkness, yet as to Christ, and any advantage that can accrue to Him by their services, they are unprofitable: our goodness extendeth not to God, nor, if we are righteous, is He the better, Ps. 16: 2. Job 22: 2. 35: 7. God cannot be a gainer by our services, and therefore cannot be made a debtor by them. He has no need of us, nor can our services make any addition to his perfections; it becomes us therefore to call ourselves unprofitable servants, but to call his service a profitable service, for God is happy without us, but we are undone without Him.

V. 11-19. We have here an account of the cure of ten lepers, which we had not in any other of the evangelists. The Jews supposed leprosy to be inflicted for the punishment of some particular sin, and to be, more than other diseases, a mark of God's displeasure; therefore Christ, who came to take away sin, and turn away wrath, took particular care to cleanse the lepers He met. Christ was now in his way to Jerusalem, about mid-way, in the frontier country between Samaria and Galilee, where He had little acquaintance, in comparison with what He had either at Jerusalem or in Galilee. He went that road to find out and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-10. We should fear, more than even a violent and ignominious death, every action, which may prejudice men against the Gospel, or stumble so much as one weak believer: and we ought to 'abstain from all appearance of evil,' in every case when we can do it without committing real evil. We should be harmless in all things, do good to all men as we are able, and 'take heed to ourselves' not to yield to resentment against such as injure us. If our brother has trespassed against us, we should privately and meekly expostulate with him; and if he repent, cordially forgive him, and be reconciled to him, without insisting rigorously on satisfaction: nay, if this should be repeated many times in a day, we must not allow our animosity to be interrupted by it, provided the private wrong do not involve in it a public scandal; for thus the peace of the church, the good of souls, and the honor of God and his Gospel, may best be promoted, to which all other considerations should be subordinated.—But this strict precept is replete with encouragement to the humble believer. He is often betrayed, more than 'seven times a day,' into those things, which need repentance and forgiveness; and this consciousness, which covers him with shame, would also sink him into dejection, did he not recollect that his gracious Lord would not require him so constantly to forgive his offending brother, were He not ready also in like manner to forgive his offendin^g children. This will by no means encourage him to sin, but rather 'lead him to repentance;' (Note, Rom. 2: 4-6.) yet it will support him, in his painful conflict, while he grieves that 'he cannot do the things that he would,' (P. O. Matt. 18:—) When we would imitate the example of our forgiving Lord, or perform any duty which runs counter to corrupt nature, we shall perceive our need of faith, and be led to look unto Jesus, both as the Author and the Object of faith: beseeching Him to increase that precious grace, on which the exercise of all others depend: nor will the Lord refuse to answer this request.—All men are bound to be the servants of the great Creator, and to devote all their time and powers to Him; and are justly condemned, for not doing 'all those things which are commanded.' But, as Christians, we are servants to our redeeming God, and bound to obedience by immensely superior obligations. We should therefore serve Him in our several places, without intermission; and every personal interest or indulgence should be postponed, and give place to his glory and command: yet at last we merit no reward, and have nothing to boast of, but must humbly confess our guilt in every instance, in which we have come short of this perfect obedience. But were it possible for a man to serve God as Paul did, or even as Gabriel does, and then to become exalted in an opinion of his own worthiness, this would tarnish all, and he would 'fall into the condemnation of the devil.' How horribly impious then, how sacrilegious must it be, for sinners to boast of their poor, polluted services, as if they could atone for their sins, make God their Debtor, purchase heavenly felicity, or even merit for others also!

Verses 7-10.

The connection between strong and lively faith, with its practical effects, and deep humility, is here pointed out. The Lord has such a property in every creature, as no man can have in another; and He can never be indebted to us for our most constant and unremitted services. The obedience of angels, who 'do all that is commanded them,' and that perfectly, leaves them 'unprofitable servants,' who have only done their duty, without having at all benefited the Lord, or conferred any favor on Him. (Rom. 11: 33-36) The services of redeemed sinners, therefore, who are under peculiar obligations to obedience, who do no good thing except by his grace, and who 'in many things offend all,' can never deserve recompense, or give any ground for boasting, or in any way be profitable to God. (Marg. Ref.—Job 22: 1-4. Ps. 16: 2, 3. Matt. 25: 24-30.) Here Christ destroys two 'doctrines of the schools; the merit of good works, and works of supererogation.' Whitby.

(8.) Gird thyself. A common practice with servants, while waiting on their masters; alluded to by Horace and Anacreon.

passed through the midst of Samaria and Galilee.

12 And as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten men that were lepers, which stood afar off:

13 And they lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us.

14 And when he saw them, he said unto them, 'Go shew yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that as they went, they were cleansed.

15 And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God;

16 And fell down on his face at his feet giving him thanks: and he was a Samaritan.

17 And Jesus answering, said, Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine?

18 There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger.

19 And he said unto him, Arise, go thy way: thy faith hath made thee whole.

[Practical Observations.]

* 5:12, 18:13, Lev. 13:45-46, Num. 5:2, 3, 12:14, 2 Kings 5:27, 7:3, 2 Chr. 26:20, 21, 15:35, 39. Matt. 9:27, 15:22, 20:30, etc. these lepers; He is found of them that sought Him not. Observe,

1. Their address; they were ten in a company; shut out from society with others, yet at liberty to converse with one another.

They did not stay till Christ had refreshed Himself after the fatigue of his journey, but met Him as He entered the town, weary as He was; and yet He did not put them off.

They stood afar off, knowing that by the law their disease obliged them to keep their distance. A sense of our spiritual leprosy should make us very humble in all our approaches to Christ. Who are we, that we should draw near to Him that is infinitely pure? We are impure.

2. Their request was unanimous, and very importunate; (v. 13.) They lifted up their voices, being at a distance, and cried, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. Those that expect help from Christ, must take Him for their Master, then He will be Jesus, a Saviour, and not otherwise. They ask not in particular to be cured of their leprosy, but, Have mercy on us; it is enough to refer ourselves to the compassions of Christ, for they fail not. The fame of this Jesus, (though He had not been much conversant in that country,) encouraged them to apply to Him.

3. Christ sent them to the priest, to be inspected by him, who was the judge of the leprosy. He did not tell them positively that they should be cured, but hid them go shew themselves to the priests, v. 14. This was a trial of their obedience, and it was fit it should be so tried, as Naaman's in a like case, Go wash in Jordan. Note, Those that expect Christ's favors, must take them in his way and method. Some of these lepers, perhaps, would be ready to quarrel with the prescription; but, overruled by the rest, they all went to the priest. While the ceremonial law was yet in force, Christ took care it should be observed, and its reputation kept up, and due honor paid to the priests in things pertaining to their function: but, probably, a further design was, to have the priest's judgment of, and testimony to, the perfectness of the cure; and that the priest might be awakened, and others by him, to inquire after One that had such power over diseases.

4. As they went, they were cleansed, and so became fit to have a certificate from the priest that they were clean. Observe, We may expect God to meet us with mercy, when found in the way of duty. If we do what we can, God will not be wanting to do that for us which we cannot. Go, attend on instituted ordinances, can, and pray, and read the Scriptures; Go shew thyself to the priests; go and open thy case to a faithful minister; and though the means will not heal thee of thyself, God will heal thee in the diligent use of those means.

5. One of them, and but one, returned to give thanks, v. 15. When he saw that he was healed, instead of going to the priest, to be by him declared clean, and so discharged from his confinement, which was all that the rest aimed at, he turned back to Him who was the Author of his cure, whom he wished to have the glory of it, before he received the benefit of it. He appears to have been very hearty and affectionate in his thanksgivings; With a loud voice, as in his prayers, (v. 13.) he glorified God, acknowledging it to come originally from Him. He also made a particular address of thanks to Christ; (v. 16.) and put himself into the most humble, reverent posture he could. Note, We ought to give thanks for the favors Christ bestows on us, particularly for recoveries from sickness; and to be speedy in it, lest time wear out the sense of the mercy. It becomes us also to be very humble in thanksgivings, as well as prayers. The seed of Jacob, like him, should own themselves less than the least of God's mercies, when they have received them, as well as when in pursuit of them.

6. Observe, (1.) The particular notice Christ took of the Samaritan, of the grateful return he made, and the ingratitude of those that were sharers with him in the mercy, v. 17, 18. How rich Christ is in doing good. Were there not ten cleansed? Note, There is an abundance of healing, cleansing virtue in the blood of Christ, sufficient for all patients. We shall have never the less grace for others' snaring it. How poor we are in our returns; 'Where are the nine?' This intimates that ingratitude is a very common sin. Of the many that receive mercy from God, few, very few, scarcely one in ten, return to give thanks, in a right manner, according to a Gen. 3:9, Ps. 106:13, John 8:7-10. Rom. 12:1. b Ps. 22:1, 50:23, Is. 42:12, Rev. 14:7. c Matt. 8:10, 11, 15:24-28, 19:30, 20:16. d 7:30, 8:48, 18:42, Matt. 9:22, Mark 5:34, 10:52.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11-19. Through pride came ingratitude to God into the world. Of the pumberless multitudes, who have been created, are upheld by his power, and feast on his bounty, how few are thankful for his goodness! When vice and folly bring sickness on men, and the Lord in mercy again restores their health, most of them immediately use their returning vigor, in adding to their former provocations. (Note, Ps. 107: 17-22. P. O. 1-22.) Even of those, who cry unto Him in distress, and entreat Him mercifully to spare them, how few afterwards 'praise Him for his goodness,' and live to his glory! Of those whom ministers visit in sickness, and who give some indications of repentance, how large a proportion, when they recover answer to their prayers, live only to disappoint their expectations! In this case it may generally be said, 'Were there not ten healed? But where are the nine?' And of those, who enjoy the best means of grace, and make some general profession of seeking mercy from Jesus, how few are there, who glorify God by living according to that profession! All this springs from the want of a broken heart, a deep sense of their need of free salvation, real reliance on Christ, and earnest, frequent, persevering application to Him to cleanse them from the leprosy of sin. For when a man is convinced that he must forever be excluded from the company of God and his saints, unless he be cleansed by the divine Savior, he will heartily seek mercy, by using the means of grace, and observe the Lord's directions in humble expectation: and when he experiences the comfort of his forgiveness, and the power of his new-creating Spirit, he will glorify God, and most thankfully adore the gracious Savior. This is the source of gratitude in our sinful hearts; it springs from deep humility and lively faith, and it produces fervent praises and cheerful obedience. Thus strangers are brought nigh to the Lord; poor Samaritans shame and condemn proud Israelites; those who have greatly sinned, love much, because much hath been forgiven them; and whilst they give the whole praise to the Lord, He delights in communicating comfort to them. (P. O. 7: 39-50.)—And let us not forget that we cannot 'honor the Father,' except we honor his beloved Son; and that when we bow to Jesus in adoring gratitude, we most acceptably give glory to God. Scott.

Verses 11-19.

'Marg. Ref. 1-Matt. 8: 1-4, Mark 1: 40-44.) At some place on the confines of Galilee and Samaria, these lepers met Christ in his last circuit; having a general belief of his power to perform the miracle (of their cure.) The priests would not have attended to the case of a Samaritan, and he could not be admitted to offer the appointed sacrifices at the temple; but he took the proper method of showing his gratitude. Probably, the Samaritan alone believed in Jesus, as the Messiah, the Savior of sinners; and this faith, united with a consciousness of his own unworthiness, produced the difference in his conduct. He was therefore dismissed, with the assurance that his faith had saved him; the others obtained this outward cure, he alone the spiritual blessing. (Marg. Ref. 1-Matt. 8: 4-5, Acts 4: 5-12.) The connection between 'returning' to give thanks to Jesus, and 'giving glory to God,' is peculiarly to be observed. It is probable; that the others, at the temple, gave thanks to God for their recovery; but they disregarded Jesus, their immediate Benefactor. (John 5: 20-23.) Scott (12.) Afar off. 'These lepers, being excluded from cities, &c., met Christ as He was entering the town, outside the gate. From the rabbinical passages cited by Wetstein and Schoettgen, it appears that the rabbins were not agreed as to the distance lepers must keep from others. Some said, four cubits; others, an hundred.' Bloomfield.

(16.) 'Triller observes that it was customary with sick persons, (especially the poor,) on recovery, to cast themselves down and embrace the knees of their physician; as we find from Hippocrates and Seneca.' L.

20 ¶ And when he was demanded of the Pharisees, ^a when the kingdom of God should come; he answered them and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with ^{*} observation.

21 Neither shall they say, 'Lo here! or, Lo there! for, behold, ^a the kingdom of God is [†] within you.

22 And he said unto the disciples, The days will come, ^a when ye shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and ye shall not see it.

the benefit done them, and those often prove most grateful, from whom it was least expected. A Samaritan gives thanks, and a Jew does not. Thus many who profess revealed religion, are outdone, and quite ashamed, by some that are governed only by natural religion, not only in moral virtue, but in piety and devotion. This serves here to aggravate the ingratitude of those Jews of whom Christ speaks, as taking it very ill that his kindness was so slighted. And it intimates how justly He re- sents the ingratitude of the world of mankind, for whom He had done so much, and from whom He has received so little.

(2.) The great encouragement Christ gave him, v. 19. The rest had their cure, and not revoked, as justly it might have been, for their ingratitude, though they had such a good example; but he had his cure confirmed particularly with an encomium; Thy faith hath made thee whole. The rest were made whole by the power of Christ, in compassion to their distress, and in answer to their prayer; but he by his faith, in which Christ saw him differentiated from the rest. Note, Temporal mercies are then doubled and sweetened, when fetched in by the prayers and returned by the praises of faith.

V. 20-37. We have here a discourse concerning the kingdom of God, that is, the kingdom of the Messiah, now shortly to be set up, and of which there was great expectation.

I. The Pharisees' demand concerning it; they asked when it should come; forming a notion of it as a temporal kingdom, which should advance the Jewish nation above all nations: they were impatient to hear some tidings of its approach; they understood perhaps that Christ had taught his disciples to pray for its coming, and they had long preached that it was at hand; 'Now,' say the Pharisees, 'when will that glorious view open? When shall we see this long-looked-for kingdom?'

II. Christ's reply to that demand, directed to the Pharisees first, and afterwards to his own disciples, who knew better how to understand it; (v. 22.) what He said to both, he saith to us.

1. That the kingdom of the Messiah was to be a spiritual kingdom, not temporal and external. They asked when it would come. 'You know not what you ask,' saith Christ; 'it may come, and you not be aware of it.' (1.) 'It will have a silent entrance, without pomp, without noise; it cometh not with observation, — with outward show.' As to the time of it, Christ gives them no answer, but will have their mistakes rectified, concerning its nature; 'The times are secret things, which belong not to you: but the great intentions of this kingdom, those are things revealed.' When Messiah the Prince comes to set up his kingdom, they shall not say, Lo here, or, Lo there, as when a prince goes to visit his territories, it is in every body's mouth, he is here, or he is there. Christ will not thus come, nor will the court of his kingdom be here or there; as it respects the country men are of, or the place they dwell in. Those who confine Christianity to place or party, cry, Lo here, or, Lo there, than which nothing is more contrary to its design; so do they who make prosperity and external pomp a mark of the true church. (2.) 'It has a spiritual influence; The kingdom of God is within you.' It is not of this world: (John 18: 36.) its glory strikes not men's fancies, but affects their spirits; its power is over their souls and consciences; from them it receives homage, and not from their bodies only. The kingdom of God will not change men's outward condition, but their hearts and lives; then it comes, when it makes those humble, serious and heavenly, who were proud, vain, and carnal; when it weans those from the world, that were wedded to the world; and therefore look for the kingdom of God in the revolutions of the heart, not of the civil government. The kingdom of God is among you; so some read it. 'You inquire when it will come, and are not aware that it is already begun to be set up in the midst of you.'

The Gospel is preached, it is confirmed by miracles, it is embraced by multitudes, so that it is in your nation, though not in your hearts.' Note, It is the folly of many curious inquirers concerning the times to come, that they look for that before them, which is already among them.

2. That the setting up of this kingdom would meet great opposition and interruption, v. 22. The disciples thought they should carry all before them, and expected a constant series of success; but Christ tells them it would be otherwise; 'The days will come, before you have finished your testimony, and done your work, when you shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man,' (one such a day as we now have,) 'of the prosperity and progress of the Gospel, and shall not see it.' At first, indeed, you will have wonderful success; (so they had, when thousands were added to the church in a day;) but do not think it will be always so; no, you will be persecuted and scattered, silenced and imprisoned.' This looks forward to his disciples, in after-ages; they must expect much disappointment. Ministers and churches will sometimes be under outward restraints. Then they will wish to see such days of opportunity as they formerly enjoyed: those are days of the Son of man; in which we hear from Him, and converse with Him; the time may come, when we may in vain wish for such days. God teaches us to know the worth of such mercies by the want of them; it concerns us while they are continued, to improve them, and in the years of plenty to lay up in store for the years of famine. They will not always have such tokens of the presence of the Son of man, as they have sometimes had; the Spirit is withdrawn from them, they see not their signs, there is great stupidity among the children of men, and great lukewarmness among the children of God; then we would wish to see such victorious, triumphant days of the Son of man as we have sometimes seen, when He has ridden forth with his bow and his crown, conquering and to conquer, but we cannot see them. Note, Christ's church and cause are not lost, because not always alike visible and prevailing.

3. That Christ and his kingdom are not to be looked for in this or that particular place, but his appearance will be general in all places at once, v. 23, 24. 'They will say to you, See here, or, See there; here is one will deliver the Jews out of the hands of the oppressing Romans, or there is one will deliver the Christians out of the hands of the oppressing Jews; here is the Messiah, and there is his prophet. Here in this mountain, or there at Jerusalem, you will find the true church. Go not after them, or follow them; do not heed such suggestions; the kingdom of God was not designed to be the glory of one people only, but to give light to the Gentiles; for as the lightning that lightens out of one part under heaven, shines all on a sudden, irresistibly, to the other part under heaven; so shall also the Son of man be in his day.' (1.) 'The judgments that are to destroy the Jewish nation, and deliver the Christians from them, shall fly like lightning through the land; and those marked for this destruction, can no more avoid or oppose it, than they can a flash of lightning.' (2.) 'The Gospel that is to set up Christ's kingdom in the world, shall fly like lightning through the nations; the kingdom of the Messiah is not to be a local thing, but is to be dispersed far and wide over the whole earth; it shall shine from Jerusalem to all parts about, and that in a moment; the kingdoms of the earth shall be leavened by the Gospel, ere they are aware.' The trophies of Christ's victories shall be erected on the ruins of the devil's kingdom, even in those countries that could never be subdued by the Roman yoke. The design of setting up Christ's kingdom, was not to make one nation great, but to make all nations good; some at least, of all nations; and this point shall be gained, though the nations rage, and the kings of the earth set themselves with all their might against it.

4. That the Messiah must suffer before He must reign ; v. 25. His disciples must expect no other than to suffer and be rejected for his sake. They thought of having the kingdom of the Messiah set up in external splendor ; 'No,' saith Christ, 'we must go by the cross to the crown. The Son of man must suffer many things ; pain, and shame, and death, are those many things ; He must be rejected by this generation of unbelieving Jews, before He be embraced by another generation of believing Gentiles ; that his Gospel may have the honor of triumphing over the greatest opposition from those who ought to have given it the greatest assistance ; and thus the excellency of the power will appear to be of God, and not of man ; for though Israel be not gathered, yet He will be glorious to the ends of the earth.'

5. That the setting up the kingdom of the Messiah would introduce the destruction of the Jewish nation, whom it would find in a deep sleep of security, and drowned in sensuality as the old world was in the days of Noah, and Sodom in the days of Lot, v. 26, &c. Observe,

(1.) How it had been with sinners formerly. Concerning both these, [1.] They had fair warning of the ruin coming on them for their sins. Noah was a preacher of righteousness to the old world, so was Lot to the Sodomites : they gave them timely notice of what would be in the end of their wicked ways, and that it was not far off. [2.] They did not regard the warning, but were very secure, went on in their business as unconcerned as you could imagine ; ate, drank, indulged themselves in pleasures, and took no care of any thing, but to make provision for the flesh ; counted on the perpetuity of their present flourishing state, and therefore married, and were given in marriage ; all very merry ; yet very busy too ; they bought, sold, planted, builded : lawful things, but the fault was, they minded these inordinately, so that they had no heart to prepare against the threatening judgments, when they should have been, as the men of Nineveh, fasting and praying, repenting and reforming, upon warning given them. [3.] They continued in their security ; sensuality, till the threatened judgment came ; until the day Noah entered into the ark, and Lot went out of Sodom, nothing said or done to them served to alarm or awaken them. Note, The stupidity of sinners in a sinful way, though as strange as it is inexcusable, yet we are not to think strange, for it is not without example. It is the old way that wicked men have trodden, that have gone slumbering to hell, as if their damnation slumbered while they did. [4.] God took care for the preservation of those that were his, who believed and feared, and took the warning themselves, which they gave to others. Noah entered into the ark, and there was safe ; Lot went out of Sodom, and so out of harm's way. If some run on heedless and headlong to destruction, that shall be no prejudice to the salvation of them that believe. [5.] They were surprised with the ruin which they would not fear, and swallowed up in it, to their unspeakable horror and amazement. The flood came, and destroyed all the sinners of the old world ; fire and brimstone came, and destroyed all the sinners of Sodom. God has many arrows in his quiver, and uses which He will, in making war upon his rebellious subjects, for He can make which He will effectual. But it is especially intended, here, to show what a dreadful surprise destruction will be to the secure and sensual.

(2.) How it will be with sinners still ; v. 30. When Christ comes to destroy the Jewish nation by the Roman armies, the generality of that nation will be found under such a reigning security and stupidity as this. They have warning given by Christ now, and will have it repeated by the apostles after Him ; but it will be all in vain. They will continue secure, will go on in their neglect and opposition of Christ and his Gospel, till all the Christians are withdrawn from among them, and gone to the place of refuge. God will provide for them on the other side Jordan, and *when a deluge of judgments shall flow in, which will destroy all the unbelieving Jews. One would have thought that this discourse of our Savior's, which was public, and not long after published to the world, should have awakened them ; but it did not, for the hearts of that people were hardened, to their destruction. In like manner, when Christ shall come to judge the world, at the end of time, sinners will be found in the same secure and careless posture, altogether regardless of the judgment approaching, which will therefore come on them as a snare ; and in like manner sinners of every age go on securely in their evil ways, and remember not their latter end, nor the account they must give. Woe to them that are thus at ease in Zion.

6. That it ought to be the care of his disciples and followers, to distinguish themselves from the unbelieving Jews in that day, and leaving them, their city and country, to themselves, to flee at the signal given, according to the direction that should be given ; let them retire, as Noah to his ark, and Lot to his Zoar. You would have healed Jerusalem, as of old Babylon, but she is not healed, and therefore forsake her, flee out of the midst of her, and deliver every man his soul, Jer. 51: 6, 9.

(1.) Their flight from Jerusalem must be expeditious, and not retarded by any concern about their worldly affairs, v. 31. It will be their concern to do as Lot and his family were charged to do ; Escape for thy life. Save yourselves from this uncared generation.

(2.) When they have made their escape, they must not think of returning, v. 32. 'Take warning ; not only flee, but persevere in your flight ; be not loath to leave a place marked for destruction, whomsoever or whatsoever you leave behind.' Those who have left the Sodom of a natural state, let them go forward, and not so much as look a kind look towards it again. Lot's wife was turned into a pillar of salt, a lasting monument of God's displeasure against apostates, who begin in the spirit and end in the flesh.

(3.) There would be no other way of saving their lives than by quitting the Jews, and if they thought to save themselves by a coalition with them, they would find themselves mistaken, v. 33. Note, Those do best for themselves that trust God in the way of duty.

7. That all good Christians should certainly escape, but many of them very narrowly, from that destruction, v. 34-36. When God's judgments are laying all waste, He will take an effectual course to preserve those that are his, by remarkable providences distinguishing between them and others that were nearest to them. Note, Though the sword devours one as well as another, and all things seem to come alike to all ; yet, sooner or later, it shall be made to appear that the Lord knows them that are his, and them that are not, and how to take out the precious from the vile. We are sure the Judge of all the earth will do right ; and therefore, when He sends a judgment, on purpose to avenge the death of his Son upon those that crucified Him, He will take care that none of those who glorified Him, and gloried in his cross, shall be taken away by that judgment.

Lastly, That this distinguishing, dividing, discriminating work shall be done in all places, as far as the kingdom of God shall extend, v. 37. Where, Lord ? They had inquired concerning the time, and He would not gratify that curiosity ; they therefore ask another question, 'Where, Lord ? Where shall those be safe, that are taken ? Where shall those perish, that are left ?' The answer is proverbial, and may be explained so as to answer each side of the question ; Whosoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together. (1.) Wherever

CHAP. XVIII

The parable of the unjust judge, and the importunate widow, shewing that men should pray without fainting. 1.—8. That of the Pharisee and the publican, 9.—14. ¹ Jesus receives and blesses little children, shewing that his disciples should be like them, 15.—17. He detects the covetousness of a young ruler; shows the dangers of riches; and promises great rewards to those who forsake things present for his sake, 18.—30. He foretells his own sufferings, death, and resurrection, 31.—34. He opens the eyes of a blind man, 35.—43.

AND he spake a parable unto them to this end, ^a that men ought always to pray, ^b and not to faint;

2 Saying, There was in a ^c city a judge, ^d which feared not God, neither ^e regarded man:

3 And there was ^a a widow in that city; and she came unto him, saying, 'Avenge me of mine adversary.'

4 And he would not for a while: but afterward ^e he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man;

the wicked are, who are marked for perdition, they shall be found out by the judgments of God. The Jews having made themselves a dead and putrefied carcass, odious to God's holiness and obnoxious to his justice, wherever any of that unbelieving generation is, the judgments of God shall fasten on them, as the eagles do on the prey: Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies, (Ps. 21: 8.) though they set their nests among the stars, Obad. 4. The Roman soldiers will hunt the Jews out of all their recesses and fastnesses, and none shall escape. (2.) Wherever the godly are, who are marked for preservation, they shall be found happy in the enjoyment of Christ. As the dissolution of the Jewish church shall be extended to all parts, so shall the constitution of the Christian church. Wherever Christ is, believers will flock to Him, by the instinct of the new nature, and meet in Him, as eagles about the prey, without being directed. Now Christ is where his Gospel, ordinances and church are; For where two or three are gathered in his name, there is He in the midst of them, and thither therefore others will be gathered to Him. Wherever Christ records his name, He will meet his people, and bless them, John 4: 21, &c. 1 Tim. 2: 8. Many good interpreters understand it of the gathering of the saints together to Christ in the kingdom of glory; 'Ask not where the carcass will be, and how they shall find the way to it, for they shall be under infallible direction; to Him who is their living, quickening Head, and the Centre of their unity, to Him shall the gathering of the people be.'

CHAP. XVIII. v. 1—8. This parable has its key hanging at the door; the drift and design of it are prefixed, v. 1. It supposes that all God's people are praying people; all God's children keep up both a constant and an occasional correspondence with Him, send to Him steadily, and on every emergency. To pray is our privilege, honor, and duty; we sin if we neglect it. It is to be our constant work; always, the duty of every day requires it; we must pray, and never grow weary of praying, nor think of leaving it off till it be swallowed up in everlasting praise. It seems to be the particular design here, to teach us constancy and perseverance in our requests for spiritual mercies, either for ourselves or the church; when praying for strength against our spiritual enemies, our lusts and corruptions, the worst enemies, we must continue instant in prayer, must pray and not faint, for we shall not seek God's face in vain.

1. Christ shows the power of importunity among men, who will be swayed by that, when nothing else will influence to what is just and right. Observe,

1. The bad character of this judge, v. 2. He had no manner of concern either for his conscience or reputation; no fear of the wrath of God, or the censures of men; or, he took no care to do his duty either to God or man; was a perfect stranger both to godliness and honor. It is not strange, if those that have cast off the fear of their Creator, be altogether regardless of their fellow-creatures; where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. Such a prevalence of irreligion and inhumanity is bad in any, but very bad in a judge. Wickedness in the place of judgment, was one of the sorest evils Solomon saw under the sun, Eccl. 3: 16.

2. The distressed case of this poor widow, v. 3. She had manifestly right on her side; but, it should seem, in soliciting to have right done, she confined not herself to the formalities of the law, but made daily personal application to the judge, crying, Avenge me of mine adversary, that is, Do me justice against mine adversary; not that she desired revenge, but, 'Oblige him to restore what effects he has of mine, and disable him from oppressing me any more.' Note, Poor widows have often many adversaries, who barbarously take advantage of their weak and helpless state, to invade their rights, and defraud them of what little they have; and magistrates are particularly charged, not only not to do violence to the widow, (Jer. 22: 3.) but to judge the fatherless, and plead for the widow, (Isa. 1: 17.) to be their patrons and protectors; then they are as gods, for God is so, Ps. 68: 5.

3. The difficulty and discouragement she met with; He would not for a while: according to his usual practice, he frowned on her, took no notice of her cause, but connived at all the wrong her adversary did her; for she had no bribe to give him, no great man whom he stood in any awe of, to speak for her; and he himself was conscious of the reason of his dilatoriness, and could not but own within himself, that he neither feared God, nor regarded man; it is sad

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 20—37. It is not uncommon for men to profess, that they are inquiring after truth, and 'waiting for the kingdom of God,' while they oppose the progress which it makes among them, and despise those who have set it up within them: and it commonly has the greatest success, when least attended with ostentation; when unassuming modesty and gentleness characterize the instruments employed; and when 'the word of truth and the power of God' silently operate, and nothing noisy or showy attracts notice, or needlessly excites opposition.—Many, who now despise 'the days of the Son of man,' and refuse to hearken to his Gospel, will at length dolefully wish that they might see one more such day; but this will forever be in vain: and, even in this world, those who despise the truth commonly become the dupes of destructive lies, and are given up to strong delusions.—Our blessed Redeemer has finished his sufferings, and ascended into his glory. The generation to whom He preached, and among whom He wrought his miracles, rejected and crucified Him: but his day of vengeance soon arrived, and the Jews were destroyed. Yea, divine vengeance followed even the scattered remnant of them; and indeed they are in a measure pursued by it to this day. Yet the remnant, who obeyed and trusted Christ, were as remarkably preserved.—But has not the Savior been rejected by other generations also? and is there not a still more awful day coming, when He shall appear to judge the world? In this we are all interested. Yet alas! most men live now, as they did in the days of Noah and of Lot; notwithstanding the warnings given in the Word of God, to prepare to meet Him in judgment! They are generally given up to worldly interests or pleasures, as if life had no period, or there were no future judgment. But let those, who profess to be Christ's disciples, make haste to prepare to meet their God. The time is speedily coming, when they who have lived together in the most endeared relations; will, in numberless instances, be finally and eternally separated; while one shall be taken to heaven, and another left to perish forever in hell. Remember us, O Lord, with the favor that thou bearest unto thy people: O visit us with thy salvation.' (Note, Ps. 106: 4, 5.)

NOTES

CHAP. XVIII. v. 1—8. (Marg. Ref. a, b—21: 34—36.) Men might to pray constantly at stated times: to be habitually in that spirit of humble dependence, desire, and expectation, which give life to prayer; to be frequently offering ejaculatory petitions; and to be always ready for prayer, secret, social, or public, when opportunity is afforded; and they ought not to 'faint,' or grow slack, through delays, disappointments, difficulties, temptations, persecutions, and conflicts with indwelling sin; or even if foiled repeatedly in those conflicts. Our Lord, in giving this general rule, seems to have had a particular reference to the state of his disciples, under the persecutions which visited them from the unbelieving Jews, before his coming with power to set up his kingdom, and execute vengeance on their enemies. For this they were exhorted 'to pray without fainting.' He might indeed deal with them, and leave them to pray, for a long time, under troubles and discouragements, to prove their sincerity, and to increase their humility, simplicity, and fervency; but He would doubtless answer them in due time, deliver them from their afflictions, and speedily^a avenge them on their enemies. This will be speedily; as ^b God will come soon enough for every good purpose, and in a sudden and unexpected manner. (Marg. Ref. k—p.) The word elect, or chosen, must, in this connection, especially mean those who have already been called by divine grace to join the number of fervent supplicants; and the answer to their prayers for deliverance, necessarily implies the infliction of vengeance on their impotent persecutors. The concluding clause may be differently interpreted. Probably our Lord meant, that when He came to deliver the church, and to avenge his people on their Jewish persecutors, He should find but little faith in the land. The Jews would be hardened in unbelief; and the Christians, harassed by long persecutions, would be ready to doubt of the performance of his word; while many would draw back to perdition. It may also refer to the general weakness of the faith of his tempted and afflicted people, while waiting for Him to come to their relief. (Matt. 24: 13—14, Heb. 10: 23—25.) Some think a great prevalence of infidelity will take place, just before Christ shall come to judge the world; (Rev. 20: 7—9.) as it is probable there will be immediately before the introduction of the millennium. (7, 8.) Avenge, (21: 22. Rom. 12: 19 2 Thes. 1: 8. 1 Pet. 2: 14.) 'Vengeance belongeth to God'; ^c but belongs also to the magistrate, as his vicegerent. (Rom. 12: 17—21. Rev. 6: 9—11.) made their duty, and to this He has promised mercy. We ought to be particular in praying against spiritual enemies, as Paul was; For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, (like this importunate widow), that it might depart from me; Lord, mortify this corruption; Lord, arm me against this temptation. We ought to concern ourselves for the persecuted and oppressed churches, and to pray that God would do them justice, and set them in safety. And herein we must be very urgent, we must cry with earnestness; we must cry day and night, as those that believe prayer will be heard at last; we must restless with God, as those that know how to value the blessing, and will have no nay. God's praying people are bid to give Him no rest, Isa. 62:6, 7.

(3.) What discouragements they may perhaps meet with in their prayers and expectations; He may bear long with them.—He exercises patience toward the adversaries of his people, and does not take vengeance on them; and He exercises the patience of his people, and does not plead for them. He bore long with the cry of the sin of the Egyptians that oppressed Israel, and with the cry of the sorrows of those that were oppressed.

(4.) What assurance they have that mercy, though delayed, will come at last, supported by what the unjust judge saith; If this widow prevail by being importunate, much more shall God's elect prevail. For this widow was a stranger, nothing related to the judge; but God's praying people are his own elect, whom He knows, and loves, and delights in, and has always concerned Himself for. She was but one; but the praying people of God are many, all come to Him on the same errand, and agree to ask what they need, Matt. 18: 19. As the saints of heaven surround the throne of glory with united praises, so saints on earth besiege the throne of grace with united prayers. She comes to a judge that bid her keep her distance; we to a Father that bids us come boldly to Him, and teaches us to cry, Abba, Father. She comes to an unjust judge; we to a righteous Father, (John 17: 25.) one that regards his own glory and the comforts of his poor creatures, especially those in distress, as widows and fatherless. She came to this judge purely on her own account; but God is Himself engaged in the cause we are soliciting; and we can say, Arise, O Lord, plead thine own cause; and what will that a man should know so much amiss of himself, and be in no care to amend it.

4. The gaining of her point by importunity, v. 5. 'She is resolved she will give me no rest till it is done; therefore I will do it, to save myself further trouble; as good at first as at last.' Thus she got justice done her by continual craving; she begged it at his door, followed him in the streets, solicited him in open court, and still her cry was, Avenge me of mine adversary, which he was forced to do, to get rid of her; for his conscience, bad as he was, would not suffer him to send her to prison for an affront to the court.

II. He applies this, for the encouragement of God's praying people to pray with faith and fervency, and to persevere therein.

1. He assures them that God will at length be gracious to them, v. 6. Observe,

(1.) What they desire and expect; that God would avenge his own elect. Note, [1.] That there are a people that are God's people, his elect, his own elect, a choice, chosen people. And this He has an eye to in all He does for them; it is because they are his chosen, and in pursuance of this choice. [2.] God's own elect meet with a great deal of trouble and opposition in this world; many adversaries fight against them; Satan is their great adversary. [3.] That which is wanted and waited for, is God's preserving and protecting them, and his own work in them; his securing the interest of the church in the world, and of his grace in the heart.

(2.) What is required of God's people to obtain this; they must cry day and night to Him; not that He needs their remonstrances, or can be moved by their pleadings, but this He has Thou do to thy great name? She had no friend to speak for her, and to use interest for her more than her own; but we have an Advocate with the Father, his own Son, who ever lives to make intercession for us, and has a prevailing interest in heaven. She had no promise of success, no encouragement to ask; but we have the golden sceptre held out to us, are bid to ask, and it is promised that it shall be given us. She could have access to the judge only at certain times; but we may cry to God day and night, at all hours, and therefore may the rather hope to prevail by importunity. Her importunity was provoking to the judge, and she might fear lest it should set him more against her; but our importunity is pleasing to God; the prayer of the upright is his delight, and therefore, we may hope, shall avail much, if it be an effectual, fervent prayer.

2. He intimates to them that, notwithstanding this, they will begin to be weary of waiting for Him, v. 8. 'Nevertheless, though such assurances are given, that God will avenge his own elect, yet, when the Son of man comes, shall He find faith on the earth?' The Son of man will come to avenge his own elect, to plead the cause of persecuted Christians against persecuting Jews; He will come in his providence to plead the cause of his injured people in every age, and finally, at the great day, to determine the controversies of Zion. Now, when He comes, will He find faith in the earth? The question implies a strong negation; No, He shall not; He Himself foresees it. This supposes that it is on earth only that there is occasion for faith: for sinners in hell are feeling that which they would not believe, and saints in heaven are enjoying that which they did believe. It supposes that faith is the great thing Christ looks for. He looks down on the children of men, and does not ask, Is there innocency? but, Is there faith? He inquired concerning the faith of those who applied to Him for cures. It supposes that if there were faith, though ever so little, He would discover it. His eye is on the weakest and most obscure believer. It is foretold that, when Christ comes to plead his people's cause, He will find but little faith in comparison with what one might expect. That is,

[1.] In general, He will find but few really and truly good people. Many that have the form and fashion of godliness, but few that have faith, that are sincere and honest: nay, He will find little fidelity among men; the faithful few, Ps. 12: 1, 2. Even to the end of time there will still be occasion for the same complaint; the world will grow no better, nor when it is drawing towards its period. Bad it is, and bad it will be, and worst of all just before Christ's coming; the last times will be the most perilous.

[2.] In particular, He will find few that have faith concerning his coming. When He comes to avenge his own elect, He looks if there be any faith to help and to uphold, and wonders that there is none, Isa. 59: 16. 63: 5. It intimates that Christ, both in his particular comings for the relief of his people, and in his general coming at the end of time, may, and will,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8. The great importance of earnest, persevering prayer, and the hindrances we must expect to meet in attending to it, are brought to our minds with peculiar energy, by these repeated exhortations, 'to pray always, and not to faint' (Eph. 6: 18-20.) and we may learn how to draw instruction from every object, and every incident, by the animating conclusions deduced from the conduct of 'the unjust judge.'—Alas! that there should be so many, even in authority, among professed Christians, who 'neither fear God, nor regard man,' and who glory in impiety and iniquity! No wonder when this is the case, that cruel oppressions and unrighteous decrees abound in cities and provinces: but what will such men do, when God shall cite them to his tribunal, to avenge on them the cause of those whom they have injured, 'because it was in the power of their hand to do it?'—Whether importunity, or any other address to their self-love, will induce them to do justice, or not, yet God will surely plead the cause of 'his own elect, who cry night and day unto Him, and avenge them' on all their adversaries. We must not indeed seek vengeance on our enemies, but should pray for their conversion: yet we may, and ought, to desire the deliverance of the church from those, who oppress or corrupt her; even though accompanied with their destruction. Whether we seek to be delivered from temptation, to have our iniquities subdued, and our souls comforted; or pray for the peace of the church; we shall at length be answered, if earnest, importunate, and persevering; and, however long the Lord 'bears with us,' our requests will be granted in the best time, and per naps when we least expect it. Scott.

(8.) Shall He find faith on the earth? 'The word rendered earth, often signifies, not the earth in general, but some particular land, or country; as in Acts 7: 3, 4, 11. and in numberless other places.' DODDRIDGE.

'The faith referred to seems to be the belief of the particular truth He had been inculcating, namely, that God will, in due time, avenge his elect, and signal^y punish their oppressors.'

9 ¶ And he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves, that they were righteous, and despised others.

10 Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican.

11 The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, 'God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican.

I. Both address themselves to the duty of prayer at the same place and time, v. 10. It was not the hour of public prayer, but they went thither to offer up their personal devotions, as was usual with good people at that time, when the temple was not only the place, but the medium of worship, and God had promised, in answer to Solomon's request, that, whatever prayer was made in a right manner, in or toward that house, it should therefore the rather be accepted. We must have an eye to Christ, our Temple, in all approaches to God. The Pharisee and the publican both went to the temple, to pray. Note, Among the worshippers of God, in the visible church, there is a mixture of good and bad, some that are accepted of God, and some that are not; and so it has been ever since Cain and Abel brought their offering to the same altar. The Pharisee, proud as he was, could not think himself above prayer; nor could the publican, humble as he was, think himself shut out from the benefit of it; but these went with different views.

1. The Pharisee went to the temple to pray, because it was a public place, more public than the corners of the streets, and therefore he should have many eyes on him, to applaud his devotion. The character Christ gave of the Pharisees, that all their works they did to be seen of men, gives us occasion for this suspicion. Note, Hypocrites keep up the external performances of religion only to save or gain credit. We see many every day at the temple, whom, it is to be feared, we shall not see in the great day at Christ's right hand.

2. The publican went to the temple, because it was appointed to be a house of prayer for all people, Isa. 56:7. The Pharisee came on a compliment, the publican on business; the Pharisee, to make his appearance; the publican, to make his request. Now God sees with what disposition and design we wait on Him in holy ordinances, and will judge of us accordingly.

Verses 9—14.

(9.) Despised. It is a very expressive term, and, no doubt, was used, as designating one prominent feature in the character delineated. Many, on different grounds, may have confidence that they are righteous persons; and something in themselves may be either the support or the evidence of that confidence; but when any look down with disdain on other men, it is manifest, that their self-confidence is that of the character here described. Others, 'The rest,' all others, who did not comply with their rules. The Pharisees were especially intended, who relied on exemption from gross immoralities, attendance on the externals of religion, and exact observance of the traditions of the elders. A humble believer indeed will say, 'God, I thank Thee, that I am not like other men;' meaning that the whole difference between him and the worst of those who disgrace civil society, or are cut off from it by the hand of the executioner, is owing wholly to providential restraints, or to the sanctifying grace of God: but at the same time he has very many sins to confess with deep humiliation; he feels himself a guilty, polluted, weak, foolish, indigent creature; he does not generally conclude any one to be viler than he is, all circumstances considered; he prides and prays for the most abandoned, and hopes that they are penitent, whenever there are favorable appearances; and he knows, that he is still liable to be tempted to the most atrocious crimes, yea, and overcome by temptation, unless the Lord uphold him. But the Pharisee spoke as if he had not been a sinner, in any respect; and as if he were in no danger at all of falling into temptation and sin. In fact, there was neither confession of sin nor petition in his prayer; but he was, in his own opinion, 'rich, and increased with goods, and had need of nothing.' (Rev. 3:17.) But truly a man may be exempt from the gross crimes of robbery, extortion, and adultery; and yet be covetous, unmerciful, contentious, revengeful, proud, envious, deceitful; delay it so long as that, 1st. Wicked people will begin to defy it, and to say, Where is the promise of his coming? 2 Pet. 3:4. They will challenge Him to come; (Isa. 5:10. Amos 5:19.) and his delay will harden them in wickedness, Matt. 24:48. 2dly. Even his own people will begin to despair of it. God's time to appear for his people is, when things are brought to the last extremity, and when Zion begins to say, The Lord has forsaken me. See Isa. 49:14. 40:27. But this is our comfort, that, when the time appointed comes, it will appear that the unbelief of man has not made the promise of God of no effect.

V. 9—14. The scope of this parable likewise is prefixed to it, and we are told, (v. 9.) for whom it was calculated. For such as had a great conceit of themselves, and their own goodness; they thought themselves as holy as they need be, and holier than all their neighbors, and examples to them. But that was not all; they had a confidence in themselves before God, and depended on the merit of their own righteousness, whenever they addressed God; they thought they had made God their debtor, and might demand any thing from Him. They despised others, as not worthy to be compared with them. Now Christ, by this parable, would show such their folly, and that thereby they shut themselves out from acceptance with God. This is called a parable, though there be nothing of similitude in it; it is rather a description of the different temper and language of those that proudly justify themselves, and those that humbly condemn themselves; and their different standing before God. It is matter of fact every day.

II. The Pharisee's address; (a prayer I can not call it; he stood and prayed thus with himself; (v. 11, 12.) standing by himself, he prayed thus, so some read it; he was wholly intent on self, his own praise, and not God's glory; or, standing in some conspicuous place, or setting himself with great state and formality, he prayed thus. What he is supposed to say, shows,

1. That he trusted to himself that he was righteous. Many good things he saith of himself, which we will suppose to be true—he was free from gross and scandalous sins; was not an extortioner, or usurer, nor oppressive to debtors or tenants, but fair and kind to all that depended on him; he was not unjust in any of his dealings; did no man any wrong; was no adulterer, but had possessed his vessel in sanctification and honor. Yet this was not all; he fasted twice in the week, partly as an act of temperance, partly of devotion. The Pharisees and their disciples fasted twice a week, Monday and Thursday; thus he glorified God with his body yet that was not all; he gave tithes, according to the law, and so glorified God with his worldly estate: now all this was very well and commendable. Miserable is the condition of those who come short of the righteousness of this Pharisee; yet he was not accepted; and why? (1.) His giving God thanks for this, though in itself a good thing, yet seems a mere formality. He does not say, By the grace of God I am that I am, as Paul, but exclaims, God, I thank Thee; intending but a plausible introduction to a proud, vain-glorious ostentation of himself. (2.) He boasts of this, dwells with delight on the subject, as if all his business to the temple was to tell God Almighty how very good he was; and he is ready to say, with those hypocrites that we read of, (Isa. 65:3.) Wherefore have we fasted, and Thou seest not? (3.) He trusted to it as a righteousness, not only mentioned, but pleaded it, as if hereby he had merited of God, and made Him his debtor. (4.) Here is not one word of prayer in all he saith. He went up to the temple, to pray, but forgot his errand, was so full of himself and his own goodness, that he thought he had need of nothing, no, not of the favor and grace of God, which, it should seem, he did not think worth asking.

2. That he despised others. (1.) He thought meanly of all mankind but himself; I thank Thee that I am not as other men are. He speaks indefinitely, as if he were better than any. We may have reason to thank God that we are not as some notoriously wicked and vile men are; but to speak at random thus, as if all beside us were reprobates, is to judge unwarrantably. (2.) He thought meanly of this publican in particular, whom he had left behind, probably, in the court of the Gentiles, and whose company he had fallen into as he came to the temple. He knew that he was a publican, and therefore very uncharitably concluded that he was an extortioner, unjust, and all that is naught. Sup-ful; in short, like Satan in all the leading features of his character. He may use uncommanded austerities, 'fast twice a week,' or more frequently, be scrupulously honest in some particulars, even to minuteness; and yet be destitute of judgment, mercy, and the love of God; nay, he may be a hypocrite, a perjurer, and even a sensualist; he may not be 'like the publican,' and yet far worse than he. These emphatical words, 'God, be merciful to me a sinner,' (which in the original imply the idea of atonement as the ground of forgiveness,) when really the language of the heart, express humiliation for sin, repentance, submission to God's righteousness, faith, and hope of pardon and acceptance. (Marg. Ref. b—g.—Ps. 32:3—5. Prov. 28:13. Is. 57:15, 16. Matt. 3:3.) The Pharisee, relying on the merit of his own goodness, and puffed up with an opinion of his singular holiness, remained under the condemnation of the law, and a stranger to the grace of the Gospel; but the publican, by confessing his guilt, and crying for mercy as a sinner, became partaker of the blessings of the new covenant of mercy and grace, according to that rule which has before been considered. (14:7—11.) (12.) Tithes. (11:42. Lev. 27:30—31. Matt. 23:23, 24. Heb. 7:4—10.)

(11.) Stood. The Jews were accustomed to pray standing.

'None but persons of the blood royal were allowed to pray sitting.'

'In illustration of such extemporaneous prayer, Weinstein cites R. Bechai: "From the times of Moses to those of the men of the great synagogue, there was no set form of prayer, but every one, for himself peculiarly, made prayer according to his knowledge, wisdom and eloquence."

Extortioners, unjust.] 'The original words denote those who injure by force, and those who overreach by fraud.'

12 I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess.

13 And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'

14 I tell you, This man went down to his house justified rather than the other: for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

15 ¶ And they brought unto him also infants, that he would touch them: but when his disciples saw it, they rebuked them.

16 But Jesus called them unto him, and said, 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not;

for he had been so, and he had known it, what business had he to take notice of it? Could not he say his prayers, (and that was all that the Pharisees did,) without reproaching his neighbors? Or was this a part of his God, I thank Thee? And was he as much pleased with the publican's badness as with his own goodness? There could not be a plainer evidence, not only of the want of humility and charity, but of reigning pride and malice.

III. The publican's address, as full of humility and humiliation as the Pharisee's was of pride and ostentation; and of repentance for sin, and desire toward God, as his was of confidence in himself, and his own righteousness and sufficiency.

1. He expressed his repentance and humility in what he did; and his gesture, when he addressed himself to his devotions, was expressive of great seriousness and humility, and the proper clothing of a broken, penitent, and obedient heart. (1.) He stood afar off. The Pharisee stood, but crowded up as high as he could, to the upper end of the court; the publican, in a sense of his unworthiness to draw near to God, kept at a distance, and perhaps, for fear of offending the Pharisee, whom he observed to look scornfully at him, and of disturbing his devotions. (2.) He would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven, much less his hands, as was usual in prayer. He did lift up his heart to God in the heavens, in holy desires, but, through prevailing shame and humiliation, he did not lift up his eyes in holy confidence and courage. His iniquities are gone over his head, as a heavy burden, so that he is not able to look up, Ps. 40: 12. The dejection of his looks is an indication of the dejection of his mind at the thought of sin. (3.) He smote upon his breast, in a holy indignation at himself for sin; 'Thus would I smite this wicked heart of mine, the poisoned fountain whence flow all the streams of sin.' The sinner's heart first smites him in a penitent rebuke, 2 Sam. 24: 10. David's heart smote him; Sinner, what hast thou done? And then he smites his heart with penitent remorse; O wretched man that I am! Ephraim is said to smite on his thigh, Jer. 31: 19. Great mourners are represented taboring on their breasts, Nah. 2: 7.

2. He expressed it in what he said. His prayer was short; fear and shame hindered him from saying much; sighs and groans swallowed up his words; but what he said was to the purpose, God, be merciful to me a sinner! And blessed be God, that we have this prayer on record, as an answered prayer, and that we are sure that he who prayed it, went to his house justified; so shall we, if we pray it, as he did, through Christ. (1.) He owns himself a sinner by nature, by practice, guilty before God; Behold, I am vile, what shall I answer Thee? The Pharisee denies himself to be a sinner; none of his neighbors can charge him, and he sees no reason to charge himself with any thing amiss;

he is clean, he is pure from sin; but the publican gives himself no other character than that of a sinner, a convicted criminal at God's bar. (2.) He has no dependence but on the mercy of God; on that, and that only, he relies. The Pharisee had insisted on the merit of his fastings and tithes; but the poor publican disclaims all thought of merit. 'Justice condemns me, nothing will save me but mercy, mercy.' (3.) He earnestly prays for the benefit of that mercy; O God, be merciful, be propitious to me; forgive my sins, be reconciled to me; take me into thy favor; receive me graciously; love me free-y.' He comes as a beggar for an alms, when ready to perish for hunger. Probably, he repeated this prayer with renewed affections, and perhaps said more to the same purport; made a particular confession of his sins, and mentioned the particular mercies he wanted; still this was the burden of his prayer, God, be merciful to me a sinner.

IV. The publican's acceptance with God. There were those who would cry up the Pharisee, and by whom he would go to his house applauded, and who would look with contempt on this mean-spirited, whining publican. But our Lord, to whom all hearts are open, and no secret hid, who is perfectly acquainted with all proceedings in the court of heaven, assures us that this penitent, broken-hearted publican went to his house justified, rather than the other. 'I tell you, I affirm, and declare it to you with the utmost concern; it is the publican rather.' The proud Pharisee goes away, rejected of God; his thanksgivings, so far from being accepted, are an abomination; he is not justified, his sins are not pardoned, nor he delivered from condemnation: he is not accepted as righteous in God's sight, because so righteous in his own, but the publican, on this humble address to heaven, obtains the remission of his sins.

The reason given for this is, because God's glory is to resist the proud, and give grace to the humble. 1. Proud men, who exalt themselves, are rivals with God, and therefore they shall certainly be abased. God, in his discourse with Job, appeals to this proof that He is God, that He looks upon every one that is proud, and brings him low, Job 40: 12. 2. Humble men, who abase themselves, are subject to God, and they shall be exalted. God has preference for those that will take it as a favor, not demand it as a debt. He shall be exalted into the love of God, and communion with Him; into a satisfaction in Himself, and at last as high as heaven. See how the punishment answers the sin; He that exalteth himself, shall be abased. See how the recompense answers the duty; He that humbles himself, shall be exalted. See also the power of God's grace in bringing good out of evil; the publican had been a great sinner, and out of the greatness of his sin was brought the greatness of his repentance. See, on the contrary, the power of Satan's malice in bringing evil out of good. It was good that the Pharisee was no extortioner, or unjust; but the devil made him proud of this, to his ruin.

V. 15-17. This we had both in Matthew and Mark; it very fitly follows here after the story of the publican, as a confirmation of the truth to be illustrated by that parable, that those shall be accepted with God, and honored, who humble themselves. Observe,

1. Those who are themselves blessed in Christ, should desire to have their children also blessed in Him, and should hereby testify the true honor they have for Christ, by making use of Him, and their true love for their children, by concern about their souls; they brought to Him infants, very young, not able to go, sucking children, as some think. None are too little, too young, to bring to Christ, who knows how to show kindness to them that are not capable of doing service to Him.

2. One gracious touch of Christ's will make our children happy; they brought infants to Him, that He might touch them, in token of the application of his grace and Spirit to them, for that always makes way for his blessing, which, likewise they expected; see Isa. 44: 3. I will pour my Spirit on thy seed, and then my blessing on thine offspring.

3. It is no strange thing for those who apply to Christ, for themselves or their children, to meet with discouragement, even from those who should countenance and encourage them; When the disciples saw it, they thought, if this were admitted, it would bring endless trouble on their Master, and therefore they rebuked them, and frowned on them. The spouse complained of the watchmen, Cant. 3: 3. 5: 7.

4. Many, whom the disciples rebuke, the Master invites; Jesus called them unto Him, when, on the disciples' check, they were retiring.

(12.) I fast twice a week. 'It is said these fasts were observed by the Jews on the second day of the week, because Moses then ascended mount Sinai; and on the fifth, because he then descended, on account of the worship of the golden calf.'

(13.) God be merciful, &c. 'Be propitious to me through sacrifice; or, in an atonement he made for me. I am a sinner, and cannot be saved but in this way.'

(14.) Justified. The original word here denotes absolved, treated as just, accepted, approved, as Rom. 3: 20. Schoettgen tells us, that it is a well-known formula among the Jews, that those who have offered up sacrifices depart from the temple just; and one of their [654] writers says, whosoever approaches the temple full of sins, and offers sacrifices, his sins are remitted.'

Verse 15.

Of such, &c. 'I cannot approve of rendering the original words here such as resemble these. It is the part of a faithful translator not to limit the sense of the original, nor to fix what it leaves ambiguous. Doddridge. 'Children must have been included in the word, "such," because the proposition, "the kingdom of God belongs to humble adults, to such as have as little pride and arrogance as children," would be no reason why children should not be prevented from coming to Jesus.'

V. 9-17. Too many, of different descriptions, 'trust in themselves that they are righteous'; whilst their contempt of others proves the haughtiness and uncharitableness of their hearts. Such men may address the Lord, in a high tone of confidence and familiarity, profess to give Him the glory, boast that they are not extortioners, unjust, or adulterers, and glory in their gifts, fortunes, notions, or austerities; yet it will be proved, that 'they have exalted themselves,' and therefore God will certainly 'abase them'; and all their revellings, calumnies, and rash judgments will fall on their own heads, and increase their shame and everlasting contempt; except they be previously humbled in deep repentance, and come, with 'the publicans and sinners' whom they disdain, for unmerited mercy through the great atonement.—But 'blessed are the poor in spirit, for their's is the kingdom of heaven.' Matt. 5: 3. The man, who abhors and condemns himself; who approaches God

They did not appeal from the disciples to the Master, but the Master took cognizance of their despised cause.

5. It is the mind of Christ, that little children should be brought to Him, and presented as living sacrifices to His honor; 'Suffer little children to come to Me, and forbid them not; let nothing be done to hinder them, for they shall be as welcome as any.' The promise is to us, and to our seed; and therefore He has the dispensing of promised blessings, will bid them welcome to Him with us.

6. The children of those who belong to the kingdom of God, likewise belong to that kingdom, as the children of freemen are freemen. If the parents be members of the visible church, the children are so too; for if the root be holy, the branches are so.

7. So welcome are children to Christ, that those grown people are most welcome to Him, who have in them most of the disposition of children; (p. 17.) Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, that is, receive the benefits of it with humility and thankfulness, not pretending to merit them, as the Pharisee, but gladly owning himself indebted to free grace for them, as the publican; unless brought to this self-denying frame, he shall in no wise enter into that kingdom. They must receive the kingdom of God as children, receive their estates by descent and inheritance, not by purchase, and call it their Father's gift.

V. 18-30. In these verses we have, I. Christ's discourse with a ruler, that had a good mind to be directed in the way to heaven. Observe,

1. It is a blessed sight to see persons of distinction in the world, distinguish themselves by concern about their souls and another life. Luke notes that he was a ruler; few of these had any esteem for Christ; whether a church or state-ruler, does not appear, but he was one in authority.

2. The great thing every one of us is concerned to inquire after is, what we shall do, to get to heaven; to inherit eternal life. This implies such a belief of an eternal life after this, as atheists and infidels have not; such a concern to make it sure, as a careless, unthinking world have not; and such a willingness to comply with any terms that it may be made sure, as those have not, who are resolutely devoted to the world and the flesh.

3. Those who would inherit eternal life, must apply to Christ as their Master, their teaching Master, so it signifies here, and their ruling Master, and so they shall certainly find Him. There is no learning the way to heaven, but in the school of Christ.

4. Those who come to Christ as their Master, must believe Him to have not only a divine mission, but a divine goodness. Christ would have this ruler know, that, if he understood himself aright in calling Him good, he did, in effect, call Him God; and indeed He was so; (p. 19.)

'Why callest thou Me good? Thou knowest there is none good but One, that is, God: and dost thou then take Me for God? If so, thou art in the right.'

5. Christ Himself has not altered the way to heaven from what it was before his coming, but only has made it more plain and easy, and provided for our relief in case we take any false step. Thou knowest the commandments; Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to establish them. Wouldest thou inherit eternal life? Govern thyself by the commandments.

6. The duties of the second table must be conscientiously observed, in order to our happiness, and we must not think that any acts of devotion, how plausible soever, will atone for the neglect of them. Nor is it enough to keep ourselves free from the gross violations of these commandments, but we must know these commandments, as Christ has explained them in his sermon on the mount, in their extent an spiritual nature, and so observe them.

7. Men think themselves innocent, because they are ignorant; so this ruler did, v. 21. He knows no more evil of himself than the Pharisee did, v. 11. He boasts that he began early in a course of virtue; that he had continued in it to this day; and that he had not in any instance transgressed. Had he been acquainted with the extent and spiritual nature of the divine law, and with the workings of his own heart; had he been but Christ's disciple a while, and learned of Him, he would have said the quite contrary; 'All these have I broken from my youth up, in thought, word, and deed.'

8. The great things by which we are to try our spiritual state are, how we stand affected to Christ and to our brethren, to this world and to the other; by these this man was tried. If he have a true affection to Christ, he will come and follow Him, attend to his doctrine, and submit to his discipline. None shall inherit eternal life, who are not willing to take their lot with the Lord Jesus, to follow the Lamb whithersoever He goes. If he have a true affection to his brethren, he will, as there is occasion, distribute to the poor, who are God's receivers of his dues out of our estates. If he think meanly of this world, as he ought, he will not stick at selling what he has, if there be a necessity for it, for the relief of God's poor. If he think highly of the other world, as he ought, he will desire no more than to have treasure in heaven, and will reckon that a sufficient, abundant recompense for all that he has left, lost, or laid out for God in this world.

9. Many have much in them that is very commendable, and yet perish for lack of some one thing; so this ruler here liked all Christ's terms very well, but this which would part between him and his estate; 'In this, I pray Thee, have me excused.'

10. Many are loath to leave Christ, who yet do leave Him. After a long struggle between with deep self-abasement and reverence; who looks into his past life, his present conduct, his heart, his duties, with humiliation of soul; who is ready to think every one better than himself, and must despair were it not for free salvation by the Gospel of Christ; who seeks for mercy in the way, and through the name, which God has revealed: this man will surely be heard and accepted, when he breathes out, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' This is the path to honor, glory, immortality, and eternal life; whilst 'pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.' Let us then take heed, not to glory in ourselves, or to despise others; let us also be careful not to discourage the weak or the ignorant, or to deter men from coming themselves, or bringing their children, to Christ; and let us recollect, that 'except we receive the kingdom of God, as a little child, we shall in no wise enter therein.'

(Marg. Ref.) 'Let us not mistake the character of this individual. He was unquestionably covetous; for it is said of him that he had large possessions, which he could not find in his heart to sell, and give to the poor, at the command of Him whom he professed to reverence as the Messiah. Christ detected the covetousness of his heart, by his refusal to pursue the course of external conduct prescribed to him: and this exposed the deficiency of his moral character; for covetousness is immorality of the worst kind, according to 'the Gospel.' Christian Observer. (18.) A ruler. (See on 14:1. The conversion of Zaccheus the publican 1-10. The parable of a nobleman going to receive a kingdom, and intrusting money to his servants; with the account required of them, and the punishment of his enemies, 11-27. Jesus enters Jerusalem riding on an ass, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, 28-38. He answers the objection of the Pharisees, 39, 40; weeps over the city, and predicts its destruction, 41-44; drives the traders from the temple, 45, 46; and teaches daily here, while the rulers seek to kill him, 47, 48.

things, that they understood none of these things, v. 34. Their prejudices were so strong, that they could not understand them literally, and they could not understand them otherwise, so that they did not understand them at all; it was a mystery, a riddle to them—it must be so; but they think it impossible to be reconciled with the glory and honor of the Messiah, and the design of setting up his kingdom. This saying was hid from them,—was apocrypha to them, they could not receive it: they had read the Old Testament many a time, but could never see any thing in it that should be accomplished in the disgrace and death of this Messiah. They were so intent on those prophecies that spake of his glory, that they overlooked those that spake of his sufferings; these the scribes and doctors of the law should have directed them to notice, and should have brought into their creeds and catechisms, as well as the other; but they did not suit their scheme, and therefore were laid aside. Note, Therefore it is that people run into mistakes, because they read their Bibles by halves, and are as partial in the prophets as in the law. They are only for the smooth things, Isa. 30: 10. Thus now we are too apt, in reading the prophecies yet to be fulfilled, to have our expectations raised of the glorious state of the church in the latter days. But we overlook its wilderness, sackcloth-state, and are willing to fancy that is over, and nothing is reserved for us but halcyon days; and then, when tribulation and persecution arise, we do not understand it, neither know we the things that are done; though told plainly that through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God.

V. 35-43. Christ came not only to bring light to a dark world, and so to set before us the objects we are to have in view, but also to give sight to blind souls, and, by healing the organ, to enable them to view those objects. As a token of this, He cured many of bodily blindness; here He gave sight to one near Jericho; Mark (10: 46.) names one whom He cured as He went out of Jericho; Matthew (20: 30.) speaks of two, whom He cured as they departed from Jericho. Luke says it was when He was near to Jericho, which might be when He was going out of it, as well as when He was coming into it. Observe,

I. This blind man sat by the way-side begging, v. 35. It seems he was not only blind but poor, had nothing to subsist on, nor any relations to maintain him; the fitter emblem of the world of mankind which Christ came to heal and save: who are wretched and miserable, being both poor and blind, Rev. 3: 17. He sat begging, for he could not work for his living. Note, Those ought to be relieved by charity, whom providence has disabled to get their own bread. Christ here cast a favorable eye on a common beggar, and though there are creatures among such, yet they must not therefore be all thought so.

II. Hearing the noise of a multitude passing by, he asked what it meant, v. 36. This we had not before. It teaches us that it is good to be inquisitive, and that such, some time or other, find the benefit of it. Those who want their sight, should make so much the better use of their hearing, and by asking questions, make use of other people's eyes. So this blind man did, and so came to understand that Jesus of Nazareth passed by, v. 37. It is good being in Christ's way; and, when we have an opportunity of applying to Him, not to let it slip.

V. 18-43. The best obedience of mere man must leave him under condemnation; and the higher any man's confidence is, that he has kept all the commandments, or any of them, the more clearly does it appear, that he wants understanding as to the spiritual meaning of them; and that he is a stranger to repentance, to faith, to his own real character and heart; and his need of a gratuitous salvation. (Rom. 7: 7-12.) Prosperity, authority, and reputation, conduce to feed self-flattery, as well as an idolatrous attachment to earthly objects; so that it would be impossible for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God; were it not, that 'with God all things are possible.'—Men in general are as backward to derive instruction from the humiliation, crucifixion, and resurrection of Christ, as the disciples were to regard his declarations concerning those events. Thus they are left in the dark about the evident meaning of

to our Savior. No instance is recorded in Scripture of this miracle having been wrought, either by prophets before his coming, or by his apostles afterwards: nor is it mentioned among the miraculous powers which He conferred on them. In answer to Elisha's prayer, indeed, the Lord smote with a temporary and partial blindness, the men who came to take the prophet, and afterwards, at his request, their eyes were again opened; but this was very different from giving sight to ferings, are here most insisted on. The other evangelists had said that He should be mocked; but here it is added, He shall be spitefully treated—He shall be loaded with contumely and contempt, shall have all possible reproach put on Him. This was that part of his sufferings by which, in a spiritual manner, he satisfied God's justice for the injury we had done Him in his honor by sin. This particular instance of disgrace, that he was spit upon, had been particularly foretold, Isa. 50: 6. But here as always, when Christ spake of his sufferings and death, He foretold his resurrection as taking off both the terror and reproach of his sufferings, v. 33.

II. The confusion of the disciples; this was so contrary to their notions of the Messiah and his kingdom, and their expectations from their Master, and such a breaking of all their measures, that they understood none of these things, v. 34. Their prejudices were so strong, that they could not understand them literally, and they could not understand them otherwise, so that they did not understand them at all; it was a mystery, a riddle to them—it must be so; but they think it impossible to be reconciled with the glory and honor of the Messiah, and the design of setting up his kingdom. This saying was hid from them,—was apocrypha to them, they could not receive it: they had read the Old Testament many a time, but could never see any thing in it that should be accomplished in the disgrace and death of this Messiah. They were so intent on those prophecies that spake of his glory, that they overlooked those that spake of his sufferings; these the scribes and doctors of the law should have directed them to notice, and should have brought into their creeds and catechisms, as well as the other; but they did not suit their scheme, and therefore were laid aside. Note, Therefore it is that people run into mistakes, because they read their Bibles by halves, and are as partial in the prophets as in the law. They are only for the smooth things, Isa. 30: 10. Thus now we are too apt, in reading the prophecies yet to be fulfilled, to have our expectations raised of the glorious state of the church in the latter days. But we overlook its wilderness, sackcloth-state, and are willing to fancy that is over, and nothing is reserved for us but halcyon days; and then, when tribulation and persecution arise, we do not understand it, neither know we the things that are done; though told plainly that through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God.

V. 35-43. Christ came not only to bring light to a dark world, and so to set before us the objects we are to have in view, but also to give sight to blind souls, and, by healing the organ, to enable them to view those objects. As a token of this, He cured many of bodily blindness; here He gave sight to one near Jericho; Mark (10: 46.) names one whom He cured as He went out of Jericho; Matthew (20: 30.) speaks of two, whom He cured as they departed from Jericho. Luke says it was when He was near to Jericho, which might be when He was going out of it, as well as when He was coming into it. Observe,

I. This blind man sat by the way-side begging, v. 35. It seems he was not only blind but poor, had nothing to subsist on, nor any relations to maintain him; the fitter emblem of the world of mankind which Christ came to heal and save: who are wretched and miserable, being both poor and blind, Rev. 3: 17. He sat begging, for he could not work for his living. Note, Those ought to be relieved by charity, whom providence has disabled to get their own bread. Christ here cast a favorable eye on a common beggar, and though there are creatures among such, yet they must not therefore be all thought so.

II. Hearing the noise of a multitude passing by, he asked what it meant, v. 36. This we had not before. It teaches us that it is good to be inquisitive, and that such, some time or other, find the benefit of it. Those who want their sight, should make so much the better use of their hearing, and by asking questions, make use of other people's eyes. So this blind man did, and so came to understand that Jesus of Nazareth passed by, v. 37. It is good being in Christ's way; and, when we have an opportunity of applying to Him, not to let it slip.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

the Scriptures; while they perplex or amuse themselves and others, by endeavoring to find out some hidden sense, which accords better to their preconceived opinions. Were it not for this, all would see, that they would best consult their present comfort, as well as their eternal good, by renouncing every earthly possession or enjoyment, at Christ's command and for his sake.—Would we then rightly understand these things, we must come to Him, like the blind man, earnestly beseeching Him to open our eyes, and to show us, more and more clearly, the excellency of his precepts, and the preciousness of his salvation; and then, being saved by our faith, we shall learn to follow Him, glorifying God: and his other disciples also, witnessing the change, will praise God continually on our behalf. (Gal. 1: 15-24.)

SCOTT.

III. His prayer, as much both of faith and fervency, v. 38. He owns Christ to be the Son of David, the Messiah promised; he believes Him to be Jesus a Savior, able to help and succor him, and earnestly begs his favor; 'Have mercy on me, pardon my sin, pity my misery.' Christ is a merciful King; those that apply to Him as the Son of David, shall find Him so, and ask enough when they pray, 'Have mercy', for Christ's mercy includes all.

IV. Persons in earnest for Christ's blessings, will not be put by from the pursuit of them, by opposition and rebuke. They who went along, chid him as troublesome to the Master, noisy, and impertinent, and bid him hold his peace; but he went on with his petition, nay, the check was but as a dam to a full stream, making it swell so much the more; he cried the louder, 'Thou Son of David, have mercy on me.' Those who would speed in prayer, must be importunate in it. This history, in the close of the chapter, speaks the same thing with the parable in the beginning of it, that men ought always to pray and not to faint.

V. Christ encourages poor beggars, whom men frown on, invites them to come to him, and is ready to bid them welcome; v. 40. Note. Christ has more tenderness and compassion for distressed supplicants than any of his followers; though on his journey, yet He stopped and stood, and commanded him to be brought to Him.

VI. Though Christ knows all our wants, He will know them from us, v. 41. By spreading our case before God, with a particular representation of our wants and burdens, we teach ourselves to value the mercy we are in pursuit of; if we do not, we are not fit to receive it. This man poured out his soul before Christ, when he said, 'Lord, that I may receive my sight.' Thus particular should we be in prayer, on particular occasions.

VII. The prayer of faith, guided by and grounded on Christ's encouraging promises, shall not be in vain; nay, it shall not only receive an answer of peace, but of honor, v. 42. True faith will produce fervency in prayer, and both together will fetch in abundance of the fruits of Christ's favor; doubly comfortable, when coming in that way, when we are saved by faith.

VIII. The grace of Christ is to be thankfully acknowledged, to the glory of God, v. 43. 1. The poor beggar followed Christ, glorifying God. Christ made it his business to glorify his Father; and those whom He healed, then pleased Him best, when they praised God, as those shall please God best, who praise and honor Christ; for in confessing that He is Lord, we give glory to God the Father. It is for the glory of God if we follow Christ, as those will do, whose eyes are opened. 2. The people that saw it, could not forbear giving praise to God, who had given such power to the Son of man, and by Him had conferred such favors on the sons of men. Note, We must give praise to God for his mercies to others as well as ourselves.

CHAP. XIX. v. 1-10. Many, no doubt were converted to the faith of Christ, of whom those who were born blind, or who had become blind by disease. Our Lord was 'the Light of the world.' 'The eyes of the blind being opened,' is frequently mentioned by the prophets, as accompanying the advent of the Messiah; and the literal fulfillment of these predictions was a striking emblem of the effects of his Gospel and grace, in enlightening the minds of men. (Ps. 146: 8. Jer. 39: 17-19.) See also (38.) By the way-side begging. See on ch. 16 2^o.

2. He could not gratify his curiosity in this, because he was little, and the crowd great.

Christ did not study to show Himself, was not carried on men's shoulders, (as the pope is in procession,) that all might see Him: neither He nor his kingdom came with observation; He did not ride in an open chariot, as princes do, but, as one of us, He was lost in a crowd; for that was the day of his humiliation. Many that are little of stature, have large souls, and a lively spirit. Who would not rather be a Zaccheus than a Saul, though he was higher by head and shoulders than all about him? Let not the little of stature take thought of adding cubits to it.

3. Because he would not disappoint his curiosity, he forgot his gravity, as chief of the publicans, and ran before, like a boy, and climbed up into a sycamore-tree, to see Him. Note, Those that sincerely desire a sight of Christ, will use the proper means, will break through difficulty and opposition, and be willing to take pains to see Him.

III. Christ's notice of him, calling him to a further acquaintance, (v. 5.) and the efficacy of that call, v. 6.

1. Christ invited Himself to Zaccheus' house, not doubting of a hearty welcome; nay, wherever Christ comes, as He brings his own entertainment with Him, so He brings his own welcome; He opens the heart, inclining it to receive Him. See how Christ prevented him with the blessings of his goodness, and outdid his expectations; how He encouraged very weak beginnings. He that had a mind to know Christ, shall be known of Him; he that only courted to see Him, shall be admitted to converse with Him. Note, Those that are faithful in a little, shall be intrusted with more. And sometimes those that come to hear the Word of Christ, like Zaccheus, only for curiosity, beyond what they thought of, have their consciences awakened, and their hearts changed. Christ called him by name; He knows his chosen by

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. v. 1-10. It is probable Zaccheus possessed considerable property, before he engaged in this employment (of a publican;) as large securities were required of those who farmed the taxes under the Roman governors; but he had doubtless greatly increased his wealth by his lucrative occupation. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) It does not appear, that he had previously any serious concern about religion. In what manner the words of our Lord affected his mind, we cannot tell; but, without doubt, they were attended with a divine influence, to humble and change his heart, and to make way for true repentance and living faith: he therefore gladly welcomed Christ, and doubtless was further instructed, convinced, and determined, by his discourse. Whilst the Pharisees and others, as usual, murmured at our Lord's thus inviting Himself to be the guest of a man "who was a sinner," (15: 1, 2,) and this in preference to any of the priests or Levites who resided there, (Note, 10: 30-37, v. 31.) Zaccheus stood forth, in the midst of the company, and avowed the change which had taken place in his mind and heart, his judgment and disposition. The publicans were used to charge the people more than the real amount of their taxes; and thence, if they refused to pay it, they falsely accused them name; are they not in his book? He might ask, as Nathanael, (John 1: 48.) Whence knowest Thou me? But before he climbed the sycamore-tree, Christ saw him, and knew him. He bid him make haste, and come down. Those that Christ calls, must come down, must humble themselves, and not think to climb to heaven by any righteousness of their own: and they must make haste, for delays are dangerous. Zaccheus must not hesitate, but hasten; he knows it is not a matter that needs consideration, whether he should welcome such a guest to his house. Behold, He stands at the door, and knocks.

2. Zaccheus was overtaken by his house thus honored, v. 6. And his receiving Him into his house, betokens his receiving Him into his heart. Note, When Christ calls, we must make haste to answer; and when He comes to us, we must receive Him joyfully; Lift up your heads, O ye gates. We may well receive Him joyfully, who brings all good with Him, and when He takes possession of the soul, opens springs of joy there, which shall flow to eternity. How often has Christ said to us, Open to Me, when we have, with the spouse, made excuses, Cant. 5: 2, 3. Zaccheus' forwardness to receive Christ, shames us. We have Him not now to entertain in our houses, but we have his disciples, and what is done to them, He takes as to Himself.

IV. The offence taken at this kind greeting. Those narrow-souled, censorious Jews murmured, saying, He was gone to be a Guest with a sinner,—a sinful man; and were not they themselves sinful men? Was it not Christ's errand into the world, to seek and save men that are sinners? But Zaccheus they think to be a sinner above all that dwell in Jericho; a sinner not fit to be conversed with.

Now this was very unjust to blame Christ for going to his house; for, 1. Though he was a publican, and many of the publicans were bad men, it did not therefore follow that they were all so; we must take heed of condemning men in the lump, or by common fame, for at God's bar every man will be judged as he is. 2. Though he had been a sinner, it did not therefore follow that he was now as bad as he had been; though they knew his past life to be bad, Christ might know his present frame to be good. God allows room for repentance, and so must we. 3. Though now a sinner, they ought not to blame Christ's going to him, because He was in no danger of getting hurt by a sinner, but in great hopes of doing good to a sinner; whether should the physician go but to the sick? Yet see how what is well done, may be ill construed.

V. The proofs Zaccheus gave publicly, that, though he had been a sinner, he was now a penitent, a true convert, v. 8. He does not expect to be justified by his works, as the Pharisee who boasted of what he had done, but by his good works he will, through the grace of God, evidence the sincerity of his faith and repentance; and here he declares his determination. He stood, to be seen and heard by those who murmured; with the mouth confession is made of repentance as well as faith. He stood, which denotes his saying it deliberately and with solemnity, as a vow to God. He addressed himself, not to the people, (they were not to be his judges,) but to the Lord; he stands, as it to the Romans, as disobedient to their authority; thus they obtained the assistance of the military to enforce their exorbitant demands. (Marg. Ref. n, o.—10-14.) It has been argued, that he could not have got much of his wealth by extortion; or his estate would not have sufficed for such a restitution, after half of it had been given to the poor; especially if he reserved any part of it for himself. But it is more reasonable to suppose, that he did not give half to the poor, till after restitution had been made; as he could not previously consider his riches as his own, even to give away. (Is. 61: 8.) Perhaps he lay under a worse character than he really deserved; yet the transaction seems to be purposely recorded as an illustrious triumph of mercy and grace; (18: 24-27. Matt. 19: 23-26.) and the whole narration implies that he was before a man who bore a bad character. Scott.

(2.) Chief.] 'Zaccheus seems to have been what was called a promagister, or chief officer of the customs, having the superintendence of the sub-receivers of taxes, who collected the tolls of harbors, &c. Such a promagister (or vice-master) represented in the province the chief of a society of farmers of the revenue, consisting of Roman knights, or a magister societatis publicanorum, who always resided in Rome.' Adam, in ROBINSON.

7 And when they saw it,^a they all murmured, saying, That he was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner.

8 And Zaccheus stood, and said unto the Lord, ^a Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man^b by false accusation, ^a I restore him four-fold.

9 And Jesus said unto him, ^a This day is salvation come to this house, ^a forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham.

10 For ^a the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost.

(1.) He seems plainly to own he had done wrong, (his office giving him opportunity,) imposing on the merchants, to get in favor with the government. True penitents will not only own themselves in general guilty before God, but will particularly reflect on that iniquity which, by reason of their employment in the world, has most easily beset them. (2.) That he had done wrong by false accusation; of this temptation, John Baptist had warned publicans particularly, Luke 3: 14. They had the ear of the government, and every thing would be stretched in favor of the revenue, giving them opportunity of gratifying their revenge, if they bore a man an ill-will. (3.) He promises to restore four-fold, as far as he could recollect, or find by his books, that he had wronged any man. He does not say, 'If I be sued, and compelled to it, I will make restitution;' (some are honest when they cannot help it;) but he will do it voluntarily. Note, Those who are convinced of having done wrong, cannot evade the sincerity of their repentance but by making restitution. Observe, He does not think that giving half his estate to the poor, will atone for the wrong he has done. God hates robbery for burnt-offerings, and we must first do justly, and then love mercy. It is no charity, but hypocrisy, to give what is not our own; and we are not to reckon that our own which we have not come honestly by, nor which is not so, when all our debts are paid, and restitution made for wrong done.

V. 1-10. Our Lord illustrates by facts, what He declares in words, concerning the omnipotency of his grace, and the exceeding riches of his pardoning mercy. Many are brought to the places where Jesus dispenses his blessings, without any design of obtaining a share of them: and curiosity, though idle and vain, is often overruled to bring men acquainted with the Gospel. Where the Gospel is preached, Jesus 'stands and knocks at the door' of a man's heart, demanding admission, proposing to be his guest, and promising a royal recompense for his entertainment' (Rev. 3: 20-22, P. O. 14-22), but unless grace prepare the heart, no one will 'make haste to receive Him joyfully' when therefore this event takes place, though Pharisees murmur, yet angels rejoice, adoring the Redeemer's condescension, and congratulating the sinner's felicity.—Repentance is not to be estimated by terrors or distresses, but by its effects: where it is genuine, a new judgment and disposition are produced, a new character is formed, and a new life is entered on. The penitent gladly welcomes the Savior, and, while he accepts of his free salvation, he devotes himself to his service. If he possess wealth, he will immediately think of becoming a faithful steward: though he may not be called actually to leave all, and follow his Lord, yet he will begin, without any express command, to employ a considerable part of it in charitable uses, according to the degree of his faith and love: and if conscious of having defrauded others, he will not count any thing his own, till he has made ample restitution, according to his ability and opportunity. When we see such 'fruits meet for repentance,' we may conclude, that salvation is come to the sinner's heart, and that he is become 'a son of Abraham' by faith in Jesus Christ; and we may cheerfully hope, that mercy is intended to his family also. SCOTT.

His resolutions are of second-table duties; as suited to his condition and character; and Christ, on all occasions, laid great stress on them; for in them will best appear the truth of our repentance.

1. Whereas Zaccheus had hitherto been laying up treasure for himself, and going hurt to himself, he now resolves that in future he will be all toward God, and do good to others with it; Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor. Not, 'I will give it by will when I die,' but, 'I do give it now.' Probably, he had heard of the command of trial Christ gave another rich man, to sell what he had, and give to the poor, (Matt. 19: 21.) and how he broke with Christ upon it. 'But so will not I,' saith Zaccheus, 'I agree to it at the first word; though hitherto uncharitable to the poor, now I will relieve them, and give so much the more for having neglected the duty so long; even the half of my goods.' A very large proportion for works of piety and charity. The Jews used to say that a fifth part of a man's income yearly was very fair to be given to pious uses, and about that share the law directed; but Zaccheus would go much further, and give one moiety to the poor; this would oblige him to retrench all his extravagant expenses, which would enable him to relieve many with his superfluities. If more temperate and self-denying, we should be more charitable; if content with less ourselves, we should have more to give them that need. This he mentions here as a fruit of his repentance. Note, It well becomes converts to God to be charitable to the poor.

2. Zaccheus was conscious to himself that he had not gotten all he had honestly, and of what he had gotten by indirect and unlawful means he promises to make restitution; 'If I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, or if I have wronged any man in the way of my business as a publican, exacting more than was appointed, I promise to restore him fourfold.' This restitution a thief was to make, Exod. 22: 1. (1.) He seems plainly to own he had done wrong, (his office giving him opportunity,) imposing on the merchants, to get in favor with the government. True penitents will not only own themselves in general guilty before God, but will particularly reflect on that iniquity which, by reason of their employment in the world, has most easily beset them. VI. Christ's approbation and acceptance of Zaccheus' conversion, by which also He cleared Himself from any imputation in going to be a Guest with him, v. 9, 10.

1. Zaccheus is declared a happy man, now he is turned from sin to God, now he has bid Christ welcome to his house, and is become an honest, charitable, good man; This day is salvation come to this house. Now he is converted, he is, in effect, saved, saved from his sins, from the guilt and power of them; all the benefits of salvation are his; where Christ comes, He brings salvation with Him; He is, and will be, the Author of eternal salvation to all that own Him as Zaccheus did. Yet this is not all. Salvation this day comes to his house. (1.) When Zaccheus becomes a convert, he will be, more than he had been, a blessing to his house. He will bring the means of grace and salvation to his house, for he is a son of Abraham indeed now, and, like him, will teach his household to keep the way of the Lord. He that is greedy of gain, troubles his own house, and brings a curse on it; (Hab. 2: 9.) but he that is charitable to the poor, does a kindness to his own house, and brings a blessing on it, and salvation to it, temporal at least, Ps. 112: 3. (2.) Zaccheus being brought to Christ, his family become related to Christ, and his children members of his church, and so salvation comes to his house, as he is a son of Abraham, interested in God's covenant with him, that blessing of Abraham, which comes on the publicans, on the Gentiles, through faith, that God will be a God to them and their children; therefore, when he believes, salvation comes to his house, as to the jailer's, to whom it was said, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thine house, Acts 16: 31. Zaccheus is, by birth, a son of Abraham, but being a publican, he was deemed a heathen; they are put on a level, Matt. 18: 17. And as such the Jews avoided conversing with him, and expected Christ should do so; but he shows that, being a true penitent, he is become as good a son of Abraham as if he had never been a publican, which therefore ought not to be mentioned against him.

2. What Christ had done to make him, in particular, a happy man, was consonant to the great design of his coming; (v. 10.) with the same argument He had before justified his conversing with publicans, Matt. 9: 13. There He pleaded, that He came to call sinners to repentance; now, that He came to seek and save that which was lost,—the lost thing. Observe, (1.) The deplorable case of the sons of men; they were lost; here the whole race is spoken of as one body. Note, The whole world by the fall, is become a lost world: lost, as a revolted city; as a traveller who has missed his way in a wilderness; as a sick man whose disease is incurable; or as a prisoner when sentenced. (2.) The gracious design of the Son of God; He came to seek and save, to seek in order to save; from heaven to earth, to seek that which was lost, (Matt. 18: 11, 12.) and to save that which was perishing, when there was no salvation in any other. In prosecution of that design, He seeks those that sought Him not, as Zaccheus here.

added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear.

12 He said therefore, 'A certain nobleman went into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return.

13 And he called his ten servants and delivered them ten pounds, and said unto them, Occupy till I come.

14 But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us.

15 And it came to pass, that when he was returned, having received the kingdom, then he commanded these servants to be called unto him, to whom he had given the money, that he might know how much every man had gained by trading.

16 Then came the first, saying, 'Lord, thy pound hath gained ten pounds.

17 And he said unto him, 'Well, thou good

V. 11—27. Our Lord is now on his way to Jerusalem, to his last passover, when He was to suffer and die; we are told,

I. How the expectations of his friends were raised on this occasion, v. 11. The Pharisees expected it about this time, (ch. 17: 20.) and, it seems, so did Christ's own disciples; but both had a mistaken notion of it. The Pharisees thought it must be introduced by some other temporal prince or potentate. The disciples thought that their Master should introduce it, but with temporal pomp and power, with which, they knew, He could soon clothe Himself, by the power He had to work miracles. Jerusalem, they concluded, must be the seat of his kingdom, and therefore now He is going directly thither, they doubt not but in a little time to see Him enthroned there. Note, Even good men form wrong notions concerning the kingdom of Christ, and are ready to think that should immediately appear, which is reserved for hereafter.

II. How their expectations were checked, and the mistakes on which they were founded, rectified; and this in three things.

1. They expected He should appear in his glory now presently, but He tells them He must not be publicly installed in his kingdom for a great while yet, v. 12. Christ must go to heaven, to sit down at the right hand of the Father there, and to receive from Him honor and glory, before the Spirit were poured out, by which his kingdom should be set up on earth, and before a church should be set up for Him in the Gentile world. He must receive the kingdom, and then return. Christ returned when the Spirit was poured out; when Jerusalem was destroyed, by which time that generation, both of friends and enemies, which He had personally conversed with, was wholly worn off by death, and gone to give up their account. But his chief return here meant, is, that we are yet in expectation of, at the great day. That which they thought should immediately appear, Christ tells them will not appear, till this same Jesus, which is taken into heaven, shall in like manner come again; see Acts 1: 11.

2. They expected his apostles and immediate attendants should be advanced to dignity and honor; be made princes and peers, privy-counsellors and judges, and have all the pomp and preferments of the court; but Christ here tells them, that, instead of that, He designed them to be men of business, that they might employ themselves in serving Him, and the interest of his kingdom among men. That is the true honor of a Christian and a minister, of which, if we be, as we ought to be, truly ambitious, we shall be able to look on all temporal honors with a holy contempt. The apostles were pleasing themselves with the dream of sitting on his right hand, and on his left, in his kingdom, enjoying ease after their present toil, and honor after present contempt; but Christ tells them that which, if they understood it aright, would fill them with care and serious thoughts, instead of the aspiring ones they indulged.

(1.) They have a great work to do now; their Master leaves them to receive his kingdom, and at parting, He gives each of them a pound; (3l. 2s. 6d.) this signifies the same as the talents in the parallel parable, (Matt. 25:) all the gifts with which Christ's apostles were endowed, their advantages and capacities of serving the interest of Christ in the world, and others, both ministers and Christians, like them in a lower degree. But perhaps it is this represented in the parable, to make them more humble.

He gave these pounds to his servants, not to buy rich liveries, much less robes, and a splendid equipage, to appear in as they expected, but with this charge, Occupy, till I come. Or, (as it might much better be translated,) Trade till I come: Be busy. So the word properly signifies; 'You are sent forth to preach the Gospel, to set up a church for Christ in the world, to bring the nations to the obedience of faith, and to build them up in it; Ye shall receive power to do this, for ye shall be filled with the Holy Ghost,' Acts 1: 8. When Christ breathed on the eleven disciples, saying, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, then He delivered them ten pounds. 'Now,' saith He, 'mind your work, and make a business of it; set about it in earnest, and persevere; lay out yourselves to do all the good you can to the souls of men, and to gather them in to Christ.' Note, All Christians have a work to perform for Christ in this world, and ministers especially; the one was not baptized, nor the other ordained, to be idle. Those that are called to labor for Christ, He furnishes with the necessary gifts; and on the other hand, from those to whom He gives power, He expects service. He delivers the pounds with this charge, Go work, go trade. The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man, to profit withal, 1 Cor. 12: 7. And as every one has received the gifts, so let him minister the same, 1 Pet. 4: 10. We must continue to mind our business till our Master comes, whatever difficulties or oppositions we meet; those only that endure to the end, shall be saved.

(2.) They have a great account to make shortly. These servants are called to Him, to show what use they made of the gifts they were dignified with, what service they had done to Christ, and what good to the souls of men. v. 15. Note, [1.] They that trade diligently and faithfully in the service of Christ, shall be gainers; we cannot say so of the business of the world. [2.] The conversion of souls is the winning of them; every true convert is clear gain to Christ. Ministers are but factors for Him, and to Him they must give account what they have gained by trading. Now in the account given up, observe, 1st. The good account given by some of the servants, and the master's approbation. Two are instanced, v. 16, 19.

1. They had both made considerable improvements, but not both alike; one had gained ten pounds, and another five. Those that are diligent and faithful in serving Christ, are commonly blessed in being made blessings to the places where they live. They shall see the travail of their soul, and not labor in vain. And yet, all that are alike faithful, are not alike successful. And, perhaps, though they were both faithful, it is intimated that one of them took more pains, and applied himself more closely to his business, than the other, and sped accordingly; as blessed Paul, who labored more abundantly than they all, and fully preached the Gospel of Christ.

2. They both acknowledge their obligations to their Master, for intrusting them with these

Verses 11—27.

Our Lord now drew near Jerusalem; and his numerous attendants supposed He was about to avow himself the Messiah, and to set up his kingdom, in outward authority and majesty; (17: 20—23.) but to obviate this erroneous conclusion, He gave them a parabolical representation of what was about to take place in those respects. (Marg. Ref.—Matt. 25: 14—30.) The 'nobleman' evidently signifies Christ Himself, ascending into heaven to be exalted on the mediatorial throne, till his coming to judgment. The 'ten servants' denote his professed disciples, who were few, in comparison of the multitudes of his enemies, or of his subjects in the heavenly world. The 'pound,' given to each of them, to 'occupy,' or trade with, till his return, represents the gifts, abilities, or possessions intrusted to each person; with the means of grace, and encouragements and advantages for improvement, vouchsafed him; in the proper use of which, they prove themselves faithful servants, glorify their Lord, and do good, during their continuance on earth. (16: 1—8.) The 'citizens who hated him,' represent especially the Jewish nation, who hated the doctrine and kingdom of Christ, and did all they could to prevent his establishment. (Ps. 2: 1—6.) It was very common for ambassadors to be sent to Rome by cities and states, to oppose such as sought there an appointment to be king over them. His 'return,' after he had received the kingdom, which his enemies could not prevent, had reference to his coming to take vengeance on the Jews; but it also represents the final judgment of all men. (12.) Went into. Most of the kings of the East, in those times, were vassals to the Romans; so that the next heir seldom ventured to ascend the vacant throne, without their permission; and, in many instances, it was needful to travel to Rome; and very heavy expenses, and tedious delays, generally preceded even a favorable decision. To this case, which frequently occurred, and was familiar to the hearers, perhaps our Lord intended to make some distant allusion. (23.) Travelling. (Matt. 25: 27.) Not elsewhere N. T. Ex. 22: 25. Deut. 23: 10. Sept. A fair and adequate profit on money lent for commercial purposes, not gain made by occasion of the necessities of the poor, and by oppressing them. (Ex. 22: 25—27.)

servant: because thou hast been faithful in a very little, have thou authority over ten cities.

18 And the second came, saying, Lord, thy pound hath gained five pounds.

19 And he said likewise to him, 'Be thou also over five cities.

20 And another came, saying, 'Lord, behold, here is thy pound, which I have kept laid up in a napkin.

21 For ¹ I feared thee, because thou art an austere man; thou takest up that thou saydest not down, and reapest that thou didst not sow.

22 And he saith unto him, 'Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow.

23 Wherefore then gavest not thou my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury?

24 And he said unto them that stood by, 'Take from him the pound, and give it to him that hath ten pounds.

25 (And they said unto him, 'Lord, he hath ten pounds.)

26 For I say unto you, 'That unto every one which hath, shall abilities and opportunities to do him service; Lord, it is not my industry, but thy pound, that has gained ten pounds. Note, God must have all the glory of all our gains; not unto us, Ps. 115: 1. Paul, who gained the ten pounds, acknowledges, 'I labored, yet not I. By the grace of God I am what I am, and do what I do; and his grace was not in vain,' 1 Cor. 15: 10. He will not speak of what he had done, but of what God had done by him, Rom. 15: 18.

3. They were both commended for fidelity and industry; v. 17, 19. Note, They who do that which is good, shall have praise of the same. Do well, and Christ will say to thee, Well done; and if He saith, Well done, the matter is not great who saith otherwise. See Gen. 4: 7.

4. They were preferred in proportion to the improvement they had made; 'Because thou hast been faithful in a very little, and didst not say, "As good sit still as go to trade with one pound, what can one do with so small a stock?" but didst humbly and honestly apply thyself to the improvement of that, have thou authority over ten cities.' Note, Those are in a fair way to rise, who are content to begin low. He that has used the office of a deacon well, purchaseth to himself a good degree, 1 Tim. 3: 13. Two things are hereby promised the apostles; (1.) That, when they have taken pains to plant many churches, they shall have the satisfaction and honor of presiding in them, and governing among them, and have a great interest in the love and esteem of good Christians. He that keepeth the fig-tree, shall eat the fruit thereof; and he that laboreth in the word and doctrine, shall be counted worthy of double honor. (2.) That, when they have served their generation according to the will of Christ, though they pass through this world despised and trampled on, and perhaps pass out of it under disgrace and persecution, as the apostles did, yet in the other world they shall reign as kings with Christ, shall sit with Him on his throne, shall have power over the nations, Rev. 2: 26. The happiness of heaven will be a much greater advancement to a good minister or Christian, than it would be to a poor tradesman, that with much ado had cleared ten pounds, to be made governor of ten cities. He that had gained but five pounds, had dominion over five cities. This intimates that there are degrees of glory in heaven; every vessel will be alike full, but not alike large. And the degrees of glory there, will be according to the degrees of usefulness here.

2dly. The bad account given by one of them, and the sentence passed on him, for his slothfulness and unfaithfulness, v. 20, &c.

1. He owned that he had not traded with the pound, v. 20. 'True, I have not made it more, but withal I have not made it less.' This represents the carelessness of those who have gifts, but never lay out themselves to do good with them; it is all one to them, whether the interests of Christ's kingdom go backward or forward; for their parts, they will take no care about it, no pains, be at no expenses, run no hazard; those are the servants that lay up their pound in a napkin; who think it is enough to say, that they have done no hurt in the world, but did no good.

2. He justified himself in his omission, with a plea that made the matter worse, not better, v. 21. Austere is the Greek word itself; a sharp man; Thou takest up that thou laidst not down. He thought his master put a hardship on his servants, when he required and expected the improvement of their pounds, and that it was reaping where He did not sow, whereas really it was reaping where he had sown, and, as the husbandman, expects in proportion to what he had sown. He had no reason to fear his master's austerity, nor blame his expectations; but this was a mere frivolous, groundless excuse for his idleness, which there was no manner of excuse for. Note, The pleas of slothful professors, when they come to be examined, will be found more to their shame than their justification.

3. His excuse is turned upon him, v. 22. He will be condemned by his crime, but self-condemned by his plea. If he durst not trade, for fear of losing the principal, and so being made accountable to his lord for it, though it was lost, which he pretends, yet that would be no excuse for his not setting it out to interest where it would be sure. Note, Whatever may be the pretences of slothful professors, in excuse for slothfulness, the true reason of it is a reigning indifference to the interests of Christ and his kingdom, and their coldness therein. They care not whether religion gets ground or loses ground, so they can but live at ease.

4. His pound is taken from him, v. 24. It fits those should lose, who will not use their gifts; and that those who have gifts falsely should be no longer trusted. Those who will not serve their master with what he bestows on them, why should they be suffered to serve themselves with it? Take from him the pound.

5. It is given to him that had the ten pounds. When this was objected against by the standers-by, because he had so much already, (v. 25.) it is answered, (v. 26.) Unto every one that hath shall be given. It is the rule of justice, (1.) That those should be most encouraged, who have been most industrious, and that those who have laid out themselves most to do good, should have their opportunities of doing good enlarged, and be put into a higher and more extensive sphere of usefulness. To him that hath gotten shall more be given, that he may be in a capacity to get more. (2.) That those who have their gifts, as if they had them not, who do no good with them, should be deprived of them. To those who endeavor to increase the grace they have, God will increase it; those who neglect it, and suffer it to decline, can expect no other than that God should do so too. This needful warning Christ gives to his disciples, lest, while they were gaping for honors on earth, they should neglect their business, and so come short of their happiness in heaven.

6. Another thing they expected was, that, when the kingdom of God should appear, the body of the Jewish nation should immediately fall in with it, and all their aversions to Christ and his Gospel immediately vanish; but Christ tells them that, after his departure, the generality of them would persist in their obstinacy and rebellion, and it would be their ruin. This is showed here,

(1.) In the message which his citizens sent after him, v. 14. They not only opposed Him, while He was in obscurity, but continued their enmity, and protested against his dominion, when He was gone into glory, to be invested in his kingdom. We will not have this man to reign over us. [1.] This was fulfilled in the prevailing infidelity of the Jews, after the ascension of Christ, and the setting up of the gospel-kingdom; they would not submit their necks to his yoke, nor touch the top of his golden sceptre. They said, Let us break his bands in sunder, Ps. 2: 1-3. Acts 4: 26. [2.] It speaks the language of all unbelievers; they could be content that Christ should save them, but they will not have him to reign over them; whereas Christ is a Savior to those only to whom he is a Prince, and who are willing to obey Him.

(17.) Over five cities. 'An allusion to the custom formerly (as it seems) prevalent in the East, of assigning the government and revenues of a certain number of cities or towns, as a reward to a meritorious officer. So Athenæus. Thus Artaxerxes assigned to Theomistocles two cities, or, as some say, five.'

[Practical Observations.]

28 ¶ And when he had thus spoken, he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem.

29 And it came to pass, when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount called the mount of Olives, he sent two of his disciples, 30 Saying, Go ye into the village over against you; in the which, at your entering, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat: loose him, and bring him hither.

31 And if any man ask you, Why do ye loose him? thus shall ye say unto him, Because the Lord hath need of him.

32 And they that were sent went their way, and found even as he had said unto them.

33 And as they were loosing the colt, the owners thereof said unto them, Why loose ye the colt?

34 And they said, The Lord hath need of him.

35 And they brought him to Jesus: and they cast their garments upon the colt,

(2.) In the sentence passed on them at his return, v. 27. When his faithful subjects are preferred and rewarded, then He will take vengeance on his enemies; and particularly on the Jewish nation, the doom of which is here read. When Christ had set up his gospel-kingdom, and thereby put reputation on the gospel-ministry, then He comes to reckon with the Jews; then it is remembered against them, that they had particularly disclaimed and protested against his kingly office, when they said, We have no king but Cæsar, nor would own him for their king; they appealed to Cæsar, and to Cæsar they shall go; Cæsar shall be their ruin. Then the kingdom of God appeared, when vengeance was taken on those irreconcilable enemies to Christ and his government; they were brought forth, and slain before Him. Never was so much slaughter made in any war as in the wars of the Jews. That nation lived to see Christianity victorious in the Gentile world, in spite of their enmity and opposition to it, and then it was taken away as dross. The wrath of Christ came on them to the uttermost, (1 Thess. 2: 15, 16.) and their destruction roundly very much to the honor of Christ, and the peace of the church. But this is applicable to all others who persist in infidelity. Note, [1.] Utter ruin will certainly be the portion of all Christ's enemies; in the day of vengeance they shall all be brought forth, and slain before Him. Bring them hither, to be made a spectacle to saints and angels; see Josh. 10: 22, 24. Bring them hither, that they may see the glory and happiness of Christ and his followers, whom they hated and persecuted. Bring them hither, to have their frivolous pleas overruled, and to receive sentence according to their merits. Bring them, and slay them before Me, as Agag before Samuel. The Savior whom they have slighted, will stand by, and see them slain, and not interpose on their behalf. [2.] Those that will not have Christ to reign over them, shall be reputed and dealt with as his enemies. We are ready to think that none are Christ's enemies but persecutors of Christianity, or scoffers at least; but you see that those will be and they set Jesus thereon.

36 And as they went, they spread their clothes in the way.

37 And when he was come nigh, even now at the descent of the mount of Olives, the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice, and praise God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works that they had seen;

38 Saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord; peace in heaven, and glory in the highest.

39 And some of the Pharisees from among the multitude said unto him, Master, rebuke thy disciples.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 11-27. It behoves us carefully to study the nature of the Redeemer's kingdom, that we may understand our present situation, and form just expectations in respect of the future. Our blessed Lord is indeed established on his glorious throne; and it is vain to send a message after Him, refusing submission to his authority: yet many, even from professed regard to the honor and worship of God, (like the Jews of old,) speak as if this was left to their option. They seem to think, that they may choose their own way of approaching God, or entering heaven; and determine for themselves by what Judge, or according to what rule, their final doom shall be determined. But these things are immutably settled; and all, who will not have the Savior to reign over them, shall be punished as enemies to his Person and kingdom.—He has indeed received a kingdom, and will certainly return; but He is now unseen, except by faith; so that true believers alone act as in his presence, and as expecting and preparing for his coming. (Phil. 3: 20, 21. 2 Tim. 4: 6-8. Tit. 2: 13. Heb. 9: 27, 28. 2 Pet. 3: 1-4.) Alas! the number, even of his professed servants, is very small, in proportion to that of his enemies; and their ability is often little, compared to the talents and possessions which ungodly men abuse. Yet if, in humble faith, cheerful diligence, and patient hope, they occupy with that little, till their Lord comes, their reward shall be exceedingly great, and exactly proportioned to the improvement made: though every faithful servant will allow, that the power, the opportunity, and the will to improve them, were wholly from the Lord. (1 Chr. 29: 9-19.) This union of faithfulness, diligence, and humility, insures a gracious acceptance; and these views of the Redeemer's abundant grace encourage the humble believer to increasing diligence; whilst hypocrites are deterred from activity by hard thoughts of Him, and a persuasion that his service is unprofitable. But, whatever excuses and pleas such men now make for their indolence or avarice, their mouths will soon be stopped; and their unimproved advantages will be taken from them, to enrich the faithful servants. For unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away. (P. O. Matt. 25: 14-30.)

40 And he answered and said unto them, I tell you, that if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out.

41 ¶ And when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, 42 Saying, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes.

43 For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, 44 And shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation.

45 ¶ And he went into the temple, and began to cast out them that sold therein, and them that bought;

46 Saying unto them, "It is written, My house is the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves.

47 ¶ And he taught daily in the temple. But the chief priests, and the scribes, and the chief of the people sought to destroy him, 48 And could not find what they might do: for all the people were very attentive to hear him.

¶ Ps. 96:11, 98:7-9. 114:1-8. Is. 55:12. Hab. 2:11. Matt. 3:9, 21:15, 16. 27:45, 51-54. 2 Pet. 2:2.

they have not, should not think that enough, but should be ready to serve Him with whatever they have themselves, wherewith He may be served and honored. Many can attend Christ at other people's expense, who care not to be at any charge for Him themselves; but those disciples not only fetched the ass's colt for Him, but cast their own garments upon the colt.

VII. Christ's triumphs are the matter of the disciples' praises. When Christ came nigh to Jerusalem, God suddenly put it into the hearts of the whole multitude of the disciples, not the twelve only, but abundance more, that were disciples at large, to rejoice and praise God; (v. 37.) and their spreading of their clothes in the way, (v. 36.) was a common expression of joy, as at the feast of tabernacles. Observe, 1. The matter of their joy and praise. They praised God for all the mighty works of Christ they had seen, especially the raising of Lazarus, John 12:17, 18. Fresh miracles and mercies should revive the remembrance of the former. 2. How they expressed their joy and praise, v. 38. Christ is the King, He comes in the name of the Lord, clothed with a divine authority, commissioned from heaven to give law, and treat of peace: blessed be He. Let us praise Him, let God prosper Him. He is blessed forever, and we will speak well of Him. Peace in heaven. Let the God of heaven send peace and success to his undertaking, and then there will be glory in the highest. It will redound to the glory of the most high God: and the angels, the glorious inhabitants of the upper world, will give Him the glory of it. Compare this song of the saints on earth with that of the angels; (ch. 2:14.) they both agree to give glory to God in the highest, there the praises of both centre; the angels say, On earth peace, rejoicing in the benefit which men on earth have by Christ; the saints say, Peace in heaven, rejoicing in the benefit which the angels have by Christ; such is the communion we have with the holy angels, that, as they rejoice in the peace on earth, so we rejoice in the peace in heaven, the peace God makes in his high places, (Job 25:2.) and both in Christ, who hath reconciled all things, on earth and in heaven, to Himself.

VIII. Christ's triumphs, and his disciples' joyful praises of them, are the vexation of proud Pharisees, that are enemies to Him and his kingdom. Some of these, so far from joining with the multitude, were enraged at them, and Christ being so remarkable an example of humility, they thought He would not admit such acclamations, and expected He should rebuke his disciples, v. 39. But Christ, as He

Verse 40.

I tell you, &c.] The numerous miracles which had wrought up our Lord, and the evident fulfilment of ancient prophecies in Him, rendered it so manifest that He was the promised Messiah, that if the Jews refused to own and honor Him as such, some other method would be taken, which would appear to the Pharisees as strange, as if the very stones should speak, and declare Him to be 'the King of Israel,' and 'the Lord of glory.' The expression was proverbial; but the calling of the Gentiles seems to have been alluded to. (Marg. Ref. m.—Hab. 2:9-11. Matt. 3:7-10.) It is observable, that towards the close of his life, our Lord gradually laid aside that reserve, which He before used. He no longer enjoined silence on those who were healed by Him; and in this instance He expressly declared Himself to be 'the Son of David' and 'the King of Israel.' His time was now come; and the reasons for his former caution no longer existed. 'When they linger, who ought to be the chief preachers and setters forth of the kingdom of God, He will raise up others extraordinarily, in despite of their sin.' Beza.

Verses 42, 43.

'Christ is not simply delighted with the destruction, no, not of the wicked,' Beza. The possibility, nay, the actual existence, of a union between awful, inflexible justice, denouncing sentence against the criminal, and benevolence sympathizing in his misery, even to tears, is most affectingly shown in this passage. So that it stands as an unanswerable refutation of the charges, which are constantly despises the contempt of the proud, so He accepts the praises of the humble.

IX. Whether men praise Christ or no, He will, and shall, and must, be praised, v. 40. The stones would immediately cry out, rather than that Christ should not be praised; which was, in effect, literally the case, when, upon men's reviling Christ on the cross, instead of praising Him, and his own disciples' sinking into a profound silence, the earth did quake, and the rocks rent. Pharisees would silence the praises of Christ, but cannot gain their point; for as God can out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, so He can out of the mouths of those children perfect praise.

V. 41-48. The great Ambassador from heaven is here making his public entry into Jerusalem, not to be respected there, but to be rejected; yet see here two instances of his love and concern for that place.

I. The tears He shed, for the approaching ruin of the city, v. 41. Probably, it was when coming down the descent of the mount of Olives, where He had a full view of the city, the large extent of it, and its many stately structures, his eye affected his heart, and his heart his eye again. See, 1. What a tender spirit Christ was of; we never read that He laughed, but we often find Him in tears. In this very place his father David wept, and those that were with him, though men of war. There are cases in which it is no disparagement to the stoutest of men, to melt into tears. 2. Christ wept in the midst of his triumphs, when all about Him were rejoicing, to show how little He was elevated with the applause and acclamation of the people. Thus He would teach us to rejoice with trembling, and as though we rejoiced not. If Providence do not stain the beauty of our triumphs, we may ourselves see cause to sully it with our sorrows. 3. He wept over Jerusalem. Note, There are cities to be wept over, and none to be more lamented than Jerusalem, that had been the holy city, and the joy of the whole earth, if it be degenerated. But why did Christ weep at the sight of Jerusalem? Was it because 'Yonder is the city in which I must be betrayed, bound, scourged, spit on, condemned, crucified?' No, He gives us the reason:

1. Jerusalem has not improved the day of her opportunities. He wept, and said, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, if thou wouldst but yet know, while the Gospel is preached to thee, and salvation offered thee by it; if thou wouldst at length bethink thyself, and understand the things that belong to thy peace, the making of thy peace with God, and the securing of thine own spiritual and brought against those who denounce the vengeance of God on impenitent sinners, as if they must of course be actuated by malevolence. All such accusations involve the Savior Himself, as well as the prophets and apostles, and with modern teachers and professors of Christianity, under one general condemnation. (Jer. 9:1, 2, 10, 11. Ez. 18:23. Rom. 9:1-3.) The language of the original is abrupt and interrupted, and peculiarly suited to show the deep interest which the Speaker took in the concerns of those about whom He was discoursing. 'It was judged an almost impracticable work, to compass the whole city with a wall; yet Titus animating his soldiers, in three days they built a wall of thirty-nine furlongs, having thirteen castles in it.' Josephus, quoted by Whitby. (Marg. Ref. s.—21:20-24. Matt. 23:37-39.)

(33.) 'Euthymius observes that here is both a prophecy and a description of the siege. French.] "First, they dug a ditch; then from the earth thrown up they constructed a mound; finally, the wooden pales (the word here used) were driven down at the bottom part of the mound near the ditch, to prevent the earth from falling back, and to preserve the mound in due form. The whole was called agger." Wetstein.

Were very attentive.] 'Listened with so great attention and pleasure, that they hung, as it were, on his lips while He spoke.'

CHAP. XX.

Jesus answers those who demand by what authority He so, it, 1-3; speaks the parable of the vineyard let out to wicked husbandmen, 9-19; shews that tribute should be paid to Caesar, 19-26; confutes the Sadducees, concerning the resurrection of the dead; and puts all his adversaries to silence, 27-40; inquires how Christ was both David's Son, and David's Lord, 41-44; and warns the people against the ambitious and hypocritical scribes, 45-47.

AND it came to pass, ^athat on one of those days, as he taught the people in the temple, ^bthe chief priests and the scribes came upon him, with the elders,

kened, then is the time of visitation, when those things which belong to our peace, which we are all concerned to know and understand; the way, the offers, the terms, the benefits of peace. The things that belong to our peace, are those things that relate to our present and future welfare; these we must know with application. [2.] There is a time of visitation, when those things which belong to our peace, may be known by us, and to good purpose. When we enjoy the means of grace in great plenty, as powerfully preached to us, when the Spirit strives with us, and our own consciences are startled and awakened, then is the time of visitation, which we are concerned to improve. [3.] Those that have long neglected the time of their visitation, if at length, if at last, in this their day, their eyes be opened, and they bethink themselves, all will be well yet. Those shall not be refused, that come into the vineyard at the eleventh hour. [4.] It is the amazing folly of multitudes that enjoy the means of grace, and it will be of fatal consequence to them, that they do not improve the day of their opportunities. The things of their peace are revealed to them, but are not minded or regarded by them; they hide their eyes from them, as if they were not worth taking notice of. They are not aware of the accepted time and the day of salvation, and so let it slip and perish through mere carelessness. None are so blind as those that will not see; nor have any the things of their peace more certainly hid from their eyes, than those that turn their back on them. [5.] The sin and folly of those that persist in a contempt of gospel-grace, are a great grief to the Lord Jesus, and should be so to us. He looks with weeping eyes on lost souls, that continue impenitent, and run headlong upon their own ruin; He had rather they would turn and live, than go on and die, for He is not willing that any should perish.

2. Jerusalem cannot escape the day of her desolation. The things of her peace are now in a manner hid from her eyes; they will be shortly. Not but that after this the Gospel was preached to them by the apostles: all the house of Israel were called to know assuredly that Christ was their Peace, (Acts 2: 36.) and multitudes were convinced and converted. But as to the body of the nation, and the leading part of it, it was sealed up under unbelief, God had given them the spirit of slumber, Rom. 11: 8. They were so prejudiced and enraged against the Gospel, and those few that did embrace it then, that nothing less than a miracle of divine grace (like that which converted Paul) would work upon them; and it could not be expected that such a miracle should be wrought, and so they were justly given up to judicial blindness and hardness. The peaceful things are not hid from the eyes of particular persons; but it is too late to think now of the nation of the Jews as such, becoming a Christian nation, by embracing Christ.

And therefore they are marked for ruin, which Christ here foresees and foretells, as the certain consequence of their rejecting Him. Note, Neglecting the great salvation often brings temporal judgments on a people; it did so on Jerusalem in less than forty years after this; when all that Christ here foretold was exactly fulfilled. [1.] The Romans besieged the city, cast a trench about it, compassed it round, and kept their inhabitants in on every side. Josephus relates, that Titus run up a wall in a very short time, which surrounded the city, and cut off all hopes of escaping. [2.] They laid it even with the ground. Titus commanded his soldiers to dig up the city, and the whole compass of it was levelled, except three towers; see Josephus' History of the Wars of the Jews, lib. 5. cap. 27. lib. 7. cap. 1. Not only the city but the citizens, were laid even with the ground. (thy children within thee,) by the cruel slaughters that were made of them: and there was scarcely one stone left upon another. This was for their crucifying of Christ, this was because they knew not the day of their visitation. Let other cities and nations take warning.

II. The zeal He shewed for the present purifying of the temple. Though it must be destroyed ere long, it does not therefore follow, that no care must be taken of it in the mean time.

1. Christ cleared it of those who profaned it. He went straight to the temple, and began to cast out the buyers and sellers, v. 45. Hereby (though represented as an enemy to the temple, and that was the crime laid to his charge before the high priest) He made it to appear that He had a truer love for the temple than they had who had such a veneration for its corban, its treasury, as a sacred thing; for its purity, more than its wealth, was its glory.

2. He put it to the best use it was ever put to, for He taught daily in the temple, v. 47. Note, It is not enough that the corruption of a church be purged out, but the preaching of the Gospel must be encouraged. Now, when Christ preached in the temple, observe,

(1.) How spiteful the church-rulers were against Him; how industrious to seek opportunity, or pretence rather, to do Him mischief, v. 47. The great sanhedrim, that should have attended Him, and summoned the people too to attend Him, sought to destroy Him.

(2.) How respectful the common people were to Him; they were very attentive to hear Him. He spent most of his time in the country, but when He preached in the temple, the people paid Him great respect, and let no opportunity slip of hearing Him—would not lose a word. Some read it, All the people, as they heard Him, took his part; and so it comes in very properly, as a reason why his enemies could not find what they might do against Him; they saw the people ready to oppose, if they offered Him any violence. Till his hour was come, his interest in the common people protected Him: but when his hour was come, the chief priests' influence on them delivered Him up.

CHAP. XX. v. 1-8. Nothing is added here to what we had in the other evangelists; only in the first verse,

I. He was now teaching, and preaching the Gospel. Note, Christ was a Preacher of his

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 29-49. When 'the Lord hath need of' ought belonging to us, we should readily devote it to his service.—But what will be the feelings of the multitude of the disciples, when they shall behold their Lord and Savior return in his glory to judge the world! How will they then rejoice and praise God, with a loud voice, for all the mighty works which they have seen! In anticipation of this joy, let us now gladly welcome every display of his grace, in the conversion of sinners and the success of his Gospel; exulting in the triumphs of our 'King, who cometh in the name of the Lord,' and rejoicing that 'there is glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good-will to men.'—But, who can behold the holy Jesus weeping over the city, where his precious blood was about to be shed, in the prospect of the miseries awaiting his insulting murderers; without perceiving that the image of God, in human nature, consists very much in expanded benevolence and tender compassion to the miserable, even when their miseries are most justly deserved? Surely, then, those persons, who take up certain doctrines of the Gospel in such a manner, as to have their hearts rendered by them more callous towards their fellow-sinners; and who (from topics grounded on God's secret purposes) object to compassion for perishing sinners, or prayers for men in general, have far more of the Pharisee in them, than of 'the mind that was in Christ Jesus!—But let every one apply his mind to know, 'in the day of his visitation,' the things which belong to his eternal peace; for though Jesus wept over Jerusalem, yet He did not fail to execute vengeance upon it: and though 'He delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live;' yet He will surely accomplish his most awful threatenings on all who 'neglect his great salvation.' May He then come, and cleanse our hearts by his Spirit, that they may be a holy temple to the Lord! May He purify his church and his holy ordinances, from all those practices and persons, which pervert or defile them! May his obstinate enemies be disappointed, and not find what to do; while sinners on every side become attentive to his words of truth and salvation! (P. O. Matt. 21: 1-11.)

SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. v. 1. The chief priests, and the elders of the people. These titles frequently occur, but it is not easy to fix a determinate idea to them. By the chief priests, I think we may understand any particular distinction in the Aaronic family; so that it may include the high priest his deputy or sagan, any of the heads of the twenty-four courses of priests who might happen to be in waiting, and likewise any of those whom the Talmudists called Catholicin, Amarcalin, and Mummim, who, (if their testimony be true) were appointed to preside over the other priests and Levites, and to regulate the watch, the singers, &c.' See Reland.

DESI RIDER.

2 And spake unto him, saying, 'Tell us, By what authority doest thou these things? or, 'Who is he that gave thee this authority?

3 And he answered and said unto them, 'I will also ask you one thing; and answer me, 4 The 'baptism of John, was it 'from heaven, or of men?

5 And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven; he will say, 'Why then believed ye him not?

6 But and if we say, Of men; 'all the people will stone us: 'for they be persuaded that John was a prophet.

7 And they answered, 'That they could not tell whence it was.

8 And Jesus said unto them, 'Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things.

9 ¶ Then began he to speak to the people 'this parable: A certain man 'planted a vineyard, 'and let it forth to 'husbandmen, and 'went into a far country for a long time.

10 And at 'the season he 'sent a servant to the husbandmen, that they should give him of the fruit of the vineyard: but the husbandmen 'beat him, and sent him away empty.

11 And again he sent another servant; and they beat him also, and 'entreated him shamefully, 'and sent him away empty.

12 And again he sent the third; and they wounded him also, and cast him out.

13 Then said the lord of the vineyard, 'What shall I do? 'I will send my beloved son: 'it may be they will reverence him when they see him.

14 But when the husbandmen saw him, they 'reasoned among themselves, saying, This is 'the heir: come, 'let us kill him, own Gospel. He not only purchased salvation for us, but published it to us, a great confirmation of the truth of the Gospel, and abundant encouragement to receive it, for it is a sign that the heart of Christ was much upon it, to have it received. This likewise honors preachers of the Gospel, their office and work, how much soever despised by a vain world. It honors sober preachers; Christ thus condescended to the capacities of the people, and taught them. And observe, He had this interruption (v. 1.) when preaching the Gospel to the people: which Satan and his agents do all they can to hinder, for nothing weakens his kingdom more.

II. His enemies are here said to come upon Him—a word used only here, intimating, 1. That they came on Him suddenly, hoping to catch Him unprovided with an answer, as if this were not a thing He had Himself thought of. 2. That they thought to frighten Him with this question. They came upon Him in a body, with violence. But how could the wrath of men terrify Him who had power to restrain it, and turn it to his praise? From this we learn,

(1.) That it is not to be thought strange, if even that which is evident to a demonstration, be called in question, as doubtful, by those that shut their eyes against the light. Christ's miracles showed plainly his authority, and sealed his commission; yet this is here arraigned.

(2.) Those that question Christ's authority, if but catechized in the plainest principles of religion, will have their folly made manifest to all. Christ answered these priests and scribes with a plain question concerning the baptism of John, which the meanest of the common people could answer: Was it from heaven, or of men? They all knew it was from heaven, nothing but it had an earthly relish or tendency, but all was divine. This question run them aground, and shamed them before the people.

(3.) It is not strange if men, governed by reputation and secular interest, imprison the plainest truths, and stifle the strongest convictions, as these priests and scribes, who, to save their credit, would not own John's baptism to be from heaven, and had no other reason for not saying it was of men, but because they feared the people. What good can be expected from men of such a spirit?

(4.) Further knowledge is justly denied to those who bury what they have. It was just with Christ, to refuse to give an account of his authority to them, that knew the baptism of John to be from heaven, and would not believe in him, nor own their knowledge, v. 7, 8.

V. 9–19. Christ spake this against those who were resolved not to own his authority, on evidence ever so full and convincing: and very appositely to show that, by questioning his authority, they forfeited their own. Their disowning the lord of their vineyard, was a defeasance of their lease of it, and a giving up of their title.

I. The scope of the parable is to show that the Jewish nation, by persecuting the prophets, and at length Christ Himself, had provoked God to take away all their church privileges, abandoning them to ruin.

1. God, by setting up revealed religion and instituted orders in the world, hath planted a vineyard, which He lets out to those among whom his tabernacle is. They have vineyard work to do, needful and constant work, but pleasant and profitable. Man was, for sin, condemned to till the ground; they that have a place in the church, are resorted to Adam's work in innocency, to dress the garden, and keep it, for the church is a paradise, and Christ the Tree of life in it. They have also vineyard-fruits to present to the Lord of the vineyard; rents to be paid, and services done, which, though bearing no proportion to the value of the premises, must be done, and paid.

2. The work of God's ministers is, to call on those who enjoy the privileges of the church, to bring forth fruit accordingly. They are God's rent-gatherers, to remind the husbandmen of their arrears, or rather to remind them that their Landlord expects to hear from them, and to receive some acknowledgment of their dependence on, and obligation to Him, v. 10. The Old-Testament prophets were sent on this errand to the Jewish church, to demand from them the duty and obedience they owed to God.

3. God's faithful servants have often been wretchedly abused by his own tenants; beaten and treated shamefully by those who resolved to send them empty away. They that are resolved not to do their duty to God, cannot bear to be called on to do it. Some of the best men in the world have had the hardest usage from it, for their best services.

4. God sent his Son into the world to carry on the same work with the prophets, to gather the fruits of the vineyard for God. The prophets spake as servants, Thus saith the Lord; but Christ as a Son, among his own, Verily I say unto you. Honoring them so far as to send Him, one would have thought, should have won on them.

5. Those who reject Christ's ministers, would reject Christ Himself, should He come to them; for it has been tried, and found, that the persecutors and murderers of his servants the prophets, were the persecutors and murderers of Christ Himself. They said, This is the Heir; come, let us kill him. When they slew the servants, other servants were sent; 'But if we can but kill the son, there is no other son to be sent, and then we shall no longer be molested with these demands.' The scribes and Pharisees promised themselves, that if they could but get Christ out of the way, they should forever be masters in the Jewish church; and therefore took the bold step.

6. Putting Christ to death, filled up the measure of Jewish iniquity, and brought on them ruin without remedy. No other could be expected than that God should destroy those wicked husbandmen. They began in not paying their rent, then proceeded to beat and kill the servants, and at length the Son of their Master Himself. Note, Those that neglect their duty to God, know not what degrees of sin and destruction they are running into.

II. To the application of the parable is added here, what we had not before, their deprecation of the doom included in it; God forbid, let not this be done; so it should read; though they could not but own that for such a sin such a punishment was just, and to be expected, yet they could not bear to hear of it. Note, It is the folly and stupidity of sinners, that they persevere in sinful ways, though at the same time they have a foresight and dread of the destruction at the end of those ways. They cheat themselves, in thinking to avoid it by a cold God forbid, when they do nothing to prevent it; but will this make the threatening of no effect?

Verse 13.

'The question is not here, how prudent it would have been in a human father to venture his son in such a case as this; for the power which God had of raising Christ from the dead, and making all his sufferings redound to his glory and happiness, quite alters the case.' DODDRIDGE.

'It may be.' The original means scarcely.

15 So they cast him out of the vineyard, and killed him. What therefore shall the lord of the vineyard do unto them?

16 He shall come and destroy these husbandmen, and shall give the vineyard to others. And when they heard it, they said, God forbid.

17 And he beheld them, and said, What is this then that is written, The Stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the Head of the corner?

18 Whosoever shall fall upon that Stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.

[Practical Observations.]

19 And the chief priests and the scribes, the same hour, sought to lay hands on him; and they feared the people: for they perceived that he had spoken this parable against them.

20 And they watched him, and sent forth spies, which should feign themselves just men, that they might take hold of his words, that so they might deliver him unto the power and authority of the governor.

Observe what Christ said to this ch. 21. deprecation. 1. He beheld them; (noticed only by this evangelist, v. 17.) He looked on them with compassion, grieved to see them cheat themselves thus to their own ruin. He beheld them, to see if they would blush at their folly, or to discern in their countenances any show of relenting. 2. He referred them to the Scripture: 'What is this then that is written?' How can you escape the judgment of God, when you cannot prevent the exaltation of Him whom you despise and reject? The word of God hath said, The Stone which the builders rejected, is become the Head of the corner. Jesus will be exalted to the Father's right hand, to Him all judgment and power are committed, He is the Corner-stone and Top-stone of the church; his enemies then can expect no other than to be destroyed; for even those that slight Him, that stumble at, and are offended in Him, shall be broken, ruined; but those that not only reject, but hate and persecute Him, as the Jews, He will fall upon them, and grind them to powder. The condemnation of spiteful persecutors will be much sorer, than that of careless unbelievers.

Lastly, The chief priests and scribes were exasperated; v. 19. They perceived He spake this parable against them. A guilty conscience needs no accuser; but they, instead of yielding to conviction, fell into a rage at Him who awakened that sleeping lion in their bosoms, and sought to lay hands on Him. Their corruptions rebelled against their convictions, and got the victory. And it was not because they had any fear of God, but only because they feared the people, that they did not now make his words good; This is the heir, come let us kill Him. Note: When the hearts of the sons of men are fully set to do evil, the fairest warnings both of the sin they are about to commit, and of its consequences, make no impression on them. Christ tells them they would kill the Son of God; upon which they should have said, What, is thy servant a dog? But they, in effect, say, 'And so we will; and that now.' And though they deprecate the punishment of the sin, in the next breath they are projecting the commission of it.

V. 20-26. Christ here evades a snare laid for Him, by a question about tribute. We had this both in Matthew and Mark.

I. The mischief designed Him, more fully related than before. The plot was to deliver Him unto the power and authority of the governor, v. 20. They could not themselves put the way of God truly:

22 Is it lawful for us to give tribute unto Cæsar, or no?

23 But he perceived their craftiness, and said unto them, Why tempt ye me?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-18. Men often profess to inquire into the evidences or doctrines of Revelation, when secretly determined not to submit to its authority, and in fact, only seeking plausible apologies for their infidelity and disobedience. But the fear of man, and regard to reputation, deter them from avowing their real sentiments and purposes. Objectors of this character should be answered with pertinence, brevity, and caution. Without formal controversy with them, the best way is to address their consciences by apt illustrations, closely applied; and so to detect those corrupt affections, or secret sins, which are the real grounds of their dislike to the Bible, but which they endeavor to conceal even from themselves. In this way it may often be shown, that they resemble, in pride, perverseness, ingratitude, enmity to God, and aversion to his holy service those men who murdered the prophets, and crucified the Son of God.—But it behoves every one of us, who are favored with the Word and ordinances of God, to inquire, whether we make an adequate improvement of our advantages, and act consistently with our professed subjection to the Gospel. For awful will be the doom, not only of builders who reject 'the Head-Stone of the corner,' but of those who profess to 'reverence the Son,' and yet render not the fruits of the vineyard in due season. (P. O. Matt. 21: 23-46.)

Head of the corner.] The splendor and magnificence of an edifice seems to have been estimated, in a measure, by the size of the square stones, of which it was constructed. 1 Kings 7:9-12. The foundation-stone, which was probably placed at the corner, and thence called the corner-stone, was an object of particular regard, and was selected with great care from among the others.

Verse 18.

On whom.] The persevering opposition of the Roman empire, in all its forms, and in every age, to Christ and his cause, and the final dreadful destruction, of it, may here be predicted, along with the calamities and miseries of the Jews. (Dan. 2: 34-45. Zech. 14: -3.) The dreadful punishment of all persecutors is also intimated.

SCOTT.

Verses 19-26.

(Marg. Ref.—Matt. 22: 15-22. Mark 12: 13-17.) It would be well, if all who are insidiously watched and questioned on political subjects, would imitate our Lord's conduct; neither intermeddling with disputable points, nor maintaining a suspicious silence; but plainly showing, that obedience and tribute should be rendered, ever to usurpers and heathens, while possessed of authority; except where the higher obligation of obedience to God requires the contrary. Lu.

24 Shew me * a penny. Whose image and superscription hath it? They answered and said, 'Caesar's.'

25 And he said unto them, 'Render therefore unto Caesar the things which be Caesar's, and unto God the things which be God's.'

26 And they could not take hold of his words before the people; and they marvelled at his answer, and held their peace.

27 ¶ Then came to him certain of the Sadducees, which deny that there is any resurrection; and they asked him,

28 Saying, Master, 'Moses wrote unto us, If any man's brother die, having a wife, and he die without children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.'

29 There were therefore seven brethren; and the first took a wife, and died without children.

30 And the second took her to wife, and he died childless.

31 And the third took her; and in like manner the seven also; and they left no children, and died.

32 Last of all the woman died also.

33 Therefore in the resurrection, whose wife of them is she? for seven had her to wife.

34 And Jesus answering, said unto free them from the Roman yoke, and stand by them in denying tribute to Caesar. But if He should say that it was not lawful, as they expected, (for if He had not been of that mind, they thought He could not have been so much the darling of the people,) then they should have what they wanted, something to accuse Him of to the governor.

IV. His evading their snare, v. 23. Note. The most crafty cannot, with all their art, conceal from his cognizance their designs against Christ and his Gospel. He did not give them a direct answer, but reproved them for offering to impose on Him; (Why tempt ye Me?) and called for a piece of money, current with the merchants; (Shew Me a penny;) and asked whose it was; whose stamp it bore; who coined it. They owned, 'It is Caesar's.' 'Why then,' saith Christ, 'you should first have asked whether it was lawful to pay and receive Caesar's money among yourselves, and to admit that to be the instrument of your commerce. But you, having granted that by common consent, are concluded by your own act, and, no doubt, ought to give tribute to him who furnished you this convenience for trade, protects you in it, and lends you the sanction of his authority for the value of your money. Therefore render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's. In civil things submit to the civil powers, and if Caesar protects you in your civil rights by laws and the administration of justice, pay him tribute; but in sacred things, God only is your King, you are not bound to be of Caesar's religion; you must render to God the things that are God's, must worship and adore Him only, and not any golden image Caesar sets up; and we must worship and adore Him in a way He has appointed, and not according to the inventions of Caesar. God only has authority to say, My son, give Me thy heart.'

V. Their confusion, v. 26. 1. The snare is broken. They could not fasten on any thing wherewith to incense either the governor or people against Him. 2. Christ is honored; even the wrath of man is made to praise Him. They marvelled at his answer, it was so discreet and unexceptionable, and such an evidence of that wisdom and sincerity which make the face to shine. 3. They had nothing to object, and durst ask Him nothing else, lest He should shame and expose them.

V. 27—33. This we had before, only the description of the future state is somewhat more full here. Observe,

I. In every age, men of corrupt minds unavailingly endeavored to subvert the fundamental principles of revealed religion. As there are deists now, who call themselves free-thinkers, but are really false-thinkers; so there were Sadducees in our Savior's time, who bantered the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, though plainly revealed in the Old Testament, and articles also of Jewish faith. The Sadducees deny that there is any resurrection, any future state; so the original may signify; not only no return of the body to life, but no continuance of the soul in life; no world of spirits, no state of recompense and retribution for what was done in the body. Take away this, and all religion falls.

II. Commonly those that design to undermine any truth of God, perplex it, and load it with difficulties. So here those Sadducees, when they would weaken people's faith in the doctrine of the resurrection, put a question on supposition of it, which they thought could not be answered either way to satisfaction. The case might be matter of fact, of a woman that had seven husbands. Now in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be? It was not at all material, whose she was, for when death ends that relation, it is not to be resumed.

III. There is a great difference between the state of the children of men on earth and the children of God in heaven; between this world and that world; and we wrong ourselves, and the truth of Christ, when we form notions of that world of spirits by present enjoyments in this world of sense.

1. The children of men in this world marry and are given in marriage. Much of our business in this world is, to raise up and provide for families. Much of our pleasure is in our relations, our wives, and our children; nature inclines to it. Marriage is instituted for our comfort in this bodily state. It is likewise a remedy against fornication. The children of this world are dying, therefore they marry, and give their children in marriage, to furnish the world of mankind with recruits, that they may have offspring to leave the fruit of their labors to; especially that the chosen of God in future ages may be introduced, for a godly seed is sought by marriage, (Mal. 2: 15.) a seed to serve the Lord, a generation to Him.

2. The world to come is called that world, by way of emphasis. Note, There are more worlds than one; a present visible, and a future invisible world; and it is the concern of every one of

Campbell. To be angel-like, and to be equal to angels, are certainly very different things. God is not the God of the dead. That is, them who are to abide in a state of death, and never to enjoy the resurrection of the just.' He will not be called their God, as not having prepared for them a heavenly city. (Heb. 11: 16.) Hence both the Scripture say of them, that 'they are passed from death unto life;' (John 5: 24.) because Christ 'will raise them up at the last day.' (John 6: 40.) God here styles Himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; that is, not of their souls only, but of their persons; in which sense the Jews always understood these words. He would be the God of the dead, though their souls lived, unless their bodies also rose again. Wholly. God is not the God of the dead; but He is 'the God of Abraham,' &c. therefore Abraham now lives, as to his soul, and shall awake, as to the body, at the resurrection, like one out of sleep; for, if 'God be not the God of the dead,' all who have Him for their God, 'live by Him.' Their souls now live, their bodies shall at length arise, and 'death be swallowed up in victory.' (Rom. 8: 10, 11. 1 Cor. 15: 50—54.) (38.) Live unto Him. 'Live by Him,' or, 'in Him,' &c. with Him.' All who have the Lord for their God, 'live by Him.' 'Because I live, ye shall live also.' 'Ye are dead; and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory.' (John 14: 18—20. Col. 3: 1—4, v. 4.) Believers as one with Christ, 'shall die.' (John 11: 26—27.) 'They sleep in Jesus, and God will bring them with Him.' (1 Thes. 4: 13—18.) 'For whether we live, we live unto the Lord, and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, we die, we are the Lord's.' (Rom. 14: 8.)

(35.) 'Agreeably to the Jewish style of that period, our Lord calls that only the resurrection, which is a resurrection to glory.'

CAMPBELL.

16 Neither² can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels: and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.

37 Now that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord, the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.

38 For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living: for all live unto him.

39 Then certain of the Scribes answering said, Master, thou hast well said.

40 And after that, they durst not ask him any question at all.

41 ¶ And he said unto them, How say they that Christ is David's Son?

42 And David himself saith in the book of Psalms, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, 43 Till I make thine enemies thy footstool.

44 David therefore calleth him Lord, how is he then his Son?

45 ¶ Then in the audience of all the people, he said unto his disciples,

46 Beware of the Scribes, which desire to walk in long robes, and love greetings in the markets, and the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts; us to compare this world, and that world, and give the preference in our thoughts and cares to that which deserves them. Observe,

47 Which devour widows' houses, and for a shew make long prayers: the same shall receive greater damnation.

(1.) Who shall be the inhabitants of that world; they that shall be accounted worthy to obtain it, i. e. that are interested in Christ's merit, who purchased it for us, and have a holy meanness for it wrought in them by the Spirit, who prepares us for it. They have not a legal worthiness, on account of any thing in them or done by them, but an evangelical worthiness, on account of the inestimable price Christ paid for the redemption of the purchased possession. It is a worthiness imputed, by which we are glorified, as well as a righteousness imputed, by which we are justified; they are made agreeable to that world. The disagreeableness in corrupt nature is taken away, and the dispositions of the soul are, by the grace of God, conformed to that state. They are by grace made and counted worthy to obtain that world; it intimates some difficulty in reaching after it, and danger of coming short. They shall obtain the resurrection from the dead, that is, the blessed resurrection; for that of condemnation, (as Christ calls it, John 5: 29.) is rather a resurrection to a second, an eternal death.

(2.) The happy state of the inhabitants of that world, we cannot express or conceive, 1 Cor. 2: 9. Christ saith of it,

(1.) They neither marry, nor are given in marriage. Entered into the joy of their Lord, they are entirely taken up with that, and need not the joy of the bridegroom in his bride. The love in that world of love is all seraphic, eclipsing and losing the purest and most pleasing loves of this world of sense. Where the body itself shall be spiritual, the delights of sense vanish; and where there is perfect holiness, there is no occasion for marriage as a preservative from sin; into that new Jerusalem nothing enters that defiles.

(2.) They cannot die any more; therefore they do not marry. Where there are no burials, there is no need of weddings. This crowns the comfort of that world, that there is no more death there, which sullies all the beauty, and damps all the comforts, of this world.

(3.) They are equal unto the angels. In the other evangelists it was said, They are as the angels—here they are said to be angels' peers; in glory and bliss no way inferior to the holy angels. They shall see the same sight, be employed in the same work, and share in the same joys, with the holy angels. Saints, when they come to heaven, shall be naturalized, and though by nature strangers, yet having obtained this freedom with a great sum, which Christ paid for them, they have in all respects equal privileges with them that were free-born, the angels that are natives.

(4.) They are the children of God, and so are as the angels, who are called the sons of God. In the inheritance of sons, the adoption of sons will be completed. Hence believers are said to wait for the adoption, even the redemption of the body, Rom. 8: 23. Now are we the sons of God, 1 John 3: 2. We have the nature and disposition of sons, to be perfected in heaven.

(5.) They are the children of the resurrection, that is, are made capable of the employments and enjoyments of the future state; born to that world, belong to that family, were educated for it here, and shall there have their inheritance in it. They are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. These only God owns for his children.

IV. That there is another life after this, is an undoubted truth, of which were eminent discoveries made in the early ages of the church, v. 37, 38. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were then dead many years before, and their bodies turned to dust in the cave of Machpelah; how then could God say, not I was, but I am, the God of Abraham? It is absurd that the living God and Fountain of life should continue related to them as their God, if there were no more of them in being than what lay in that cave, undistinguished from common dust; we must therefore conclude that they were then in being in another world, for God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Luke here adds, For all live unto Him, that is, all who, like them, are true believers; though dead, yet they do live; their souls which return to God that gave them, (Eccl. 12: 7.) live to Him as the Father of spirits; and their bodies shall live again at the end of time by the power of God; for He calleth things that are not as though they were, because He is the God that quickens the dead, Rom. 4: 17. And there is more in it; when God called Himself the God of these patriarchs, He meant that He was their Felicity and Portion, a God all-sufficient to them, (Gen. 17: 1.) their exceeding great Reward, (Gen. 15: 1.) Now it is plain, He never, in this world, answered the true intent and full extent of that great undertaking, therefore there must be another life after this, in which He will fully discharge that promise, that He would be to them a God; which He is able to do, for all live to Him, and He has wherewithal to make every soul happy that lives to Him; enough for all, enough for each.

(36.) Equal, &c.] 'This is a stronger word than Matthew or Mark uses; yet all arguments drawn hence, as proving an entire equality of glorified saints with angels, in all respects, must be weak and inconclusive. It is indeed the glorious scheme of redeeming love to incorporate angels and saints into one happy society, under Christ as their common head: (Eph. 1: 10.) but there are subordinations in united societies. And if the fall of the apostate spirits occasioned any thing like a vacancy in the celestial hierarchy, it would seem most probable it might be filled up from heavenly spirits of an inferior order, who might be preferred to the rank their degenerate brethren lost, as a reward for their approved fidelity to God. But it becomes us to be exceedingly modest in our conjectures on such subjects as these, lest we incur the censure of intruding into things which we have not seen. Col. 2: 18.' DODDRIDGE.

CHAP. XXI.

And he preferred the widow's two mites to the large offerings of the rich, 1-4. He foretells the destruction of the temple, 5, 6; the signs and calamities which would precede and accompany it, giving suitable exhortations and promises, 7-19; and the destruction and continued desolations of Jerusalem, 20-24. The signs of his coming, 25-33. He exhorts to watchfulness and prayer, 34-35. He daily preaches at the temple; and retires at night to the mount of Olives, 37, 38.

AND he looked up, and saw the rich men casting their gifts into the treasury

2 And he saw also a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites.

3 And he said, Of a truth I say unto you, that this poor widow hath cast in more than they all:

4 For all these have of their abundance cast in unto the offerings of God; but she of her penury hath cast in all the living that she had.

5 And as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned and his Gospel: some attend Him here, and four things we have in these verses concerning them, which we had before.

I. They commend Christ's reply to the Sadducees; v. 39. Christ had the testimony of his adversaries, that He said well; and the scribes were his enemies, because He would not conform to the traditions of the elders; yet when He vindicated the fundamental practices of religion, even the scribes owned He said well.

II. They are struck with an awe of Christ, his wisdom and authority, v. 40. They saw He was too hard for all that contended with Him. But his own disciples, though weak, yet being willing to receive his doctrine, durst ask Him any question.

III. They are puzzled with a question concerning the Messiah, v. 41. Many Scriptures said Christ was to be the Son of David; even the blind man knew that, (ch. 18: 39,) and yet David called the Messiah his Lord, (ch. 42, 44.) his Owner, Ruler, and Benefactor: The Lord said to my Lord. God said it to the Messiah, Ps. 110: 1. Now if He be his Son, why doth he call Him his Lord? If He be his Lord, why do we call Him his Son? They could not reconcile this seeming contradiction; thanks be to God, we can; that Christ, as God, was David's Lord, but Christ, as Man, was David's Son. He was both the Root and the Offspring of David, Rev. 22: 16. By his human nature He was the Offspring of David, a Branch of his family; by his divine nature, the Root of David, from whom he had being, and all the supplies of grace.

IV. They are described in their black characters, and a public caution against them given to the disciples, v. 45-47. So Mark 12: 38, and more largely, Matt. 23. Christ bid his disciples beware of the scribes, that is, 1. 'Take heed of being drawn into sin by them; beware of their way, and of such a spirit as they are governed by. Be not you such in the Christian church, as they are in the Jewish church.' 2. 'Take heed of being brought into trouble by them,' as Matt. 10: 17. 'Beware of men, for they will deliver you up to the councils; beware. Beware of them, for.'

of the scribes, for they do so.

(1.) 'They are proud and haughty; they desire to walk the streets in long robes, as those that are above business, (for men of business went with their loins girt up,) and that take state, and place.' Let arms yield to the gown. They loved to have obeisance made them in the markets, that many might see what respect was paid them; and were very proud of the precedence given them in all places of concourse. They loved the highest seats in the synagogues, and the chief rooms at feasts, and, when placed in them, looked on themselves with great conceit, and on all about them with great contempt.

(2.) 'They are covetous and oppressive, making religion a cloak for it.' They devour widows' houses, get their estates into their hands, and then by some trick make them their own; or, live on them, and eat up what they have. And widows are their easy prey, because apt to be deluded by their specious pretences; for a show they make long prayers, perhaps with the widows when in sorrow, as if they had not only a pious but a pious concern for them, and thus endeavor to ingratiate themselves with them, and get their money and effects into their hands. Trust such devout men with unfold gold; they will give such an account of it as they think fit.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19-47. Christ, we see, argues a very important point of doctrine from premises in which, perhaps, we might not have been able to discover it without such a hint. Let us learn to judge by Scripture arguments not merely by the sound, but by the sense of the words. And as our Lord chose a passage from the Pentateuch, rather than from the prophets, for the conviction of the Sadducees, let us be engaged to study the tempers and even the prejudices of those with whom we converse; that we may, if possible, let in the light of divine truth on their hearts, on that side by which they seem most capable of receiving it.

When ministers succeed in bringing the Word of God home to the consciences of obstinate transgressors, they will surely be exasperated; and in return watch their opportunity, and assume every disguise, to fasten some charge on the character of the ministers, or to expose them to the displeasure of the ruler. But 'the wisdom from above' will direct faithful ministers to Christ reads them their doom in a few words. These shall receive a more abundant judgment, a double damnation, for abuse both of the poor widows, whose houses they devoured, and of religion, and particularly of prayer, as a pretence for more plausibly and effectually carrying on their wicked projects; for dissimulation piety is double iniquity.

CHAP. XXI. v. 1-4. This we had in Mark It is recorded twice, to teach,

1. That charity to the poor is a main matter in religion; our Lord took all occasions to commend, and recommend it. He had just mentioned the barbarity of the scribes, who devoured poor widows, (ch. 20.) and perhaps this is designed as an aggravation of it, that the poor widows were the best benefactors to the public funds, which the scribes had the disposal of.

2. That Christ has his eye on us, to observe what we contribute to works of piety and charity; whether in proportion to our means, or parsimoniously. This should make us afraid of coming short of duty in this matter; (men may be deceived with excuses which Christ knows to be frivolous;) and should encourage us to be abundant in it, without desiring that men should know it; it is enough that Christ does; He sees in secret, and will reward openly.

3. That Christ observes and accepts the charity of the poor in particular. Those that have nothing to give, may yet do a great deal in charity, by ministering to the poor, and helping them, and begging for them, that cannot help themselves, or beg for themselves. Christ does not blame this widow for indiscretion, in giving what she wanted herself, nor for vanity in giving among the rich; but commends her liberality, and willingness to part with what little she had for the glory of God; proceeding from a belief of, and dependence on, God's providence to take care of her.

4. That we ought to respect, and according to, yea, beyond our power, contribute cheerfully to whatever may be called the offerings of God. What is given to the support of the Gospel, and to the spread of religion, the education of youth, the release of prisoners, the relief of widows and strangers, and the maintenance of poor families, is given to the offerings of God, and shall be so accepted and recompensed.

V. 15-19. I. Even Christ's disciples spake with admiration of the external pomp and magnificence of the temple, v. 5. When we speak of the temple, it should be of the presence of God in it, and of the ordinances of God administered in it, and the communion his people there have with Him. It is a poor thing, when we speak of the church, to dwell on its pomps and revenues, and the dignities and powers of its officers and rulers; for the king's daughter is all glorious within.

II. Christ spake with contempt of them, and with assurance of their being all desolated very shortly; v. 6. 'This building shall yet be utterly ruined; and that as soon as the spiritual temple of the gospel-church (the substance of that shadow) begins to flourish.' Did we by faith foresee the withering of all external glory, we should not set our hearts on it, as those that cannot or will not see so far before them.

III. Those about Him inquire with curiosity concerning the time of this great desolation; v. 7. It is natural to covet to know future things and their time, which it is not for us to know; when we are more concerned to ask what is our duty in the prospect of these things, and how to prepare for them. They ask not for a present sign, to confirm the prediction itself, (Christ's word was enough for that,) but the future signs of the near accomplishment of the prediction, by which they may be put in mind of it. These signs of the times Christ had taught them to observe.

IV. With what clearness and fulness Christ answers their inquiries, as far as was necessary to direct them in duty; for all knowledge is desirable for practice.

1. They must expect to hear of false Christs, false prophets, and false prophecies: (v. 8.) Many shall come in my name; he does not mean in the name of Jesus, though some deceivers pretended commissions from Him, (as Acts 19:13,) but usurping the title and character of the Messiah. Many pretended to be the deliverers of the Jewish church and nation from the Romans, and to fix the time when the deliverance should be wrought, by which multitudes were insnared, to their ruin. They shall say, that I am He, or, I am, as if they would assume that incommunicable name of God, by which He made Himself known, when He came to deliver Israel out of Egypt; and to encourage people to follow them, they added, 'The time draws near, when the kingdom shall be restored to Israel, and if they will follow Him, they shall share in it.'

As to this, He gives them a needful caution; (1.) Take heed that ye be not deceived; do not imagine I shall Myself come again in external glory, to take possession of the throne of kingdoms. Expect no such thing, for my kingdom is not of this world. When they asked solicitously and eagerly, Master, when shall these things be? the first word Christ said, was, Take heed that ye be not deceived. Note, Those that are most inquisitive in the things of God, (though it is very good to be so,) are in most danger of being imposed upon, and have most need to be on their guard. (2.) Go ye not after them. If we are sure that Jesus is the Christ, and his doctrine the Gospel of God, we must be deaf to all intimations of another Christ and another gospel.

2. They must expect to hear of great commotions in the nations, and many terrible judgments inflicted on the Jews and their neighbors. (1.) There shall be bloody wars: (v. 10.) Nation shall rise against nation; one part of the Jewish nation against another, or rather the whole against the Romans. When they had rejected the liberty with which Christ would have made them free, they were left to themselves, to grasp at their civil liberty in ways that were sinful, and therefore could not be successful. (2.) There shall be earthquakes, which shall destroy towns and houses, and bury many in their ruins. (3.) There shall be famines and pestilences, the common effects of war, which destroy the fruits of the earth, and, by exposing men to ill weather and ill diet, occasion infectious diseases. God has various ways of punishing a provoking people. Though spiritual judgments are more commonly inflicted in gospel-times, yet God makes use of temporal judgments also. (4.) There shall be fearful sights, and great signs from heaven, uncommon appearances in the clouds, comets, and blazing stars, which frighten ordinary beholders, and have always been looked upon as portending something bad.

'As to the fearful sights,' He says, 'let them not be fearful to you, who look above the visible heavens, to the throne of God's government in the highest heavens. Be not dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them, Jer. 10:2. And as to famines and pestilences, you are in the hands of God, who has promised those who are his, that in the days of famine they shall be satisfied, and that He will keep them from the noisome pestilence; trust in Him and be not afraid. Nay, when you hear of wars, when without are fightings, and within are fears, yet then be not terrified; you know the worst these judgments can do you, therefore be not afraid of them; for, [1.] These things must first come to pass, there is no remedy, it will be your wisdom to make yourselves easy by accommodating yourselves to them.' [2.] 'There is worse behind; fancy not you will soon see an end of these troubles, no, the end is not by and by, not suddenly. Be not terrified, for if you begin so quickly to be discouraged, how will you bear up under what is yet before you?'

3. They must expect to be themselves so signs and wonders in Israel; their persecution prognosticates the destruction of the city and temple. Nay, this should be the first sign of ruin; 'Before all these, they shall lay their hands on you. But this must be considered not only as the suffering of the persecuted, but as the sin of the persecutors. Before God's judgments are upon them, they shall fill up the measure of their iniquity by laying their hands on you.' Note, The ruin of a people is always introduced by their sin; and nothing introduces a surer and sorer ruin than the sin of persecution. This is a sign that God's wrath is coming on a people to the uttermost, when their wrath against the servants of God comes to the uttermost.

Now as to this,

(1.) Christ tells them what hard things they should suffer for his name's sake, such as when He first called them to follow Him, Matt. 10. They should know the wages, that they might sit down and count the costs. Paul, the greatest laborer and sufferer of them all, not being now among them, was told by himself what great things he should suffer for Christ's name's sake. (Acts 9:16.) so necessary is it that all who will live godly in Christ Jesus, should count on persecution. The Christians having been originally Jews, and still retaining an equal veneration for the Old Testament, and all the essentials of their religion, and differing only in ceremony, might expect fair quarter with them; but Christ bids them not expect it; 'No, they shall be the most forward to persecute you.' [1.] 'They shall use their own church-power against you; they shall deliver you up to the synagogues to be scourged there, and stigmatized with their anathemas.' [2.] 'They shall incense the magistrates against you; shall deliver you into prisons, to be brought before kings and rulers for my name's sake, and be punished by them.' [3.] 'Your own relations and friends will betray you, (v. 16.) so that Gifts.] Several writers have mentioned various oblations of massy gold, which were affixed to the walls and pillars, besides the immense riches contained in the treasuries.

Verses 7-11.

(Marg. Ref.—Matt. 24: 3-8. Mark 13: 1-8.) (8.) The time, &c.] The time, when the deceivers would come. (11.) Fearful.] Josephus gives a very particular account of many terrible appearances in the heavens: as a comet, like a flaming sword, waving over Jerusalem, and the appearance of contending armies in the air. 'The great gate of the temple, which twenty men could scarcely shut, and which was made fast; with bolts and bars, was seen to open of its own accord, to let in their enemies: for so, saith he, our wise men construed this omen. At the feast of Pentecost, when the priests went at midnight into the temple to attend their service, they first heard a kind of noise, as of a movement from the place and then a voice, saying, Let 'us go hence,' &c. &c. These and many other extraordinary events excited great consternation among the Jews, and were intimations of their approaching miseries.

Verses 12-19.

(Notes, Matt. 24: 9-14. Mark 13: 9-13.) (13.) Turn to you, &c.] 'The persecutions which you endure, being thus exactly foretold, shall still more fully confirm and establish your faith in Me.' (15.) In the text referred to it is declared, that it belonged to JERUSALEM alone, to make, or open, man's month, or to give wisdom; and the constant language of Scripture is, 'as the Spirit gave him utterance;' being 'filled with the Holy Ghost, he said,' &c. Yet Jesus, during his lowest humiliation on earth, promised expressly to give his disciples 'a mouth and wisdom.' Though seldom addressed, such texts are of immense importance in settling the doctrine of our Lord's Deity and of the Trinity shal. see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh.

21 Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it depart out: and let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto.

22 For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled.

23 But woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days! for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people.

24 And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times lose a hair! It is a proverbial expression, frequent both in the Old and New-Testament, denoting the greatest indemnity and security. Some think it refers to the preservation of the lives of all the Christians that were among the Jews, when they were cut off by the Romans; historians tell us that not one Christian perished in that desolation. Others reconcile it with the deaths of multitudes in the cause of Christ, and take it figuratively in the same sense that Christ saith, He that loseth his life for my sake, shall find it. 'Not a hair of your head shall perish, but, 1st. 'I shall take cognizance of it.' To this end He had said, (Matt. 10: 30.) The hairs of your head are all numbered; and an account is kept of them, so that none of them shall perish but He will miss it. 2dly. 'It shall be upon a valuable consideration.' We do not reckon that lost or perishing, which is laid out for good purposes, and will turn to a good account. If we drop the body itself for Christ's name's sake, it does not perish, but is well bestowed. 3dly. 'It shall be abundantly recompensed; when you come to balance profit and loss, you will find great gain in present comforts, especially in the joys of a life eternal.' So that though we may be losers for Christ, we shall not, cannot, be losers by Him in the end.

[4.] 'It is therefore your duty and interest, in the midst of your own sufferings and those of the nation, to maintain a holy sincerity and serenity of mind, which will keep you always easy; (p. 19.) In your patience possess ye your souls; get and keep possession of your souls.' Some read it as a promise, 'you may or shall possess your souls.' It comes all to one. Note, 1st. It is our duty and interest at all times, especially in perilous, trying times, to secure the possession of our own souls; not only that they be not destroyed and lost forever, but that they be not distempered now, nor our possession of them disturbed and interrupted. 'Possess your souls, be your own men, keep up the authority and dominion of reason, and keep under the tumults of passion, that neither grief nor fear may tyrannize over you, or turn you out of the possession and enjoyment of yourselves.' In difficult times, when we can keep possession of nothing else, let us make that sure which will be made sure, and keep possession of our souls. 2dly. It is by patience, Christian patience, that we keep possession of our own souls. 'In suffering times, set patience on guard to preserve your souls; by it keep your souls composed and in a good frame, and keep out all those impressions which would ruffle you, and put you out of temper.'

V. 20—23. Having given them an idea of the times for about thirty-eight years next ensuing, He here shows them the issue, namely, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the utter dispersion of the Jewish nation; which would be a little day of judgment; a type and figure of Christ's second coming, not so fully spoken of here as in Matt. 24: yet glanced at; for the destruction of Jerusalem would be, as it were, the destruction of the world to those whose hearts were bound up in it.

I. He tells them that they should see Jerusalem besieged, compassed with armies, (v. 20.) the Roman armies; and then they might conclude its desolation was nigh, for thus the siege, though long, would infallibly end. Note, As for mercy, so in judgment, when God begins, He will make an end.

II. He warns them, upon this signal given, to shift for their own safety; (v. 21.) 'Then let them which are in Judea, quit the country and flee to the mountains; let them which are in the midst of Jerusalem, depart out, before the city be closely shut up, "before the trenches be opened," as we say now; and let not them that are in the countries and villages about, enter into the city, thinking to be safe there. Abandon a city and country you see God has abandoned. Come out of her, my people.'

III. He foretells the terrible havoc that should be made of the Jewish nation; (v. 22.) Those are the days of vengeance so often spoken of in the Old-Testament, which would complete the ruin of that provoking people; all these predictions must now be fulfilled, and the blood of the Old-Testament martyrs now be required. All things that are written, must be fulfilled at length. After days of patience long abused, there will come days of vengeance: reprieves are not pardons. The greatness of that destruction is set forth, 1. By the inflicting cause of it, it is the wrath of God on this people. 2. By the particular terror it would be to women with child, and mothers that are nurses. Woe to them, not only because they are most subject to frights, and least able to shift for their own safety, but because it will be a very great torment to them, to think of having borne and nursed children for the murderers. 3. By the general confusion throughout the nation. There shall be great distress in the land; men will not know what course to take, nor how to help themselves.

IV. He describes the issue of the struggles between the Jews and the Romans; in short, 1. Multitudes shall fall by the sword. It is computed that in those wars of the Jews there fell by the sword above eleven hundred thousand. And the siege of Jerusalem was, in effect, a military execution. 2. The rest shall be led away captive, not into one nation, as when conquered by the Chaldeans, which gave them an opportunity of keeping together, but into all nations, 23: 9. Jer. 30: 10, 11.) This unparalleled event was doubtless intended, among other reasons, that they might be undeniable witnesses, or monuments, of the truth of the Scriptures; of that part which they reject, as well as of that which they retain. Jerusalem has ever since been 'tradition under foot,' or governed with despotic sway, by the Gentiles; by the Romans, Saracens, Mamelukes, Franks, and Turks who possess it to this day. The Roman victors forbade any Jew to dwell in their ancient inheritance, or to come within sight of Jerusalem; the foundations of the old city were ploughed up; a new city was at length builded by the conquerors, called Elia, and an idolatrous temple erected where the temple of Jehovan had stood. In the days of Constantine and afterwards, the city was indeed possessed by Christians among others; but they were chiefly the Gentile converts, and the Jews were driven thence with great severity. Julian, [as was hinted before] attempted to rebuild the temple, and to induce the Jews to settle there again, in avowed contempt and defiance of this prophecy; but his impious attempt was repeatedly frustrated, by the eruption of balls of fire from the earth, which destroyed his workmen. Great pains were taken some ages after, and many bloody wars, called 'the Crusades,' were waged, in order to rescue this 'holy city' from the hands of the infidels, [who had built a mosque on the very site of the temple], and to establish there a Christian empire, but the success was very imperfect and short-lived; and, in general, Mohammedans (who are Gentiles, neither Jews nor Christians,) have had possession of it; the few Christians, who reside there, have little more of their religion, than the name, and are most grievously oppressed by the Turks; and the Jews have generally been driven from their ancient city, though many may now be found there. 'The times of the Gentiles' seem to signify the times during which the Gentiles are permitted to keep possession of Jerusalem, namely, till the Jews be converted to Christ; then their 'times will be fulfilled'; probably the Jews will be restored to their own land, and vengeance will be taken on those who oppose their return; (Ez. 34: 23—31. 36: 25—28. 37: 25—28. 38: 39. Dan. 11: 40—45. Am. 9: 13—15. Zech. 14:) for these events seem to be predicted, as introductory to the calling of the nations into the church.

(Rom. 11: 15—32, v. 15—25.) Or, the times appointed for the calling of the Gentiles, or all nations, into the church may be meant. When this is arrived, or just at hand, the Jews will recover their holy city. This prediction, however, has already been so remarkably accomplished, that it may be said fully to demonstrate the truth of the Christian religion. No human or created sagacity could have foreseen or conjectured such remote events. It must have previously been supposed, that if the Jews were dispersed among all nations, they would be incorporated among them; and their preservation as a distinct people, in the midst of their several conquerors and oppressors, is an event which has no parallel in the annals of the world, an event that could never have been expected or thought of, if prophecy had not excited that expectation; an event which is a sure pledge of the accomplishment of all the other prophecies concerning this extraordinary people, as well as a preparation for it. (Hos. 3: 4, 5.) The three evangelists who recorded these predictions were dead, before Jerusalem was destroyed. But the fulfillment of the prophecy to this present day conveys the most unanswerable proof of its divine original; and if men were as impartial and unprejudiced in their religious inquiries, as they are in mathematical reasonings, no one, who well considered this prediction, and examined its accomplishment, could any more doubt of the truth of the Gospel, than learned men do of the theorems in Euclid.

SCOTT. (24.) Until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. 'That is, even until the end of human things, when the nations shall no longer exist.' Rosenau. I prefer, however, the interpretation of Kuinoel, until the time when they, the nations, shall suffer the punishment of their impiety.

It seems reasonable to suppose that here, as in most other places, the Gentiles are opposed to the Jews; and consequently, that all the period between the destruction of Jerusalem and the restoration of the Jews to their own land, so expressly foretold in Scripture, is here intended. (See Is. 27: 12, 13. Ezek. 11: 17. 20: 40, 42. 34: 13. 36: 24, 25. 37: 21—28. 39: 28, 29. Hos. 3: 5. Amos 9: 14, 15. and Zech. 14: 11.) With this indeed is connected the bringing in the future of it of the Gentiles be fulfilled.

25 ¶ And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring;

26 Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth; for the powers of heaven shall be shaken.

27 And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory.

28 And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh.

29 ¶ And he spake to them a parable: Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees;

30 When they now shoot forth, ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand.

31 So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.

32 Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled.

33 Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away.

34 ¶ And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares.

35 For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth.

36 Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.

37 ¶ And in the day-time he was teaching in the temple; and at night he went out, and abode in the mount that is called the mount of Olives.

ways, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man.

37 ¶ And in the day-time he was teaching in the temple; and at night he went out, and abode in the mount that is called the mount of Olives.

38 And all the people came early in the morning to him in the Messiah; they that would not see Him coming in the power of his grace to save, shall see Him coming in the power of his wrath to destroy them; those that would not have Him to reign, shall have Him to triumph over them. 2. An earnest of his second coming. Then, the terrors of that day, they shall see the Son of man coming in a cloud, and all the terrors of the last day. They shall see a specimen, a faint resemblance of it.

VII. He encourages all the faithful disciples in reference to the terrors of that day, v. 25. 'When Jerusalem is besieged, and every thing is concerning to the destruction of the Jews, then do you look up, when others are looking down, look heavenward, in faith, hope, and prayer, and lift up your heads with cheerfulness and confidence, for your redemption draws nigh.' 1. When Christ came to destroy the Jews, He came to redeem the Christians, persecuted and oppressed by them; then had the churches rest. 2. When He comes to judge the world at the last day, He will redeem all that are his from all their grievances. And the foresight of that day is as pleasant to all good Christians, as it is terrible to the wicked and ungodly. Their death itself is so; when they see that day approaching, they can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh, their removal to their Redeemer.

VIII. Here is one word of prediction, (v. 24.) that looks further than the destruction of the Jewish nation, which is not easily understood; Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. 1. Some understand it of what is past; so Hammond. The Gentiles, who have conquered Jerusalem, shall keep possession of it, and shall be purely Gentile, till the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, till a great part of the Gentile world is become Christian; and then, after Jerusalem is rebuilt by Adrian the emperor, with an exclusion of all the Jews from it, many of the Jews shall turn Christians, shall join with the Gentile Christians, to set up a church in Jerusalem, which shall flourish there for a long time. 2. Others understand it of what is yet to come; so Whitby. Jerusalem shall be possessed by the Gentiles, of one sort or other, for the most part, till the time comes when the nations that yet remain infidels shall embrace the Christian faith, when the kingdoms of this world shall become Christ's kingdoms, and then all the Jews shall be converted. Jerusalem shall be inhabited by them, and neither they nor their city any longer trodden down by the Gentiles.

V. 29-33. I. Christ appoints his disciples to observe the signs of the times, which they might judge by, if they had an eye to the foregoing directions, with as much certainty as they

The sea, &c.) 'The prophets paint the heavens, earth, and sea, in dreadful commotion, and the nations in immediate expectation of a final dissolution, when they wish to describe any uncommon change that is impending. See Is. 13. Le Clerc. Here then the roaring of the waves is meant, (as earthquakes sometimes are,) to paint images of dire calamity; as is frequent in the Hebrew poets. Kuhnke observes, that there seems depicted a sort of congeries of evils, by which the inhabitants should be swept away as if by a rush of waters. The phrase, (says Dr. Owen.) symbolically represents a collection or multitude of people in commotion; and frequent commotions there were in Judea, before the destruction of Jerusalem.' Bloomfield

Gentiles, Rom. 11:25, 26. But unless it could be proved, (which I do not recollect) that the inhabitants of Palestine shall then peaceably surrender it to the returning Jews, it seems most natural to suppose the time of the Gentiles here signifies the time when they shall be visited and punished; which is the sense in which this very phrase, and others nearly parallel to it, frequently occur in the Old Testament, as Brennius justly observes. Compare Ezek. 30:3, as also Jer. 27:7, 60:27. Ezek. 21:25, 29. 22:3, 4. And if this be the sense of it, it seems an intimation that the Turks, or some other anti-Christian power, may continue possessed of the holy land till the restoration of the Jews; for one can hardly suppose their way into it should then be opened by the conquest of a Christian nation. CHAP. XXII.

The priests and scribes determine to put Jesus to death. 1, 2. Judas bargains to betray Him, 3-6. Two apostles prepare the passover, and Jesus eats it with the twelve, 7-18. He institutes the Lord's supper, 19, 20; points out the traitor, 21-23; checks the ambition of the disciples, and promises them an honorable station in his kingdom, 24-30. He shows Peter that Satan desired to sift him and his brethren; but that his faith should not fail, though he would thrice deny Him, 31-34; and instructs his disciples about their approaching danger, 35-38. He agony and prayer in the garden, and his warnings to the apostles, 39-46. He is betrayed and apprehended, 47-49; holds him whose ear Peter cut off, 50-53; and is led to the high priest, 54. Peter thrice denies Him, 55-62. Jesus is mocked, insulted, and condemned, 63-71.

NOW ^{the} feast of Unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the Passover.

2 And ^{the} chief priests and scribes sought how they might kill him; for they feared the people.

3 Then entered Satan into Judas, surnamed Iscariot, being of the number of the twelve.

watch against, lest our hearts be overcharged with them. (1.) The indulging the appetites of the body, and allowing ourselves in the gratifications of sense to excess; Take heed lest you be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, the immoderate use of meat and drink, which burden the heart not only with the guilt thereby contracted, but by the ill influence such disorders of the body have on the mind; they make men dull and lifeless to duty; they stupefy the conscience, and make the mind unaffected with things most affecting. (2.) The inordinate pursuit of the good things of this world. The heart is overcharged with the cares of this life. The former is the snare of persons given to pleasures: this of men of business, that will be rich. We have need to guard on both hands, not only lest, at the time when death comes, but lest at any time, our hearts should be thus overcharged. Our caution against sin, and care of our souls, must be constant.

IV. He counsels them to prepare for this great day, v. 36. See, 1. What should be our aim—that we may be accounted worthy to escape all those things—that, when the judgments of God are abroad, either we may not be involved in the common calamity, or it may not be to us, what it is to others; that in the day of death we may escape the sting of it, which is the wrath of God, and the Cancellation of hell. Yet we must aim not only to escape that, but to stand before the Son of man; not only to stand acquitted before Him as our Judge, (Ps. 1:5.) to have boldness in the day of Christ, (that is supposed in our escaping all those things,) but to attend on Him as our Master, to stand continually before his throne, and serve Him day and night in his temple, (Rev. 7:15,) always to behold his face, as the angels, Matt. 18:10. The saints are here said to be accounted worthy, as before, ch. 20:35. God, by the good work of his grace in could judge of the approach of summer by the budding forth of the trees, v. 29-31. As in the kingdom of nature, so in the kingdom of providence, there is a consequence of one event on another. When we see a nation filling up the measure of their iniquity, we may conclude that their ruin is nigh: when we see the ruin of persecuting powers hastening on, we may thence infer that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand.

II. He charges them to look upon those things as neither doubtful nor distant, (for then they would not make a due impression,) but as sure and very near. The destruction of the Jewish nation, 1. Was near; v. 32. There were some now alive, that should see it; some that now heard it predicted. 2. It was sure, the sentence was irreversible, v. 33.

III. He cautions them against security and sensuality, by which they would unfit themselves for the trying times coming on, and make them to be a great surprise and terror to them; (v. 34, 35.) Take heed to yourselves. This is the command to all Christ's disciples, 'Take heed that you be not overpowered by temptations, nor betrayed by your own corruptions.' Note, We cannot be safe, if we be secure. It concerns us at all times, but especially at some times, to be very cautious. See here, 1. Our danger—that the day of death and judgment should come on us unawares, when we are not prepared for it; lest, when we are called to meet our Lord, that he found furthest from our thoughts, which ought always to be nearest our hearts, lest it come on us as a snare; for so it will come on most men, who dwell on the earth, and mind earthly things only, and have no converse with heaven; to them it will be as a snare; see Eccl. 9:12. It will be a terror and a destruction to them: it will put them into an inexpressible fright, and hold them fast for a doom yet more frightful. 2. Our duty, in consideration of this danger; we must take heed lest our hearts be overcharged, lest they be overloaded, and so unfitted and disabled to prepare for death and judgment. Two things we must them, makes them meet for this happiness, and by the good will of his grace toward them, accounts them worthy of it: but, as Grotius here saith, a great part of our unworthiness lies in an acknowledgment of our unworthiness. 2. What should be our actings in these aims; Watch therefore, and pray always. Watching and praying must go together, Neh. 4:9. Those that would escape the wrath, and make sure of the joys to come, must watch and pray, always, must make it the constant business of their lives, (1.) To keep a guard on themselves; 'Watch against sin, watch to every duty, and to the improvement of every opportunity of doing good. Keep awake, in expectation of your Lord's coming, that you may be in a right frame to receive Him, and bid Him welcome.' (2.) To keep up their communion with God; 'Pray always; be always in an habitual disposition to that duty; keep up stated times for it, abound in it; pray on all occasions.' Those shall be accounted worthy to live a life of praise in the other world, that live a life of prayer in this.

In the last two verses we have an account how Christ disposed of Himself, during those three or four days, betwixt his riding in triumph into Jerusalem, and the night in which He was betrayed.

[1.] He was all day teaching in the temple. Christ preached on week-days as well as sabbath-days. He was indefatigable, He preached in the face of opposition, and in the midst of those that He knew sought occasion against Him.

[2.] At night He went to lodge at a friend's house, in the mount of Olives, about a mile out of town. Probably He had some friends in the city, that would gladly have lodged Him; but He chose to retire in the evening from the noise of the town, that He might have more time for secret devotion, now his hour was at hand.

[3.] Early in the morning He was in the temple again, where He had a morning-lecture for such as would attend it; and the people were forward to hear one that they saw forward to preach; (v. 38.) though the chief priests and scribes did all they could to prejudice them against Him. Sometimes the taste and relish which serious, honest, plain people have of good preaching, are more to be valued and judged by, than the opinion of the witty and learned, and those in authority.

CHAP. XXII. v. 1-6. The year of the redeemed, fixed from eternity in the divine counsels, and looked for by them that waited for the consolation of Israel, is now come; after the revolutions of many ages, Isa. 63:4. In the very first month of that year, the redemption is wrought out, so much was the Redeemer straitened till his undertaking was accomplished. It was at the same time of the same month, (Exod. 12:2.) that God by Moses brought Israel out of Egypt; that the Antitype might answer the type. Christ is here delivered up, when the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, v. 1. About as long before that feast as they began to make preparation for it, here was preparation making for our Passover's being offered for us. Here we have his sworn enemies contriving

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 20-33. The performance of ancient prophecies is very encouraging to those who are waiting on God to perform his promises: for if 'the days of vengeance "arrived," that all things which were written might be fulfilled,' surely the predictions of Zion's prosperity will also be accomplished; for our 'God delighteth in mercy.'—The scattered Jews around us unwillingly preach to us the truth of Christianity, and prove, that 'though heaven and earth pass away, the words of Jesus shall not pass away;' and they may also remind us to pray for those times, when neither the literal nor the mystical Jerusalem shall any longer be trodden down by the Gentiles, and when both Jews and Gentiles shall be turned to the Lord. (Rev. 11:1, 2.)—If we would 'jitt up our heads, as knowing that our redemption draweth nigh,' in those seasons when there shall be 'distress of nations with perplexity,' or in the day when 'flesh and heart shall fail;' or when 'the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and the Son of man shall be seen coming in a cloud, with power and great glory;' we must continually be expecting and preparing for those events. May we then watch and pray incessantly, that we may 'be accounted worthy to escape' these fatal delusions; and 'that we may be found' of Christ, when He cometh, 'in peace, without spot and blameless.' (2 Pet. 3:11-15.) May we begin, employ, and conclude each of our days, in reading and hearing His Word, obeying his precepts, and imitating his example, that whenever He cometh we may 'be found watching.' (P. O. Matt. 24:16-51. 25:1-13. Mark 13:24-37. 1 Thes. 5:1-11. 2 Pet. 3:9-18.) Scott.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. v. 3-5. (3.) Then entered, &c.] John 13:1-5, 13-30. 'God, by his wonderful providence, causeth him to be the minister of our salvation, who was the author of our destruction.' Beza. (5.) Money.] 'As the priests proposed so small a price,' [574]

(thirty shekels), 'to express their contempt of Jesus; so God permitteth Judas, covetous as he was, to acquiesce in that mean and trifling sum; (though he might easily have raised it higher), that thus the prophecy of Zechariah might be fulfilled, in which it had been particularly specified.' Doddridge. Scott.

4 And he ^awent his way and communed with the chief priests and captains, how he might betray him unto them.

5 And they were glad, ^aand covenanted to give him money.

6 And he promised, and sought opportunity to betray him unto them, ^ain the absence of the multitude.

7 ¶ Then came ^athe day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed.

8 And ^ahe sent Peter and John, saying, ^aGo and prepare us the passover, that we may eat.

9 And they said unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare?

10 And he said unto them, ^aBehold, when ye are entered into the city, there shall a man meet you, bearing a pitcher of water: follow him into the house where he entereth in.

11 And ye shall say unto the good man of the house, ^aThe Master saith unto thee, ^aWhere is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?

12 And ^ahe shall shew you ^aa large upper room furnished: there make ready.

13 And ^athey went and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the passover.

14 ¶ And ^awhen the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him.

15 And he said unto

it; (v. 2.) and a treacherous disciple joining with them, and coming to their assistance, v. 3. One would wonder that Christ, who knew all men, should take a traitor to be a disciple; and that one who could not but know Christ, should be so base as to betray Him; but Christ had wise and holy ends in appointing Judas, and how Judas came to betray Christ, we are here told, v. 3. It was the devil's work, who thought hereby to ruin Christ's undertaking, to have broken his head; but it proved only the bruising of his heel. Whoever betrays Christ, or his truths, or ways, it is Satan that puts them upon it. Judas knew how desirous the chief priests were to get Christ into their hands, and that they could not do it safely, without the assistance of some that knew his retirements, as he did. He therefore went himself, and made the motion to them, v. 4. Note, It is hard to say whether more mischief is done to Christ's kingdom by the power and policy of its open enemies, or by the treachery and self-seeking of its pretended friends: nay, without the latter, its enemies could not gain their point as they do. When you see Judas communing with the chief priests, be sure some mischief is hatching. The bargain made, Judas sought opportunity to betray Him. Probably, he slyly inquired of Peter and John, who were more intimate with their Master than he was, where He would be at such a time, and whither He would retire after the passover, and they were not sharp enough to suspect him. Somehow or other, in a little time, he gained the advantage he sought, and fixed the time and place where it might be done, in the absence of the multitude, and without tumult.

V. 7-20. What a hopeful prospect had we of Christ's doing great good by his preaching in the temple, during the seven days' feast of unleavened bread, when the people were every morning, and early in the morning, so attentive to hear Him! But here is a stop put to it. He must enter on work of another kind; in that, however, He shall do more good than in the other, for neither Christ's nor his church's suffering days are their idle, empty days.

Here is,

I. The preparation for the passover according to the law, v. 7. Christ was made under the law, and observed its ordinances, particularly that of the passover, to teach us in like manner to observe his gospel-institutions, particularly that of the Lord's supper. Probably He went to the temple to preach in the morning, when He sent Peter and John another way into the city to prepare the passover. Those who have attendants to do their secular business, must not think that that allows them to be idle; it engages them to employ themselves more in spiritual business, or service to the public. He directed those whom He employed, whither they should go, v. 9, 10. Christ might have said no more than, Go to such a one's house, or to a house in such a street, with such a sign, &c. But He directed them thus, to teach them to depend on the conduct of Providence, and to follow that, step by step. They went, not knowing whither they went, but whom they followed. Being come to the house, they must desire the master of the house to show them a room, (v. 11.) and he will readily do it, v. 12. Whether it was a friend's house, or a public house, does not appear; but the disciples found all just as He had said; (v. 13.) for they need not fear a disappointment, who go upon Christ's word.

II. The solemnizing of the passover, according to the law. When the hour of supper was come, He sat down, and the twelve apostles with Him, Judas not excepted; for it is possible they whose hearts are filled with Satan, and all manner of wickedness, may yet continue a plausible profession of religion, and be found in the performance of its external services. And while it is in the heart, and does not break out into any thing scandalous, such cannot be denied the external privileges of their external profession. Though Judas has already been guilty of an overt-act of treason, yet, it not being publicly known, Christ admits him to sit down with the rest at the passover. Observe,

1. Christ bids this passover welcome, to teach us in like manner to welcome with appetite ^{us} passover, the Lord's supper, v. 15. 'I have most earnestly desired, to eat this passover with you before I suffer.' He knew it to be the prologue to his sufferings, but desired it, in order to his Father's glory and man's redemption. He delighted to do even this part of the will of God concerning Him as Mediator. Shall we be backward to any service for Him, who was so forward in the work of our salvation? See his love to his disciples. He desired to eat it with them, that He and they might have a little time together; themselves and none besides, for private conversation, which they could not have in Jerusalem, ^{at} on this occasion. He was now about to leave them, but was very desirous to eat this passover with them before He suffered, as if the comfort of that would carry Him the more cheerfully through his sufferings, and make them easier. Note, Our gospel-passover, eaten by faith with Christ, will be an excellent preparation for sufferings, and trials, and death itself.

2. Christ in it takes his leave of all passovers, thereby abrogating all the ordinances of the ceremonial law, of which that of the passover was one of the earliest and most eminent; (v. 16.) 'I will not any more eat thereof, nor shall it be any more celebrated by my disciples, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.' (1.) It was fulfilled when Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. 5: 7. Therefore that type and shadow was laid aside, because now, in the kingdom of God, the substance was come, which superseded them. (2.) It was fulfilled in the Lord's supper, an ordinance of the gospel-kingdom, which the disciples, after the pouring out of the Spirit, frequently celebrated, as we find, Acts 2: 42, 46. Christ might be said to eat with them, because of their spiritual communion with Him in it. He is said to sup with them, and they with Him, Rev. 3: 20. But, (3.) The complete accomplishment of that commemoration of liberty will be in the kingdom of glory, when all God's spiritual Israel shall be released from the bondage of death and sin, and be put in possession of the land of promise.

What He had said of his eating the paschal lamb. He repeats concerning his drinking the passover-wine; the cup of blessing, or of thanksgiving, in which all the company pledged the master of the feast, at the close of the passover-supper. This cup He took, according to the custom, and gave thanks for the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, and the preservation of their first-born, and then said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves, v. 17. This is not said after words of the sacramental of the Jewish nation had the liberty of lodging there gratis, by right of hospitality. To this custom our Lord probably alludes here, as in the parallel passages. HORN.

Verses 14.

'In eating the passover, the master of the family began the feast with a cup of wine, which having solemnly blessed, i. e. having adored the name of God over it, he divided among the guests, (22: 17.) and afterwards washed his hands.—Then the supper began with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, which, when the company had tasted, one of the younger persons present, generally a child, asked the reason of what was peculiar in the feast, (Exod. 12: 26.) which introduced the haggadah, that is, the showing forth or declaration of it; in allusion to which we read of showing forth the Lord's death, (1 Cor. 11: 26.)—Then the master rose and took another cup, and washed his hands again: before the lamb was tasted; and in this interval, I suppose, Christ also washed the feet of his disciples. Then, after eating the passover, followed them, *With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer :

16 For I say unto you, *I will not any more eat thereof, *until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.

17 And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves;

18 For I say unto you, *I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, *until the kingdom of God shall come.

19 And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you : *this do in remembrance of me.

20 Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, 'This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you.

21 But behold, the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table.

cup; which being the New Testament in his blood, He might give unto every one's hand, to teach them to make a particular application of it to their own souls; but as for the paschal cup which is to be abolished, it is enough to say, 'Take it, and divide it among yourselves, we shall have no more occasion for it, v. 18. I will have it no more drunk of, till the Spirit be poured out, and then you shall in the Lord's supper commemorate a much more glorious redemption; of which both the deliverance out of Egypt and the passover-commemoration of it were types and figures. The kingdom of God is now so near, that you will not need to eat or drink any more till it comes.' Christ dying next day, opened it. As Christ with great pleasure took leave of all the legal feasts (which fell of course with the passover) for the evangelical ones, both spiritual and sacramental; so many good Christians, when called to remove from the church militant to the church triumphant, cheerfully exchange even their spiritual repasts, much more their sacramental ones, for the eternal feast.

III. The institution of the Lord's supper, v. 19, 20. The passover and deliverance out of Egypt were typical and prophetic signs of a Christ to come, who should by dying deliver us from sin, death, and the tyranny of Satan; but they shall no more say, The Lord lieth, that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, a much greater deliverance shall eclipse the lustre of that, and therefore the Lord's supper is instituted to be a commemorative sign or memorial of a Christ already come, that has by dying delivered us; and his death is in a special manner set before us in that ordinance.

1. The breaking of Christ's body, as a sacrifice for us, is here commemorated by the breaking of bread; and the sacrifices under the law were called the bread of our God; (Lev. 21: 6, 8, 17.) This is my body which is given for you. And there is a feast upon that sacrifice instituted, in which we are to apply it to ourselves, and take the benefit and comfort of it; for nothing can more nourish and satisfy our souls than the doctrine of Christ's atonement for sin, and the assurance of our interest in that atonement; this bread that was broken and given for us, to satisfy for the guilt of our sins, is broken and given to us, to satisfy the desire of our souls. And this we do in remembrance of what He did for us, when He died for us, and for a memorial of what we do, in making ourselves partakers of Him, and joining ourselves to Him in an everlasting covenant; like the stone Joshua set up for a witness, Josh. 24: 27.

2. The shedding of Christ's blood, by which the atonement was made, (for the blood made atonement for the soul, Lev. 17: 11.) as represented by the wine in the cup; that being a sign and token of the New Testament, or new covenant, made with us. It commemorates the purchase of the covenant by the blood of Christ, and confirms the promises of the covenant, which are all Yea and Amen in Him. This will revive and refresh our souls, as wine that makes glad the heart. In all our commemorations of the shedding of Christ's blood, we must have an eye to it as shed for us; we needed it, we hope to have benefit by it; who loved me, and gave Himself for me. And in all our regards to the New Testament, we must have an eye to the blood of Christ who gave life and being to it, and seals to us all its promises. Had it not been for the blood of Christ, we had never had the New Testament; and had it not been for the New Testament, we had never known the meaning of Christ's blood shed.

V. 21—38. Much of Christ's discourse here is new, and in John we shall find more still that is new. We should take example from Him, to entertain and edify our family and friends with such discourse at table as may minister grace to the hearers, especially after we have been at the Lord's table, to keep one another in a suitable frame. The matters Christ discoursed of, were of weight, and to the present purpose.

I. Concerning him that should betray Him.

1. He signifies to them that the traitor was now among them, and one of them, v. 21. By placing this after the institution of the Lord's supper, which in Matthew and Mark is placed before it, it seems plain that Judas did receive the Lord's supper, did eat of that bread, and drink of that cup; for after the solemnity was over, Christ said, Behold the hand of him that betrayeth Me, is with Me on the table. There have been those that have eaten bread with Christ, and yet have betrayed Him.

2. He foretells that the treason would take effect, (v. 22.) Truly the Son of man goes as it was determined; goes to the place where He will be betrayed; for He is delivered up by the counsel and foreknowledge of God, else Judas could not have delivered Him up. Christ was not driven to his sufferings, but cheerfully went to them. He said, Lo, I come.

3. He threatens the traitor; Woe to that man by whom He is betrayed. Note, Neither the patience of the saints under their sufferings, nor the counsel of God concerning their sufferings, will be any excuse for those that have any hand in their sufferings, or that persecute them. Though God has determined that Christ shall be betrayed, and He Himself has cheerfully submitted to it, yet Judas' sin or punishment is not the less.

4. He alarms the rest of the disciples into a suspicion of themselves, by saying it was one of them, and not naming which; (v. 23.) They began to inquire themselves, to put the question to themselves, who could be so base. The inquiry was not, Is it you? or Is it such a one? but, Is it I?

II. Concerning their strife for precedency or supremacy.

1. The dispute, v. 24. Such and so many contests among the disciples for dignity and dominion before the Spirit was poured on them, were a sad presage of the like strifes for, and affections of, supremacy in the churches, after the Spirit should be provoked to depart from another cup, which, after having delivered to each a piece of bread, was the sacramental cup at this supper. Then, after some pious and friendly discourse, the whole family, having drunk at least a fourth cup, sang some psalms of praise.

Verse 18.

Jesus did not partake of the wine used in appointing the sacramental memorial of his death.

SCOTT.

'Until the day I drink it new, &c.' The expression is figurative. If we have not positive evidence that there will be anything in heaven analogous to eating and drinking, as little have we, that there will not; and there is no absurdity in the supposition, nor does it appear implausible, that the use of means for the preservation of life may constitute one distinction between the immortal existence of angels and men, and that of Him who, by way of eminence, is said (1 Tim. 6: 16.) alone to have immortality.

CAMPBELL.

'It is true, Christ did, after his resurrection, eat and drink with the apostles; but this was not his custom. He ate and drank with them only that they might believe He was really alive.'

ROSENEM.

'This may seem an intimation, that, though Christ drank with the disciples after his resurrection, (Acts 10: 41.) He did not make use of wine; and we do not find that He was ever present at any feast; at least we are sure He never celebrated another passover with them. Nor does it appear that he partook of the eucharist with them, or ever administered it, but at this time of its institution.'

Verse 19, 20.

DODDRIDGE.

(Marg. Ref.) (20.) After, &c.] This was said, after the paschal supper, to signify that this cup pertained not to the solemnity of 'the passover.' Whitby. 'The cup' is here put for the reine contained in it; and that is said to be 'the new covenant in my blood,' as representing the blood of Emmanuel. It is astonishing that, amidst language so undeniably figurative, one expression should have been so long, so extensively, and so pertinaciously, interpreted literally, in contradiction to Scripture, to fact, and to common sense. As we are not under the ritual law, and as nothing in this respect is spoken in the New Testament, it does not appear that unfermented bread is essential to the Lord's supper, or that cutting the loaf is improper: though to break a portion of it at least seems more scriptural. The passover was once celebrated by anticipation, before the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; and the Lord's supper, once before our ransom had been paid.

SCOTT.

(19.) This do, &c.] Schoettgen here cites various rabbinical passages, which testify in a remarkable manner that the ancient Jewish church, in celebrating the paschal feast, always had in view the sufferings of the Messiah.

Verse 21—23.

(Marg. Ref.) (22.) As it was determined.] The other evangelists say, 'written,' that it was written because it was determined; but as Judas betrayed Christ, neither because it was decreed that he 22 And truly the Son of man goeth, as it was determined: but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed!

23 And they began to inquire among themselves, which of them it was that should do this thing.

[Practical Observations.]

24 And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest.

25 And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors.

26 But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve.

27 For whether is greater, he that sit-them. How inconsistent is this with that in the verse before! There they were inquiring which could be the traitor, and here which should be the prince. Could such an instance of humility, and of pride and vanity, be found in the same men, so near together? What a self-contradiction is the deceitful heart of man!

2. Christ was not sharp upon them, as might have been expected, (He having so often reproved them, for this very thing,) but mildly showed them the sin and folly of this dispute.

(1.) It was to make themselves like the kings of the Gentiles, that affect worldly pomp, and with worldly power, v. 25. They exercise lordship over their subjects, and are ever and anon striving to exercise lordship too over princes about them, if they think them not so strong as themselves. Note, The exercising of lordship better becomes the kings of the Gentiles, than the ministers of Christ. But observe, They that exercise authority, and take on themselves to bear sway, and give law, are called benefactors: they call themselves so, and so their flatterers call them, and those that serve their interests. It is pretended, they have been benefactors, and on that account should have rule; nay, that in exercising authority they are benefactors; however they really serve themselves, they would be thought to serve their country. One of the Ptolemies was surnamed Euergetes—The Benefactor. Now our Savior, by noticing this, intimates, [1.] That to do good is much more honorable than to look great; for these princes that were the terror of the mighty, would not be called so, but rather the benefactors of the needy; so that, by their own confession, a benefactor to his country is much more valued than a ruler of it. [2.] That to do good is the surest way to be great, else they that aimed to be rulers would not have been so solicitous to be called benefactors: this therefore He would have his disciples believe, that their greatest honor would be to do all the good they could in the world. They would indeed be benefactors to the world, by bringing the Gospel to it. Let them value themselves on that title, and then they would all be greater; greater blessings to mankind than the kings of the earth. If they have what is confessedly the greater honor of being benefactors, let them despise the less, of being rulers.

(2.) It was to make themselves unlike the disciples of Christ, and unlike Christ Himself;

(v. 26, 27.) 'Ye shall not be so.' It was never intended that ye should rule any otherwise than by the power of truth and grace, but that ye should serve.' When church-rulers affect external pomp and power, and bear up themselves by secular interests and influences, they debase their office, and it is an instance of degeneracy, like that of Israel when they would have king like the nations around them; whereas the Lord was their King.

See here, [1.] Christ's rule to his disciples: He that is greater among you, that is senior, to whom precedence is due on account of age, let him be as the younger, in point both of lowliness of place, (conceding to sit with the younger, and be free and familiar with them,) and of labor and work. We say, Let the young work, and the aged receive honors. But let the elder take pains as well as the younger; their age and honor, instead of warranting them to take their ease, bind them to double work. And he that is chief, the president of the college or assembly, let him be as he that serves, as the deacon, let him stoop to the meanest and most toilsome services for the public good, if there be occasion.

[2.] Christ's example to his rule. Christ was among his disciples, just like one that waited at table; so far from taking state, or taking his ease, by commanding their attendance on Him. He was ready to do any office of kindness and service for them; witness his washing their feet. Shall they take on them the form of princes, who call themselves followers of Him, that took on Him the form of a servant?

(3.) They ought not to strive for worldly honor and grandeur, because He had better honors in reserve for them, of another nature, a kingdom, a feast, a throne, for each of them, wherein they should all share alike, having no occasion to strive for precedence, v. 23—30. Where observe,

[1.] Christ's commendation of the disciples' faithfulness to Him; which was honor enough, they need not strive for greater. It is spoken with an air of encomium: 'Ye are they, who have continued with Me in my temptations, who have stood by Me, when others have deserted Me.' Christ had his temptations; He was despised, rejected of men, reproached, reviled, and endured the contradiction of sinners. But his disciples continued with Him, and were afflicted in all his

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23. When sinners have long gone on in wickedness, and still listen to temptation, Satan is often permitted to take full and final possession, and to hurry them into such crimes as 'bring on them swift destruction.' (John 12: 1—8. 13: P. O. 18—30.) This is more likely to be the doom of hypocritical preachers of the Gospel, than of any other persons: nor will eminence of rank, gifts, or abilities, in the least preserve them from it.—The avarice of false friends sometimes concurs with the malice of open enemies, in contriving plans of persecution; and, however they despise or hate one another, they are very glad of each other's assistance. The faithful followers of the Lamb, however, after the example of their Lord, should attend on the ordinances of God in due season: assured that no plots of their enemies can accomplish more than 'was before determined,' with a view to the glory of God, and the salvation of their souls. If the Redeemer 'greatly desired' the approach of his last sufferings, that He might furnish an everlasting feast for our souls, 'by his body broken, and his blood poured out for us,' with what patience and cheerfulness should we meet those lighter trials, through which we are to follow Him to his kingdom above!—Let us beware of hypocrisy; and though the hand of traitors should be with us, either at his table, or at our own; we shall be free from their woe, and be able to appeal to the Lord, and confide in Him with conscious integrity. (P. O. Matt. 26: 1—35. Mark 14: 1—42.)

should, of which he could know nothing; nor because it was so written, which assuredly he did not understand, or attend to, at the time; so neither the one nor the other interfered, in the smallest degree, with his free agency as an accountable being, and consequently did not excuse his wicked conduct. It is surprising, learned men should allow the system of prophecy to be consistent with man's free agency; and yet think the secret purposes of God inconsistent with it. Of predicted events we may know something; and this, in certain cases, may influence our conduct; but of secret decrees we can know nothing, previous to the accomplishing of them; and so it is impossible they should be the motives of our actions, or form any excuse for our sins. And as the predicted event must infallibly take place, for 'the Scripture cannot be broken,' this as certainly insures the predicted conduct, in the persons concerned, if only foreseen, as if absolutely decreed. The objection therefore, on this ground, is unreasonable; but the Scriptures must decide which system is true. 'The decree of Providence, though necessary to take place, yet does not excuse the crime of the instrument.' Beza. This Calvin himself would have maintained.

SCOTT.

(32.) As it was determined.] 'I look upon this passage as an evident proof that those things are, in the language of Scripture, said to be determined or decreed, (or exactly bounded and marked out by God) as the original word most naturally signifies, which He sees will in fact happen, in consequence of his volitions, without any necessitating agency, as well as those events of which He is properly the Author; and, as Beza well expresses it, we need not fear falling into any impropriety of speech, when we use the language which God has taught.'

Verses 24—27.

'It is wonderful, Christ should not have answered, that Peter was he to whom all the rest must be subject, as a prince or head; if indeed Peter was placed in any degree of apostolical authority above the rest.' Beza. This competition seems to have been secretly revived among the apostles, even at the last passover. The immediate introduction of 'the kingdom of God' would be considered by them as implied in what our Lord had before spoken; and they overlooked all He had said of his sufferings, as what they could not understand. He, however, saw the same ambition working in their hearts; and to repress it had recourse to arguments, similar to those He had used on a former occasion. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, v. 46—50. Matt. 18: 1—6. 20: 20—28. Mark 10: 35—45.) Exercise, &c.] Both the original words, here used, imply arbitrary, domineering authority; like that of a slaveholder over his slaves. When our Lord said, that He was among them as He that served, 'he seems to have referred to the washing of the disciples' feet, which took place about the same time. (12: 35—46. John 12: 1—8. 13: 1—17.)

(35.) Benefactors.] The original word was among the Greeks a title of honor, assigned to all who had deserved well of the monarch or state, defended its liberties, or increased its honor. So the Latin father of his country. Thus Quins (in 2 Macc. 4: 2.) is styled 'the beneafflictions. It was but little help they could give Him; however, He took it kindly that they continued with Him, and He here owns their kindness, though it was by the assistance of his own grace that they did continue. Christ's disciples had been very defective in duty, guilty of many mistakes and weaknesses, very dull and forgetful, and often blundered, yet their Master had passed all by, and forgotten it, does not upbraid them with their infirmities, but gives them this memorable testimony, Ye are they who have continued with Me. Thus does He praise at parting, to show how willing He is to make the best of those whose hearts He knows to be upright within them.

[2.] The recompense for their fidelity; I appoint, I bequeath to you a kingdom. Or thus, I appoint to you, as my Father has appointed a kingdom to Me, that ye may eat and drink at my table. Understand it,

1st. Of this world. God gave his Son a kingdom among men, the gospel-church, of which He is the living, quickening, ruling Head; this kingdom He appointed to his apostles, and their successors in the ministry of the Gospel, that they should enjoy the comforts and privileges of the Gospel, help to communicate them to others by gospel-ordinances, sit on thrones as officers of the church, not only declaratively, but as exhortatively judging the tribes of Israel, that persist in their infidelity, denouncing the wrath of God against them, and ruling the gospel-Israel, the spiritual Israel, by the instituted discipline of the church, administered with gentleness and love. This is the honor reserved for you. Or, 2dly. Of what should be done for them in the other world; which I take to be chiefly meant. Let them go on in their services in this world, their preferences shall be in the other world. God will give them the kingdom, in which they shall be sure to have, 1. The richest dainties; for they shall eat and drink at Christ's table in his kingdom, of which He had spoken, v. 16, 18. They shall partake of those joys and pleasures which were the recompense of his services and sufferings. They shall have full satisfaction of soul in the vision and fruition of God; and herein the best society, as at a feast, in the perfection of love. 2. The highest dignities; 'You shall not only be provided for at the royal table, but preferred to the royal throne; shall sit down with Me on my throne, Rev. 3: 21. In the great day you shall sit on thrones, as assessors with Christ, to approve of and applaud his judgment of the twelve tribes of Israel.' If the saints shall judge the world, (1 Cor. 6: 2.) much more the church.

III. Concerning Peter's denying Him. And in this part of the discourse we may observe,

1. Christ's warning to Peter of the devil's design on Him and the rest of the apostles; v.

31 Peter, who used to be the mouth of the rest in speaking to Christ, is here made the ear of the rest; and what is designed for warning to them all, (All you shall be offended because of Me.) is directed to Peter, because he was principally concerned, being in a particular manner struck at by the tempter; Satan has desired to have you. He desired to have them, that he might sift them, that he might show them to be chaff, and not wheat. The troubles now coming on them, were sifting, would try what was in them; but that was not all, Satan desired to sift them by his temptations, and by those troubles to draw them into sin; to put them into a loss and hurry, as corn when it is sifted to bring the chaff uppermost, or rather to shake out the wheat, and leave nothing but the chaff. Observe, Satan could not sift them unless God gave him leave; he desired to have them, as he begged of God a permission to try and tempt Job. 'He hath challenged you, has undertaken to prove you hypocrites, and Peter especially, the forwardest of you.' Some suggest their punishment was meant for striving who should be greatest, in which contest Peter perhaps was very warm; 'Leave them to me, to sift them for it.'

2. His particular encouragement to Peter, in reference to this trial; 'Because thou wilt be most violently assaulted, I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; that it may not totally and finally fail.' Note, (1.) If faith be kept up in an hour of temptation, though we fall, we shall not be utterly cast down. Faith will quench Satan's fiery darts. (2.) There may be many failings in the faith of true believers, yet there shall not be a total and final failure. Faith is their seed, their root remaining in them. (3.) It is owing to the mediation and intercession of Christ that the faith of his disciples, though sometimes sadly shaken, yet is not sunk. If left to themselves, they would fail; but they are kept by the power of God, and the prayer of Christ. The intercession of Christ is not only general, for all that believe, but for particular believers; I have prayed for thee, which is an encouragement for us to pray for ourselves, and an engagement on us to pray for others too.

3. His charge to Peter, to help others as he should himself be helped of God; 'When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.' When thou art recovered by the grace of God, and brought to repentance, do what thou canst to recover others; when thou hast found thy faith kept from failing, labor to confirm the faith of others; when thou hast found mercy with God, encourage others also to hope.' Note, (1.) Those that are fallen into sin, must be converted from it: those that have turned aside, return; those that have left their first love, do their first works. (2.) Those that through grace are converted from sin, must do what they can to strengthen their brethren that stand, and pre-factor of the city.' But the cognomen was given, by way of eminence, to kings, and to chief citizens, as a title of honor.

BLOOMFIELD.

'It seems to be our Lord's view, not only to check all ambition of power, every thing which savored of a desire of superiority and dominion, but also to restrain that species of vanity, which is near akin to it, the affectation of distinction from titles of respect and dignity.'

CAMPBELL.

Verses 29, 30.

I appoint, &c. Judas could not be intended in this promise; but as twelve apostles were at first appointed, and as the vacancy would soon be filled up, after he 'was gone to his own place,' the original number was mentioned. Some explain this of the authority of the apostles over the Christian church; but, while this authority is most readily allowed to belong to them, and in some respects to them exclusively, (Matt. 16: 19.) some special honor and distinction in the world above, seems to be more directly intended.

Verses 31-34.

Perhaps Peter was here called by his former name, Simon, because in the events referred to, his instability so little accorded to the signification of that which had been given him. (Matt. 16: 18. John 1: 35-42.) Our Lord addressed him in particular, and in a very emphatic manner: though the other apostles were in a measure concerned, and the pronoun is plural, you, not thee. (31.) Sift you as wheat. Agitate their minds by his inward suggestions, concur, or with their outward perils and difficulties, as the wheat is tossed about in the sieve; (Marg. Ref. i-x. Am. 9: 7-10.) but, whatever his intentions were, the Lord meant to permit him, by these means, to move them, and to overrule it for the increase of their purity. Not fed as life falls in death. His faith was grievously interrupted in its exercise and effects, when he denied his Lord; but the principle did not fail in his heart. (Marg. Ref. y, z. Rom. 5: 7-10. 8: 32-34. 1 Pet. 1: 2-5.) 'The Spirit of life' did not finally leave Peter, who was a believer, and whose conduct on a sudden temptation was entirely contrary to his real character, and his habitual purpose; though he no more strove with Judas, who was a hypocrite, and acted according to his true character, which he had hitherto concealed. Peter was speedily brought to return; but Judas left to utter apostasy, despair, and suicide. (Notes, Matt. 13: 20, 21. 25: 1-4. Rom. 7: 15-17.) After his fall and recovery, Peter was peculiarly earnest in encouraging the disciples to hope for a happy event of their trials; and in animating them boldly to profess and preach the Gospel; while the humiliating lessons, which he learned by those events, had a very salutary effect on his own spirit, and tended to qualify him especially for encouraging and warning the tempted, the fearful, the desponding, or the fallen, even to the end of his days. The discerning reader will perceive the traces of it in his epistles. 'It was certainly Peter's advantage, that our Lord prayed for him; but not so much his honor, that he should stand in need of such a prayer, beyond all others.' Lightfoot. To Peter belonged shame, the honor was the Lord's—All need the same intercession of Christ, which is the believer's only security against final apostasy; and who dares say, that he needs it less than Peter did? 'It is through the prayers of Christ, the elect never utterly fall away from the faith. He shows that faith differeth much from a vain security, in setting before us the grievous example of Peter.' Beza.

SCOTT.

(31.) Sift. 'The clods of earth, (of the threshing floor) as is customary in the East at the present day, were collected, broken in pieces, and separated from the grain by a sieve. Sifting was accordingly used as a symbol of misfortune and overthrows.'

JOHN

'The temptations and trials of the godly are the sifting of the wheat.'

JOHN

34 And he said, I tell thee, Peter, the cock shall not crow this day, before that thou shalt thrice deny that thou knowest me.

[Practical Observations.]

35 ¶ And he said unto them, When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye any thing? And they said, Nothing.

36 Then said he unto them, But now, he that hath a purse, let him take it, and likewise his scrip: and he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment, and buy one.

37 For I say unto you, That this that is written must yet be accomplished in me, And he was reckoned among the transgressors: for the things concerning me have an end.

38 And they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And he said unto them, It is enough.

39 ¶ And he came out, and went, as he was wont, to the mount of Olives; and his dis-cent their falling; see Ps. 51: 11—13. 1 Tim. 1: 13.

4. Peter's declared resolution to cleave to Christ, whatever it cost, v. 33. This was a great word, and yet I believe no more than he thought, at this time, he should make good. Judas never protested thus against denying Christ, though often warned of it. Note, All true disciples of Christ sincerely desire and design to follow Him, though into prison, though out of the world.

5. Christ's express prediction of his denying Him thrice, v. 34. Thou dost not know thine own heart, Peter, but must be left to thyself a little, that thou mayst know it, and never trust to it again. Note, Christ knows us better than we know ourselves, and what evil is in us, and will be done by us, which we do not suspect. And it is well He does, for therefore He knows where we are weak better than we do, and where to come in with grace sufficient; He knows how far a temptation will prevail, and therefore when to say, Hitherto shall it come, and no further.

IV. Concerning the condition of all the disciples.

1. He appeals to them concerning what had been, v. 35. He had owned they had been faithful servants to Him, v. 28. Now, at parting, He expects they should acknowledge He had been a kind and careful Master. (1.) He owns He had sent them out in a very poor and bare condition, because they were not to go far, nor be out long; and He would thus teach them to depend on the providence of God, and, under that, on the kindness of their friends. If God thus sends us out into the world, let us remember, that better than we have thus begun low.

(2.) Yet He will have them own that, notwithstanding, they then lived as plentifully and comfortably as ever; and they readily acknowledged it; 'Nothing, Lord, I have all, and abound.' Note, [1.] It is good often to review the providences of God concerning us all our days, and to observe how we have got through straits and difficulties. [2.] Christ is a good Master, and his service a good service; for though his servants may sometimes be brought low, yet He will help them; and though He try them, yet will not He leave them. [3.] We must reckon ourselves well done by, and not complain, but be thankful, if we have the necessary supports of life, though we have neither dainties nor superfluities, though we have to live from hand to mouth, and live on the kindness of our friends. The disciples lived on contribution, and yet did not complain that their maintenance was precarious, but owned, to their Master's honor, they had lacked nothing.

2. He gives them notice of a very great change of their circumstances now approaching. For,

(1.) Their Master was now entering on his suffering He had often foretold, v. 37. 'This is yet to be accomplished, and then the things written concerning Me will have an end; then I shall say, It is finished.' Note, It may be the comfort of suffering Christians, as it was of a suffering Christ, that their sufferings were foretold and determined in the counsels of heaven, and will shortly terminate in the joys of heaven.

(2.) They must therefore expect troubles, and not such an easy, fair life as they had had. They must now, in some degree, suffer with their Master; and when He is gone, suffer like Him. [1.] They must not now expect their friends to be so kind and generous to them as they had been; and therefore, He that has a purse let him take it, for he may have occasion for it, and for all the good husbandry he can use. [2.] They must now expect their enemies to be more fierce upon them than they had been, and they would need magazines as well as stores; He that has no sword wherewith to defend himself against robbers and assassins. (2 Cor. 11: 26.) will find a great want of it, and will be ready to wish, some time or other, that he had sold his garment, and bought one. This is intended only to show that the times will be very perilous, so that no man would think himself safe if he had not a sword by his side. But the sword of the Spirit is the sword which the disciples of Christ must furnish themselves with. Christ having suffered for us, we must arm ourselves with the same mind. (1 Pet. 4: 1.) arm ourselves with an expectation of trouble, that it may not surprise us, and with a holy resignation to the will of God in it, that there may be no contradiction in us to it: and then we are better prepared than if we had sold a coat to buy a sword. The disciples hereupon inquire what strength they had, and find they had among them two swords. (v. 38.) of which one was Peter's. The Galileans generally travelled with swords. Christ wore none Himself, but He was not against his disciples wearing them. But how little He would have them depend on that, He intimates when He saith, It is enough; which, some think, is spoken ironically; yet two swords are sufficient for those who need none, having God Himself to be the Shield of their help, and the Sword of their excellency. Deut. 32: 29.

V. 39—46. We have here the awful story of Christ's agony in the garden; in which Christ accommodated Himself to that part of his undertaking, which He was now entering upon—the making of his soul an offering for sin. He afflicted his own soul with grief for the sin He was to satisfy for, and an apprehension of the wrath of God, to which man had by sin made himself obnoxious, which He pleased as a Sacrifice to admit the impressions of, the consuming of a sacrifice with fire, from heaven, being the surest token of its acceptation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 24—34. How unbecoming is worldly ambition in a follower of Jesus! It is our part to do good by stooping and laboring, and to become 'benefactors' indeed, by being servants to all men for Christ's sake, and after his example. (2 Cor. 4: E, 4. Gal. 5: 13—15.) Nor are we allowed to aspire after any other pre-eminence in his kingdom, than what springs from deeper humility, with superior diligence and usefulness. Thus following Christ in his 'temptations,' we too shall obtain a kingdom, even as He has been exalted to his mediatorial throne: and though we shall not have the distinguished honor of the holy apostles, yet we shall be admitted to a 'fulness of joy' and 'a weight of glory,' of which we at present can form no adequate conception.—But Satan, if he cannot destroy us, will endeavor to disgrace, pollute, or distress us: and the Lord may see good to permit him to harass us grievously, and even to baffle us in some painful conflicts, that He may the more power, humble, and sanctify us, and show the power of his grace in making us at length more than conquerors. (2 Cor. 12: 7—10.) If we have experience of this conflict, and have been recovered, after having been foiled by temptation, we shall be both qualified and disposed to caution and encourage our brethren, and to 'restore in the spirit of meekness such as have been overtaken in a fault.' (Gal. 6: 1—5, v. 1.)—But nothing so certainly forebodes a fall, in a professed disciple of Christ, as self-confidence connected with disregard to warnings, and contempt of danger. We may honestly mean what we profess, when we say, 'I am ready to go with Thee to prison, or to death;' but it is not so easy to stand our ground in the hour of temptation: and unless we 'watch and pray always,' we may be drawn into those things, during the course of the day, against which in the morning we were most fully and honestly resolved. (P. O. Matt. 26: 26—35. Rom. 7: 18—25. P. O. 14—25.)

SCOTT.

Verse 33.

As Christ said, 'It is enough' (though two swords could not be enough to arm eleven persons;) and as He showed strong disapprobation of Peter's conduct in using the sword, we are sure, He did not intend to be understood literally, but as speaking of the weapons of their spiritual warfare. 'His meaning was not perfectly comprehended by them; and He did not think it necessary, at that time, to open the matter further to them.' Campbell.—'This whole speech is allegorical. When He prayed in the garden, and reproved Peter for setting up the sword, He Himself showed what those arms were.'

Beza.—'You may easily guess at the reception you are like to meet with, when you come in the name and authority of One, who has suffered as a malefactor; and yet demand faith and obedience to Him as an almighty Savior.' Doddridge.

It is enough. 'The apostles took Christ in a literal sense. Their misapprehension He did not think fit to rectify, because it would have been of no service to them; but gave them such an answer as a mild and humane master would have done to a well-meaning servant of great stupidity, "It is very well." Markland, in Bloomfield.

eyes also followed him.

40 And when he was at the place, he said unto them, 'Pray that ye enter not into temptation.'

41 And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down, and prayed.

42 Saying, 'Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me: nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done.'

43 And there appeared 'an angel unto him from heaven, strengthening him.'

44 And 'being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly: and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground.'

45 And when he rose up from prayer, and was come to his disciples, he found them sleeping for sorrow,

46 And said unto them, 'Why sleep ye? rise and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.'

We had this before, 1. That, when Christ went out, his disciples, except Judas, followed Him. Having continued with Him hitherto in his temptations, they would not leave Him now. 2. That He went to the place where He was wont to be private, which intimates that Christ accustomed Himself to retirement, was often alone, to teach us to be so, for freedom of converse with God and our own hearts. Though Christ had no convenience for retirement but a garden, yet He retired. This should particularly be our practice after we have been at the Lord's table; we have then work to do, which requires us to be private. 3. That He exhorted his disciples to pray, that, though the approaching trial could not be avoided, yet they might not in it enter into temptation to sin; that, when they were in the greatest fright and danger, yet they might not have any inclination to desert Christ; 'Pray that ye may be kept from sin.' 4. That He withdrew, and prayed; they had their errands at the throne of grace, and He his, therefore it was fit they should pray separately, as sometimes, when they had joint errands, they prayed together. He withdrew about a stone's cast further into the garden, which some reckon about fifty or sixty paces, and there He kneeled down, on the bare ground; the other evangelists say, that afterward He fell on his face, and there prayed that, if it were the will of God, this bitter cup of suffering might be removed from Him. This was the language of that innocent dread of suffering, which, being really and truly man, he could not but have in his nature. 5. That He, knowing it to be his Father's will that He should suffer and die, and that, as the matter was now settled, it was necessary for our redemption and salvation, presently withdrew that petition, and resigned Himself to his heavenly Father's will: 'Nevertheless, not my will be done; not the will of my human nature, but the will of God, (as it is written concerning Me), which I delight to do, let that be done,' Ps. 40: 7, 8. 6. That his disciples were asleep when He was at prayer, and when they should have been themselves praying, v. 45. When He rose from prayer, He found them sleeping, unconcerned in his sorrows; but see what a favorable construction is here put upon it, which we had not in the other evangelists—they were sleeping for sorrow. The great sorrow they were in on the mournful farewells of their Master this evening, had exhausted their spirits, and made them very dull and heavy, which (it being now late) disposed them to sleep. This teaches us to make the best of our brethren's infirmities, and if there be one cause better than another, charitably impute them to that. 7. That when He awakened them, He exhorted them to pray; (v. 46.) 'Why do ye allow yourselves to sleep? Rise and pray. Shake off your drowsiness, that ye may be fit to pray, and pray for grace, that ye may be able to shake off your drowsiness; like the call to Jonah; (Jon. 1: 6.) Arise, call upon thy God. When we find ourselves either by outward circumstances or inward dispositions entering into temptation, it concerns us to pray, Lord, help me in this time of need.

Three things here we had not in the other evangelists:

1. That, when Christ was in his agony, there appeared to Him an angel from heaven, strengthening Him, v. 43. 1. It was an instance of the deep humiliation of our Lord Jesus, that He needed the assistance of an angel, and would admit it. The influence of the divine nature withdrew for the present, and then, as to his human nature, He was for a little while lower than the angels, and capable of receiving help from them. 2. When not delivered from his sufferings, yet He was strengthened and supported under them, which was equivalent. If God proportion the shoulders to the burden, we shall have no reason to complain, whatever He is pleased to lay on us. David owns this a sufficient answer to his prayer, in the day of trouble, that God strengthened him with strength in his soul, and so does the Son of David, Ps. 138: 3. The angels ministered to the Lord Jesus in his sufferings. He could have had legions of them to rescue Him; nay, this one could have chased and conquered the whole band that came to take Him; but He made use of his ministration only to strengthen Him; and the very visit which this angel made Him now in his grief, when his enemies were awake and his friends asleep, was such a seasonable token of the divine favor, as would be a very great strengthening to Him. Yet this was not all; he, probably, said something to Him, to strengthen Him; as that his sufferings were in order to his Father's and his own glory, and to the salvation of those that were given Him, in order to the joy set before Him, the seeing of his seed. Perhaps he did something to strengthen Him, wiped away his sweat and tears, ministered some cordial to Him, as after his temptation, helped Him off the ground, or bore Him up when ready to faint away; and in these services of the angel, the Holy Spirit was thus putting strength into Him; for so the word signifies. It pleased the Lord to bruise Him indeed; yet did He plead against Him with his great power? No, but He put strength in Him, (Job 23: 6.) as He had promised, Ps. 89: 21. Isa. 49: 8: 6: 7.

II. That, being in an agony, He prayed more earnestly, v. 44. As his sorrow and trouble grew upon Him, He grew more importunate in prayer: not that there was before any coldness or indifference, but there was now a greater vehemency, which was expressed in his voice and gesture. Note, Prayer, though never out of season, is especially seasonable when we are in an agony; and the stronger our agonies are, the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 35-46. Our experience of the Lord's faithfulness and goodness, in times past, should animate us to trust his providence and grace for the future: for many of us may say to his praise, that when in obedience to his Word, and depending on his promises, we neglected ordinary methods of obtaining temporal provisions, we in the event wanted nothing. Yet we should not so presume on his care, as to rush heedlessly into danger: and we may expect, that as our faith is strengthened, it will be more sharply tried than heretofore. We should then be continually preparing and arming for the battle, that we may be 'able to stand in the evil day' of sharp temptation: and we shall find, that a believing acquaintance with the Word of God, that 'sword of the Spirit,' will be more needful for us, than even our ordinary raiment. We cannot expect to escape tribulation and ill usage, in a world which numbered the Lord of glory with the worst of malefactors, if we indeed profess his truth and obey his commandments: but if we pray fervently that we 'may not enter into temptation,' we shall either be preserved from the severer trials, or be enabled under them to say, 'Not my will, but thine, be done.' And surely, when we contemplate the Redeemer 'in an agony, praying more earnestly,' and his sweat like great drops of blood falling down to the ground, while 'He was bruised for our iniquities,' we shall pray also to be enabled 'to resist unto blood, striving against sin,' if we should ever be called to it. (P. O. Matt. 26: 36-46. Mark 14: 17-42. Heb. 12: 2-8. v. 2-4.) SCOTT.

Verses 32-46.

(Marg. Ref.—Matt. 26: 36-46. Mark 14: 32-35, v. 36, 37.) (40.) Pray, &c. Let this be your peculiar request. (Note, Matt. 6: 13) 'Prayers are a sure succor against the most perilous assaults of our enemies.' Beza. (43.) Angel, &c. The appearance of a holy angel to our Lord, in this conflict, and when thus weighed down with the feeling of the wrath of God against our sins, was an intimation of approaching victory. The angel could not effectually communicate strength, even to his human soul; but he might suggest encouraging thoughts; (32. Note, Is. 35: 3, 4) and it was doubtless a part of our Savior's humiliation, and an instance of his condescension. Just He was pleased to be thus 'strengthened' by 'a ministering spirit,' though 'all the angels of God worship Him.' (44.) Drops, &c. Earned men have adduced some instances of persons who have sweated blood; but it was always in the greatest excess of anguish or terror; and commonly attended by weakness of body.—'Christ, by overcoming all the horrors of death, in conjunction with the curse of God for our sins, renders death friendly and lovely to us.' Beza.

(44.) As it were drops of blood. 'Like clots of blood. This interpretation the words themselves demand. There is a similar expression, Acts 9: 18. It is a sort of proverb applied to any one who labors excessively, as also to those who weep bitterly. There is an allusion to these proverbs in the words of Luke, who was not unacquainted with Grecian literature.' [So Grotius, Scaliger, Hammao, Price, Markland, Theophylact, Rosemauer, Kuinoel, &c.]

BLOOMFIELD.

47 ¶ And ^a while he yet spake, behold, ^a multitude, and he that was called ^b Judas, one of the twelve, went before them, and drew near unto Jesus to kiss him.

48 But Jesus said unto him, Judas, ^c betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?

49 When they which were about him saw what would follow, they said unto him, Lord, shall we smite with the sword?

50 And ^d one of them smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear.

51 And Jesus answered and said, ^e Suffer ye thus far. ^f And he touched his ear, and healed him.

52 Then ^g Jesus said unto the chief priests, and ^h captains of the temple, and the elders, which were come to him, Be ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves?

53 When I ⁱ was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched forth no hands against me: ^j but this is your hour, and ^k the power of darkness.

54 Then ^l took they him, and led him, and brought him into the high priest's house. ^m And Peter followed afar off.

55 And when they ⁿ had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, ^o Peter sat down among them.

more lively and frequent our prayers should be. Now it was that Christ offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, and was heard in that He feared, (Heb. 5: 7.) and in his fear wrestled, as Jacob with the angel.

III. That, in this agony, his sweat was, as it were, great drops of blood falling down to the ground. Sweat came in with sin, and was a branch of the curse, Gen. 3: 19. Therefore when Christ was made Sin and a Curse for us, He underwent a grievous sweat, that He might sanctify and sweeten all our trials to us. It is some dispute among the critics, whether this sweat is only compared to drops of blood, being much thicker than drops of sweat commonly are, the pores of the body being more than ordinarily opened; or, that real blood out of the capillary veins mingled with it, so that it was in color like blood, and might truly be called a bloody sweat; the matter is not great. Some reckon this one of the times when Christ shed his blood for us, for without shedding of blood there is no remission. Every pore was, as it were, a bleeding wound, and his blood stained all his raiment. This showed the travail of his soul. He was now abroad in the open air, in a cool season, on the cold ground, far in the night, yet breaks out into a sweat; this bespeaks the extremity of his agony.

V. 47—53. Satan, finding himself baffled in his attempt to terrify our Lord, and so put Him out of the possession of his own soul, betakes himself (according to his usual method) to force and arms, and brings a party into the field to seize Him, and Satan was in them. Here is,

I. The marking of Him by Judas. Here a numerous party appears, and Judas at their head, for he was guide to them that took Jesus; so he drew near to Him to kiss Him, according to the wonted familiarity our Lord admitted his disciples to. Luke alone notices the question, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? What! Is that the signal? v. 43. Must the Son of man be betrayed, as if any thing could be concealed from Him, and a plot carried on against Him unknown to Him? Must one of his own disciples betray Him, as if He had been a hard Master, or deserved ill at their hands? Must the badge of friendship be the instrument of treachery? Was ever a love-token so desecrated and abused? Note, Nothing can be a greater affront or grief to the Lord Jesus, than to be betrayed, and betrayed with a kiss, by those that profess relation to Him, and an affection for Him. Those do so, who, under pretence of zeal for his honor, persecute his servants, who, under the cloak of a seeming affection for the honor of free-grace, give a blow to the root of holiness and strictness of conversation. Many instances there are of Christ's being betrayed with a kiss, by those who, under the form of godliness, fight against the power of it. It were well if their own consciences would put this question to them, which Christ here puts to Judas, Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? And will He not resent it? Will He not avenge it?

II. The effort his disciples make for his protection. v. 49. 'Thou didst allow us to have two swords, shall we now make use of them? Never was there more occasion.' They asked the question, as if they would not have drawn the sword without commission from their Master, but they were in too much haste and too much heat to stay for an answer. But Peter, aiming at the head of one of the servants of the high priest, missed his blow, and cut off his right ear. The other evangelists record the check Christ gave Peter for it. Luke here tells us, 1. How Christ excused the blow; Suffer ye thus far, v. 51. Whitby thinks He said this to his enemies who came to take Him, that they might not be provoked to fall on the disciples, whom He had undertaken to preserve; 'Pass by this injury and affront, it was without warrant from Me, and there shall not be another blow struck.' Though Christ had power to have struck them down, and struck them dead, yet He, as it were, begs their pardon for an assault made on them by one of his followers, to teach us to give good words even to our enemies. 2. How He cured the wound, which was more than amends for the injury. Christ hereby gave them a proof, (1.) Of his power. He that could heal, could destroy if He pleased, which should have obliged them in interest to submit to Him. Had they returned the blow on Peter, He would immediately have healed Him; and what could not a small regiment do, that had such a Surgeon! (2.) Of his mercy and goodness. Christ here gave an illustrious example to his own rule of doing good to them that hate us, as afterward He did of praying for them that despitefully use us. One would have thought that this generosity should have overcome them; that such coals, heaped on their heads, should have melted them; but their hearts were hardened.

III. Christ's expostulation with the officers of the detachment that came to apprehend Him, to show what an absurd thing it was for them to make all this rout and noise, v. 52, 53. Matthew relates it, as said to the multitude; Luke, as said to the chief priests and captains of the temple, who commanded the several orders of priests, and therefore are here put between the chief priests and the elders; so that they were all ecclesiastics, retainers to the temple, who were employed in this odious piece of service; and some of the first rank too disparaged themselves so far as to be seen in it.

See here, 1. How Christ reasons with them concerning their proceedings. What occasion was there for them to come out in the dead of the night, and with swords and staves? (1.) They knew He was one who would not resist, or raise the mob against them. He never had done it. Why then are ye come out as against a thief? (2.) They knew He was one that would not abscond, for He was daily with them in the temple, in the midst of them, and never sought to conceal Himself, nor did they offer to lay hands on Him.

2. How He reconciles Himself to their proceedings; this we had not before; 'But this is your hour, and the power of darkness. How hard soever it may seem that I should be thus exposed, I submit, for so it is determined; this is the hour allowed you to have your will against Me, there is an hour appointed Me to reckon for it. Now the power of darkness, Satan, ruler of the darkness of this world, is permitted to do his worst, to bruise the heel of the Seed of the woman, and I resolve to acquiesce; let him do his worst. The Lord shall laugh at him, for He sees that his day, his hour, is coming,' Ps. 37: 13. Let this quiet us under the prevalence of the church's enemies; let it quiet us in a dying hour, that it is but an hour that is permitted for the triumph of our adversary, a short time, a limited time. It is their appointed hour, in which they are permitted to try their strength, that Omnipotence may be the more glorified in their fall. But the power of darkness must give way to the Prince of light. Christ was willing to wait for his triumphs till his warfare was accomplished, and we must be so too.

V. 54—62. Here is the melancholy story of Peter's denying his Master, but notice is not taken here, as in the other evangelists, of Christ's being now on his examination before the high priest, but only of his being brought into the high priest's house, v. 54. But the manner of expression is observable; they took Him, and led Him, and brought Him; like that concerning Saul, (1 Sam. 15: 3.) He is gone about, and passed on, and gone down; and intimates that, even when they had seized their prey, they were in confusion, and, for fear of the people, or, rather, struck with inward terror upon what they had seen and heard, they took Him the furtherest way about, or, rather, knew not which way they hurried Him. Observe.

1. Peter's fall. 1. He followed Christ when led away prisoner, and showed a concern for his Master, which was well; but he followed afar off, that he might be out of danger. He thought to trim the matter; to follow Christ, and so satisfy his conscience, but to follow afar off, and so save his reputation, and sleep in safety. 2. He kept his distance still, and associated himself with the high priest's servants, when he should have been at his Master's elbow. 3. His fall itself was, disclaiming all acquaintance with Christ, and relation to Him, disowning Him because He was now in distress and danger. He was charged by a simple maid belonging to the house, with being a retainer to this Jesus, about whom there was now so much noise. She looked justly upon him as he sat by the fire, only because he was a stranger, and one whom she had not seen before; and concluding that at this time of night there were no neutrals there, and knowing him not to be any of the retinue of the high priest, she concludes him to be one of the retinue of this Jesus; or perhaps she had some time or other looked about in the temple, and seen Jesus there, and Peter with Him, and remembered him; and this man was with Him, saith she. And Peter, as he had not the courage to own the charge, so he had not the wit and presence of mind to turn it off, as he might have done many ways, and therefore flatly and plainly denies it; Woman, I know Him not. 4. His fall was repeated a second time; (v. 58.) After a little while, before he had time to recollect himself, another saw him, and said, Even thou art one of them, slyly as thou sittest here among the high priest's servants. Not I, saith Peter, man, I am not. And a third time, about the space of an hour after, another confidently affirms, strenuously asserts it, Of a truth this fellow also was with Him, let him deny it if he can, for you may all perceive he is a Galilean. But he that has once told a lie, is constantly tempted to persist in it; the beginning of that sin is as the letting forth of water. Peter now not only denies that he is a disciple of Christ, but that he knows any thing of Him, v. 60. I never heard of this Jesus.

II. Peter's rising again. See how happily he recovered himself, or, rather, the grace of God recovered him.

1. The cock crew, just as he was the third time denying that he knew Christ; this startled him, and put him upon thinking. Note, Small accidents may have great influences.

I tell you, he will not believe:

68 And if I also ask you, ye will not answer me, nor let me go.

69 Hereafter ^t shall the Son of man sit ^u on the right hand of the power of God.

70 Then said they all, Art thou then ^v the Son of God? And he said unto them, ^w Ye say that I am.

2. The Lord turned, and looked on him. This circumstance we had not in the other evangelists, but it is a very remarkable one. Christ is here called the Lord, for there was much of divine knowledge, power, and grace, appearing in this. Observe, Though Christ had now his back on Peter, and was on his trial, (when, one would think, He had something else to mind,) yet He knew all that Peter said. Note, Christ takes more notice of what we say and do than we think; when Peter disowned Christ, Christ did not disown Him, though He might justly, and never looked on him more, but denied him before his Father. It is well for us that Christ does not deal with us as we deal with Him. Christ looked on Peter, not doubting but that Peter would soon be aware of it, for He knew that, though he had denied Him with his lips, yet his eye would still be toward Him. Observe, Though Peter had now been guilty of a very great offence, and which was very provoking, yet Christ would not call to him, lest He should shame him or expose him; He only gave him a look which none but Peter would understand the meaning of, and it had a great deal in it. (1.) It was a convincing look. Peter said he did not know Christ. Christ turned, and looked on him, as if He should say, Dost thou not know Me, Peter? Look Me in the face, and tell Me so. (2.) It was a chiding look. Let us think with what a countenance Christ looks on us when we have sinned. (3.) It was an expostulating, upbraiding look. What, Peter, disownest thou Me now, when thou shouldst come and witness for Me? What, thou a disciple? Thou that wast the most forward to confess Me to be the Son of God, and didst solemnly promise thou wouldst never disown Me? (4.) It was a compassionate look: He looked on him with tenderness; Poor Peter, how weak is thine heart! How art thou fallen and undone, if I do not help thee! (5.) It was a directing look. Christ guided him with his eye, gave him a wink to go out from that sorry company, to retire, and bethink himself a little, and then he would soon see what he had to do. (6.) It was a significant look: it signified the conveying of grace to Peter's heart, to enable him to repent; the crowing of the cock would not have done it without this look, nor will external means ever bring any to repentance without special, efficacious grace. Power went along with this look, to change the heart of Peter, and to bring him to himself, to his right mind.

3. Peter remembered the words of the Lord. Note, The grace of God works in and by the Word of God, brings that to mind, sets it home Man, &c.) A maid challenged Peter, in the second instance, according to Matthew and Mark; yet he here answers to a man. But Matthew writes, 'She said to them that were there;' and Mark, 'She began to say to them that stood by.' So that the maid gave the information to those around her, and some man charged Peter with it. Perhaps several joined, though he answered to one in particular, for John writes, 'They said unto him,' &c. How must these people have been surprised, when they saw (as no doubt some of them did) this timorous disciple, within the compass of a few weeks, when he was brought with John before the council, not only maintaining the honor of Jesus, but charging the murder of 'the Prince of life' on the chief men of the nation, and warning them of their guilt and danger in consequence of it. (Matt. 26:57-68. 27:1, 2. Mark 14:65.) From the narrative of the two preceding evangelists, it appears that, after the council had condemned Jesus, they separated, and met again early in the morning; and the words here used, 'As soon as it was day,' &c. seem to refer to this latter meeting. Nor is it improbable, the high priests had again put the same questions to our Lord, as he had done the night before, both to see whether He would stand to what He had said, and that such members of the council, as had been absent, might hear his answers. (66.) As soon as it was day, &c. 'Sentences were pronounced as they stood in the day time.'

HORNE.

CHAP. XXIII.

Jesus is accused before Pilate, who sends him to Herod, 1-7. He is silent before Herod, who mocks him and sends him back, 8-11. Pilate and Herod are made friends, 12. Pilate, convinced of the innocence of Jesus, is yet prevailed on by clamour to give him up to crucifixion, and to release Barabbas, 13-25. Jesus is led away, Simon of Cyrene bearing his cross, 26. To the women and others who bewailed him, He predicts the calamities coming on the Jews, 27-31. He is crucified between two thieves, and prays for his murderers, 32-34. The people, rulers, priests, and soldiers, and one of the thieves, scoff at him, 35-38. The other thief rebukes his companion, and confesses Christ, who promises that he shall "that day be with him in paradise," 39-43. The land is darkened, the veil of the temple rent, and Jesus, commending his spirit into the hand of his Father, expires, 44-46. The centurion confesses him; and the people with his acquaintance retire, emitting their breaths at what they had seen, 47-49. Joseph of Arimathea asks for the body, and buries it, 50-54. The women prepare spices; but rest on the Sabbath, according to the commandment, 55, 56.

AND the whole multitude of them arose, and led him unto Pilate.

2 And they began to accuse him, saying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying, 'That he himself is Christ a King.'

Him to own it to them, v. 67. Had they asked him this question with a willingness to admit that He was the Christ, and to receive Him accordingly, if He could give sufficient proof of his being so, it had been well, and might have been forever well with them; but they asked it with a resolution not to believe Him, nay, a design to insnare Him.

2. He justly complained of their unfair and unjust usage, v. 67, 68. They all, as Jews, professed to expect the Messiah, and at this time; no other had appeared as the Messiah; He had no competitor, nor was He likely to have any; He had given amazing proofs of a divine power attending Him, which made his claims very well worthy of a free and impartial inquiry; it had been but just for these leaders of the people, to have taken Him into their council, and examined Him there as a candidate for the Messiahship, not at the bar as a criminal; 'But,' saith He, (1.) 'If I give you ever such convincing proofs that I am the Christ, you are resolved not to believe. Why should the cause be brought on before you, who have already prejudged it, and are resolved, right or wrong, to run it down, and condemn it?' (2.) 'If I ask you what you have to object against the proofs I produce, you will not answer Me.' Here He refers to their silence when He put a question to them, which would have led them to own his authority, ch. 20: 5-7. They were neither fair judges, upon the conscience, and so gives the soul the happy turn. Take it up, and read.

4. Peter went out, and wept bitterly. One look from Christ melted him into tears of godly sorrow for sin. The candle was newly put out, so a little thing lighted it again. Christ looked on the chief priests, and made no impression on them as He did on Peter, who had the divine seed remaining in him to work upon. It was not the look, but the grace of God with it, that recovered Peter.

V. 63-71. We are here told, as in the other gospels,

I. How our Lord Jesus was abused by the servants of the high priest. The objects gathered themselves together against Him, the rude and barbarous servants. They that held Jesus, that had Him in custody till the court set, mocked and smote Him, v. 63. They would not allow Him to repose Himself one minute, though He had had no sleep all night, nor to compose Himself, though He was hurried to his trial, and no time given Him to prepare for it. They made sport with Him; as Samson's enemies with him. They hood-winked Him, and then, according to the common play among young people, they struck Him on the face, till He named the person that smote Him, (v. 64.) intending thereby an affront to his prophetic office, and that knowledge of secret things, which He was said to have. We are not told that He said any thing, but bore every thing; hell was let loose, and He suffered it to do its worst. A greater indignity could not be done to the blessed Jesus, yet this was but one of many, v. 65. They that condemned Him for a blasphemer, were themselves the vilest blasphemers.

II. How He was accused and condemned by the sanhedrim, consisting of the elders, the chief priests, and the scribes, who were all up betimes, and got together as soon as it was day, about five o'clock in the morning, to prosecute this matter. They were working this evil on their beds, and, as soon as ever the morning was light, practised it, Mic. 2: 1. They would not have been up so early for any good work.

1. They ask Him, Art Thou the Christ? He was generally believed by his followers to be the Christ, but they could not prove He ever said so in so many words, and therefore urge Him to own it to them, v. 67. Had they asked him this question with a willingness to admit that He was the Christ, and to receive Him accordingly, if He could give sufficient proof of his being so, it had been well, and might have been forever well with them; but they asked it with a resolution not to believe Him, nay, a design to insnare Him.

V. 47-71. Our supineness often exposes us to rebukes and chastenings: yet sometimes our impenitent zeal betrays us into dishonorable mistakes, even as does our timidity at others. For corrupt nature still counteracts the tendency of grace, and warps our conduct to opposite extremes: we should therefore ask, and wait for, the Lord's directions, before we act in difficult circumstances. He will, however, prevent the most fatal consequences of our errors, provided our hearts be upright: yet when we contrast his temper and conduct with our own, we shall always see much to admire, and much to be ashamed of.—Neither the displays of his power, nor those of his love, can intimidate or soften hardened unbelievers; for such men could treat the divine Savior, as if He had been nor fair disputants but, when pinched with an argument, would rather be silent than own their conviction, 'If I be not the Christ, you ought to answer the arguments with which I prove that I am; if I be, you ought to let Me go; but you will do neither.'

3. He referred them to his second coming for full proof of his being the Christ, to their confusion, since they would not now admit the proof of it, to their conviction, v. 69. 'Then you will not need to ask whether He be the Christ or no.'

4. Hence they inferred that He set up Himself as the Son of God, and asked Him what? He was so or no, v. 7. He called Himself the Son of man, referring to Daniel's vision of the Son of man that came near before the Ancients of days, Dan. 7: 13, 14. But they understood so much as to know that if He was that Son of man, He was also the Son of God. And art Thou so? By this it appears to have been the faith of the Jewish church, that the Messiah should be both Son of man, and Son of God.

5. He owns Himself to be the Son of God; 'Ye say that I am; that is, 'I am, as ye say.' Compare Mark 14: 62. This confirms Christ's testimony of Himself, that He was the Son of God, that He affirmed it, when He knew He should suffer for so doing.

6. On this they ground his condemnation, v. 71. True, they needed no further witness to prove that He said He was the Son of God, they had it from his own mouth; but did they not need proof that He was not so, before they condemned Him as a Blasphemer for saying that He was so? Had they no apprehension that it was possible He might be so, and then what horrid guilt they should bring on themselves in putting Him to death? No, they know not, neither will they understand. They cannot think it possible He should be the Messiah, though ever so evidently clothed with divine power and grace, if He appear not, as they expect, in worldly pomp and grandeur. Their eyes being blinded with the admiration of that, they rush on in this dangerous prosecution, as the horse into the battle.

CHAP. XXIII. v. 1-12. Our Lord was condemned as a blasphemer in the spiritual court, but that court was actuated by the most impotent malice; for when condemned, they knew they could not put Him to death, and therefore,

I. They accuse Him before Pilate. The revolt arose, when they saw they could go no further with Him in their court, led Him to Pilate, though it was no judgment day, and demanded justice against Him, not as a blasphemer, (he took no cognizance of that crime,) but as one disaffected to the Roman government; which they in their hearts did not consider a crime, if it was, they were much more chargeable with it than He; only it would answer the purpose of their malice: and it is observable, that the pretended crime, for which they employed the Roman powers to destroy Christ, was the real crime, for which the Roman powers not long after destroyed them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 47-71. Our supineness often exposes us to rebukes and chastenings: yet sometimes our impenitent zeal betrays us into dishonorable mistakes, even as does our timidity at others. For corrupt nature still counteracts the tendency of grace, and warps our conduct to opposite extremes: we should therefore ask, and wait for, the Lord's directions, before we act in difficult circumstances. He will, however, prevent the most fatal consequences of our errors, provided our hearts be upright: yet when we contrast his temper and conduct with our own, we shall always see much to admire, and much to be ashamed of.—Neither the displays of his power, nor those of his love, can intimidate or soften hardened unbelievers; for such men could treat the divine Savior, as if He had been a thief or a robber, even when He was working his gracious miracles before their eyes, nay, when healing their wounds! But their hour, and that of 'the power of darkness,' was of short continuance; and such will always be 'the triumphing of the wicked.'—To whatever part of the scene before us we turn our thoughts, we shall see proofs of the Redeemer's excellency, and of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart: but especially let us contemplate Him, amidst all the insults and cruelties which He meekly endured, looking with compassion on his fallen disciple; that we too may be excited to call our own sins to remembrance, and to renew 'that godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of.'

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. v. 1-5. (2.) Began to accuse. 'The judicial authority properly rested with the president; though the procurator, (as was Pilate) had the office of collecting the taxes. But it seems that in the smaller provinces, (like Judea,) which were not of sufficient consequence to have a president, "the collector of taxes discharged also the judicial functions of the president." We found, "A judicial expression, intimating that they had brought him, as one convicted of guilt after diligent examination," Schleusner. This charge, if proved, would have exposed him to inevitable death; for never were prosecutions for treason more severe than under the reign of Tiberius. A charge of high treason, says Tacitus, was, at that time, an accumulation of all (possible) charges.'

which they pretend zeal for Cæsar, only to ingratiate themselves with Pilate, yet it was all nothing but malice against Christ. They misrepresented Him, (1.) As making the people rebel against Cæsar. Pilate knew that there was a general uneasiness in the people under the Roman yoke, who wanted nothing but an opportunity to shake it off; they would have him believe this Jesus was active to foment that general discontent they themselves were in truth exciting; We found Him perverting the nation; as if converting them to God's government; whereas nothing tends more to make men good subjects than making them Christ's faithful followers. Christ taught particularly that they ought to give tribute to Cæsar, though He knew many would be offended at Him for it; yet He is here falsely accused, as forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar. Innocence is no protection against calumny. (2.) As making Him own a Rival with Cæsar, though they would not own Him to be the Messiah, for the very reason that He did not appear in worldly pomp and power, as a temporal prince, nor attempt any thing against Cæsar; yet they charged Him with it. He said, He Himself is Christ a King. He did say He was Christ, and if so, a King, but not a king likely to disturb Cæsar. When his followers would have made Him a king, (John 6: 15.) He declined it, though his many miracles proved his power to be infinitely superior to that of Cæsar.

2. His pleading to the indictment; to Pilate's question, Art Thou the King of the Jews? (v. 3.) He answered, Thou sayest it; that is, 'It is as thou sayest, I am entitled to the government of the Jewish nation: but in rivalry with the scribes and Pharisees, not with Cæsar, whose government relates only to their civil interests.' Christ's kingdom is wholly spiritual, and will not interfere with Cæsar's jurisdiction.

3. Pilate's declaration of his innocence; (v. 4.) He said to the chief priests, and the people that seemed to join in the prosecution, 'I find no fault in this man. What breaches of your law He may have been guilty of, I am not concerned to inquire, but I find nothing proved on Him, that makes Him obnoxious to our court.'

4. The continued fury of the prosecutors, v. 5. Instead of being moderated by Pilate's declaration of his innocence, and considering, as they ought, whether they were not bringing the guilt of innocent blood on themselves, they were the more exceeding fierce. We do not find they have any particular fact to produce, much less any evidence to prove it; but they resolve to carry it with noise and confidence, and say it, though they cannot prove it; He stirs up the people to rebel against Cæsar, teaching throughout all Judea, beginning from Galilee to this place. He did stir up the people, though not to faction or sedition, but to virtue. He did teach, but they could not charge Him with teaching any doctrine that tended to disturb the public peace, or make the government uneasy or jealous.

II. They accuse Him before Herod.

1. The accusers mentioned Galilee, the northern part of Canaan. 'Why,' saith Pilate, 'Is He a Galilean?' v. 6. 'Yes,' said they, 'that is his head-quarters.' 'Let us send Him to Herod then,' saith Pilate, 'for Herod is now in town, and it is but fit he should have cognizance of his cause, since He belongs to Herod's jurisdiction.' Pilate was already desirous to be rid of the cause, seemingly his true reason for sending Him to Herod. But God ordered it so for the more evident fulfilling of Scripture, see Acts 4: 26, 27, where that of David, (Ps. 2: 2.) The kings of the earth and the rulers see themselves against the Lord and his anointed, is expressly said to be fulfilled in Herod and Pontius Pilate.

2. Herod was very willing to examine Him. (v. 9.) and perhaps the more so because he saw Him a prisoner. He had heard many things of Him in Galilee, where his miracles had for a great while been all the talk; and he longed to see Him, not from a y affection for Him or his doctrine, but purely out of curiosity; as he hoped to see some miracle done by Him which would serve Him to talk of as long as He lived. To this end, he questioned with Him in many things, that at length he might bring Him to something in which He might show his power. Perhaps he questioned Him concerning things secret, or things to come, or his curing of diseases. But Jesus answered him nothing; nor would He gratify him so much as with the repetition of one miracle. The poorest beggar, that asked a miracle for the relief of his necessity, was never denied; but this proud prince, that asked a miracle merely to gratify his curiosity, is denied; he might often have seen Christ and his wondrous works in Galilee, and would not; therefore it is justly said, Now he would see them, and shall not; they are hid from his eyes, because he knew not the day of his visitation. Herod thought, now he had Him in bonds, he might command a miracle, but miracles must not be made cheap, nor Omnipotence be at the beck of the greatest potentate.

3. His prosecutors appeared against Him before Herod, for they were restless in the prosecution; They vehemently accused Him, (v. 10.) impudently and boldly, so it signifies. They would make Herod believe He had poisoned Galilee too with his seditious notions. Note, It is no new thing for good men and good ministers, who are real and useful friends to the civil government, to be falsely accused as factious and seditious, and enemies to government.

4. Herod, with his attendants, and officers, and great men, was very abusive to Him. They made nothing of Him; so the word is. Horrid wickedness! To make nothing of Him who made all things. They laughed at Him as a fool; He had wrought many miracles to befriend others, and why not now work one to befriend Himself? Or, they laughed at Him as one who had lost his power, and was become weak as other men. Herod, who had been acquainted with John Baptist, and had more knowledge of Christ too, than Pilate had, was more abusive to Christ than Pilate was; for knowledge without grace, does but make me; the more ingeniously wicked. Herod arrayed Christ in a gorgeous robe, some gaudy, painted clothes, as a mocking; and so taught Pilate's soldiers afterwards to do Him the same indignity.

5. Herod returned Him to Pilate, and it proved an occasion of making them friends, they having been for some time at variance. Herod could not get sight of a miracle, but would not condemn Him neither as a malefactor, and therefore sent Him again to Pilate, (v. 11.) and this, with the messages that passed between them, brought them to a better understanding. They had been at enmity between themselves, (v. 12.) probably on Pilate's killing the Galileans, who were Herod's subjects, (Luke 13: 1.) on some such matter of controversy as usually oc-

(5.) Stirreth up, &c. Probably they referred to his public entrance into the city a few days before, to which Pilate could not be a stranger: and to his teaching at the temple, in contempt of their authority. Certain impostors had before this arisen in Galilee, and given the Romans considerable trouble; for which cause the rulers probably supposed Pilate would have been more jealous of Jesus: (13: 1, 2.) but that governor well understood the difference between armed forces and our Lord's inoffensive followers; who were formidable to nothing, but the hypocrisy and ambition of the scribes, priests, and Pharisees.

15 No, nor yet Herod; for I sent you to him; and, lo, nothing worthy of death is done unto him:

16 I will therefore chastise him, and release him.

18 And they cried out all at once, saying, 'Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas:

20 Pilate therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again to them.

curs among princes and great men. Observe how those that quarrelled with one another, yet could unite against Christ; as Gehal and Ammon, and Amalek, though divided among themselves, were confederate against the Israel of God, Ps. 83:7. Christ is the great Peace-Maker; both Pilate and Herod owned his innocency, and their agreeing in that cured their disagreeing in other things.

V. 13—25. Here,

I. Pilate solemnly protests that he believes Jesus has done nothing worthy of death or bonds. He ought then immediately to have discharged Him; nor only so, but to have protected Him from the fury of the priests and rabble, and to have bound his prosecutors to their good behavior for their insolent conduct. But, being himself a bad man, he had no kindness for Christ; and having made himself otherwise obnoxious, was afraid of displeasing either the emperor or the people; and therefore, for want of integrity, he called together the chief priests, and rulers and people, and will hear what they have to say, to whom he should have turned a deaf ear, for he plainly saw what spirit actuated them, v. 14.

II. He appeals to Herod concerning Him; (v. 15.) 'I sent you to him, who is supposed to have known more of Him than I, and he has sent Him back, not convicted of any thing, nor under any mark of his displeasure; in his opinion his crimes are not capital. He has laughed at Him as a weak man, but has not stigmatized Him as a dangerous man.'

III. He purposes to release Him, with their consent. He ought to have done it without. The fear of man brings many into this snare, that, whereas justice should take place, though heaven and earth come together, they will do an unjust thing, against their consciences. So Pilate declares Him innocent, and has a mind to release Him; yet, to please the people, 1. He will release Him as a malefactor, because of necessity he must release one, v. 17. 2. He will chastise Him, and release Him. Why so, if no fault be to be found in Him? There is as much injustice in scourging as in crucifying an innocent man; nor would it be justified by pretending that this would satisfy the clamors of the people, and make Him, who was now the chastise him, and let him go.

23 And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified: and the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed.

24 And Pilate gave sentence, that it should be as they required.

25 And he released unto them him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired; but he delivered Jesus to their will.

26 ¶ And as they led him away, they laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus.

object of their envy, the object of their pity. We must not do evil that good may come.

IV. The people chose rather to have Barabbas released; a wretched fellow, that had no claim to their favor but the dangerousness of his crimes, sedition, and murder; (of all crimes the least pardonable;) yet this criminal was preferred before Christ, v. 18, 19. No wonder such a man is the darling of such a mob.

V. When Pilate again urged Christ's release they cried out, Crucify Him, crucify Him, v. 20, 21. They not only will have Him die, but die so great a death.

VI. When Pilate the third time reasoned with them, to show them the unreasonableness and injustice of it, they were the more peremptory and outrageous; (v. 22.) 'Why? What evil hath He done? Name his crime. I have found no cause of death, and you cannot say what cause of death you have found in Him; therefore speak the word, and I will chastise Him, and let Him go.' But popular fury grows more furious, the more it is complimented; they were instant with loud voices, with great noises or outcries, not requesting, but requiring that He might be crucified; as if they had as much right, at the feast, to demand the crucifying of one that was innocent, as the release of one that was guilty.

VII. Pilate yields, at length, to their importunity. The voice of the people and chief priests prevailed, and overruled him to act contrary to his convictions and inclinations. He had not courage to stem so strong a stream, but gave sentence as they required, v. 24. Here is judgment turned away backward, and justice standing afar off, for fear of popular fury. Barabbas would thus be hardened in wickedness, and do the more mischief, yet him he released; but he delivered Jesus to their will; and he could not deal more barbarously with Him than to deliver Him to their will, who hated Him with a perfect hatred, and whose tender mercies were cruelty.

V. 26—31. The Lamb of God is here led as a lamb to the slaughter, to the sacrifice. With what expedition they went through his trial! How could they do so much in so little time! having so many great men to deal with, attendance on whom is usually a work of time. He

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Envy, malice, cruelty, and calumny, are combined in the character of the 'seed of the serpent,' who hate and persecute 'the seed of the woman.' No prudence or harmlessness, can secure from their enmity and slander: yet an unexceptionable conduct may drive them into such egregious arduities and palpable falsehoods, as expose their malignity. The Lord conducts all his great designs to a glorious event, by means of those who are following the evil devices of their own hearts. Thus all parties concurred in proving the 'immaculate innocence' of our atoning Sacrifice. (Matt. 27:24, 25.) There are lengths to which even very wicked men are reluctant to proceed, especially without what appears an adequate advantage: yet while restrained by inward terror from some crimes, they are kept from actions they cannot but approve, by fear of their fellow-creatures, even inferiors! Profligate professors of religion are commonly more hardened than open idolaters; and are entitled to less regard. Our Lord would take no notice of Herod, a man who had committed most enormous wickedness, (Mark 6:14—22.) against his conscience. How careful should men be, then, not to provoke God to give them up, as Herod, (v. 11.) to final infatuation and insensibility! As the enmities of the wicked are often excited about the veriest trifles, so their friendships are sometimes grounded on the basest combinations of wickedness, or spring from coincidence in vicious disposition and pursuits. Frequently they agree in little except enmity to God and contempt of Christ and his cause: death, then, will soon terminate their amity, and perfect hatred be their final temper and portion. (P. O. Matt. 27:1—25. Mark 15:1—26.) SCOTT.

ing their lamentations; Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me. Not that they were to be blamed for it, but commended rather; those hearts were hard indeed, that were not affected with such sufferings of such a Person; but they must not weep only profitless tears for Him, but rather, for themselves and children, with an eye to the destruction coming on Jerusalem, which some of them might live to see, and share in the calamities of, or, at least, their children would. Note, When with an eye of faith we behold Christ crucified, we ought to weep, not for Him, but for ourselves. We must not be affected with the death of Christ, as with the death of a common person whose calamity we pity, or of a common friend whom we are likely to part with; the death of Christ was a thing peculiar, it was his victory and triumph over his enemies, it was our deliverance, and the purchase of eternal life for us. Therefore weep not for Him, but let us weep for our own and our children's sins, that were the cause of his death; and weep for fear (the tears here prescribed) of the miseries we shall bring on ourselves, if we slight his love, and reject his grace, as the Jewish nation did, which brought on them the ruin here foretold. When dear relations and friends die in Christ, we have no reason to weep for them who have put off the burden of the flesh, are made perfect in holiness, and are entered into perfect rest and joy, but for ourselves and children, left behind in a world of sins, and sorrows, and snares.

2. A particular reason why they should weep for themselves and children; 'For behold, sad times are coming on your city, it will be destroyed, and you will be involved in the common destruction.' When Christ's own disciples sorrowed after a godly sort for his leaving them, He wiped away their tears with the promise that He would see them again, and they should rejoice, John 16: 22. But when these daughters of Jerusalem bewailed Him only with a worldly sorrow, He turned their tears into another channel, and told them they should have something to weep for. Let them be afflicted, and mourn, and weep, Jam. 4: 9. He had lately wept over Jerusalem Himself, now He bids them weep over it. Christ's tears should set us to weeping. Let the daughters of Zion, that own Christ for their King, rejoice in Him, for He comes to save them; but let the daughters of Jerusalem, that only weep for Him, but do not take Him for their King, weep and tremble to think of his coming to judge them.

The destruction of Jerusalem is here foretold by two proverbial sayings, then fully used, both bespeaking it very terrible, that what people commonly dread they would then desire, to be written childless, and to be buried alive. (1.)

was brought before the chief priests at day-break, (ch. 22: 66.) after that to Pilate, then to Herod, then to Pilate again; between whom and the people there seems to have been a long struggle about Him. He was scourged, crowned with thorns, and contumeliously used, all in four or five hours, or six at most, for He was crucified between nine o'clock and twelve. Christ's persecutors resolve to lose no time, for fear his friends should get notice of their doings, and rise to rescue Him. Never was any one so chased out of the world as Christ, but so He Himself said, Yet a little while, and ye shall not see Me; a very little while indeed.

As they led Him to death we find,

1. A bearer, that carried his cross, Simon, who, probably, was a friend of Christ, and known to be so, and this was done to put a reproach on Him; they laid Christ's cross on him, that he might bear it after Jesus, (v. 26.) lest Jesus should faint under it and die away, and so prevent the further instances of malice they designed. A cruel pity that gave Him this ease.

II. Many true mourners, who followed, bewailing and lamenting Him. Not only of his friends and well-wishers, but the common people, (not his enemies,) moved with compassion, because they had heard his fame, and what an excellent, useful Man He was, and had reason to think He suffered unjustly; this drew a great crowd after Him; A great company followed, especially of women; (v. 27.) some led by pity, others by curiosity, but they also (as well as his particular friends and acquaintance) bewailed and lamented Him. Though many reproached and reviled, yet some valued and pitied Him, and were partakers in his sufferings. The dying of the Lord Jesus may move natural affections in many that are strangers to devout affections; many bewail Christ, that do not believe in, and lament Him, that do not love Him above all.

Though one would think Christ should be wholly taken up with his own concern, yet He found time and heart to take cognizance of their tears. He turned to them, though strangers, and diverts their lamentation, v. 28.

1. He gives them a general direction concerning

To be written childless. Commonly those that have no children, envy those that have, as Rachel envied Leah. Then those that have children, will find them such a burden in attempting to escape, and such a grief when they see them either fainting for famine, or falling by the sword, that they will envy those that have none, and say, Blessed are the barren, that have no children to be given up to the murderer, or to be snatched out of his hands. It would not only go ill with those who at that time were written child, or giving suck, (Matt. 24: 19,) but be terrible to those who had children now alive. See Hos. 9: 11-14. See the vanity of the creature and the uncertainty of its comforts, for such may be the changes of Providence concerning us, that those very things may become the greatest burdens, cares, and griefs, which we have delighted in as the greatest blessings. (2.) To be buried alive, v. 30. This also refers to a passage in the same prophecy with the former, Hos. 10: 8. They shall wish to be hid in the darkest caves, [with which Palestine abounded,] to be out of the noise of these calamities; will be willing to be sheltered, even with the hazard of being crushed. This would be the language of the great and mighty especially, Rev. 6: 16. They that would not flee to Christ for protection, will in vain call to hills and mountains to shelter them from his wrath.

3. He shows how naturally they might infer that desolation from his sufferings, v. 31. Some think this borrowed from Ezek. 20: 47. The fire shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree. The words may be applied, (1.) More particularly to the destruction of Jerusalem; 'If they (the Jews and the inhabitants of Jerusalem) do these things upon the green tree, that is, thus abuse an innocent and excellent person for his good works, how may they expect God to deal with them for their so doing, who have made themselves a dry tree, a corrupt and wicked generation, and good for nothing! If this be their sin, what think you will be their punishment?' Or take it thus; 'If they (the Romans, their judges, and soldiers) abuse Me thus, who have given them no provocation, who am to them as a green tree, what will they do by Jerusalem and the Jewish nation, who will be so very provoking to them, and make themselves as a dry tree, as fuel to the fire of their resentments! If God suffer those things to be done to Me, what will He appoint to be done to those barren trees, of whom it hath been often said, that they should be hewn down and cast into the fire?' Matt. 3: 10. 7: 19. (2.) They may be applied more generally to all the revelations of God's wrath against sin and sinners; 'If God deliver Me up to these sufferings because I am made a Sacrifice for sin, what will He do with sinners themselves?' Christ was a green Tree, fruitful and flourishing; now if such things were done to Him, we may thence infer what should have been done to the whole race of mankind, if He had not interposed, and what shall be done to those that continue dry trees, notwithstanding all that is done to make them fruitful. If God did this to the Son of his love, when He found but sin imputed to Him, what shall He do to the generation of his wrath, when He finds sin reigning in them? Note, The consideration of the bitter sufferings of our Lord Jesus should engage us to stand in awe of the justice of God, and to tremble before Him. The best saints, compared with Christ, are dry trees; if He suffer, why may not they expect to suffer? And what then shall the damnation of sinners be?

as two others, malefactors, led with him to be put to death.

33 And *when they were come to the place which is called *Calvary, there ^bthey crucified him, and the malefactors: one on the right hand, and the other on the left.

34 Then said Jesus, *Father, forgive them; for ^cthey know not what they do. *And they parted his raiment, and cast lots.

35 And ^dthe people stood beholding: and the rulers also with them ^ederided him, saying, He saved others; let him save himself, if he be ^fChrist, the chosen of God.

36 And the soldiers also ^gmocked him, coming to him, and offering him vinegar, prosecution of Christ, that one solemnity might serve.

2. He was crucified at a place called [in Latin] Calvary, [in Greek] Cranion, for Golgotha—the place of a skull: an ignominious place, to add to the reproach of his sufferings, but significant, for there He triumphed over death, in his own domain. He was crucified; his hands and feet were nailed to the cross as it lay on the ground; and then it was lifted up, and fastened into the earth, or some socket to receive it. This was a painful and shameful death above any other.

3. He was crucified between two thieves, as if the worst of the three; thus He was not only treated as a transgressor, but numbered with them, the worst of them.

4. The soldiers employed seized his garments as their fee, and divided them among themselves by lot; They parted his raiment, and cast lots.

5. He was reviled, reproached, and treated with all scorn and contempt, when lifted up. Strange that so much barbarity should be found in the human nature; The people stood beholding, not at all concerned, but rather pleasing themselves with the spectacle; and the rulers, whom from their office one would take to be men of sense and honor, stood among the rabble, and derided Him, to set those about them to do so too; and they said, He saved others, let Him save Himself. Thus is He upbraided for the good works He had done, as if it were indeed for these that they crucified Him. They triumph over Him as if conquered by them, whereas He was Himself then more than a conqueror; they challenge Him to save Himself from the cross, when He was saving others by the cross; If He be the Christ, the chosen of God, let Him save Himself. They knew that the Christ is the chosen of God; designed by Him, and dear to Him. If He, as the Christ, would deliver our nation from the Romans, (and they could not form any other idea of the Messiah,) let Him now deliver Himself from the Romans. Thus the Jewish rulers jeered Him as captivated by the Romans, instead of subduing them. The Roman soldiers jeered Him as the King of the Jews; 'A people good enough for such a prince, and a prince good enough for such a people.' They mocked Him, (v. 36, 37.) made sport with Him, and a jest of his sufferings; and when drinking sharp, sour wine themselves, such as was generally allotted them, they triumphantly asked Him to pledge them, or drink with them.

6. The superscription over his head, setting forth his crime, was, This is the king of the Jews, v. 38. He is put to death for pretending to be the king of the Jews; so they meant it; but God intended it to be a declaration of what He really was; He is the King of the Jews, the King of the church. This was written in those called the three learned languages, the Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, those are best learned, that have learned Christ. It was written in these three languages, that it might be known and read of all men; but God designed by it to signify that the Gospel of Christ should be preached to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, and be read in all languages. The Gentile philosophy made the Greek tongue famous, the Roman laws and government, the Latin; and the Hebrew excelled them all for the sake of the Old Testament. In these three languages is Jesus Christ proclaimed King. Young scholars that are taking pains to master these three languages, should aim in the use of them to increase their acquaintance with Christ.

II. Two very remarkable passages here we had not before.

1. Christ's prayer for his enemies; (v. 34.) Father, forgive them. Seven remarkable words Christ spake after He was nailed to the cross; this is the first. One reason why He died this death was, that He might have liberty of speech to the last, and so glorify his Father, and edify those about Him. As soon as He was fastened to the cross, or while they were nailing Him, He prayed this prayer: in which, observe, the soldiers were nailing our Lord's hands and feet to the cross; in which extremity He seems to have been more concerned for the sin of his murderers, than for his own sufferings. The soldiers who crucified Him were primarily intended, whose guilt was far less heinous than that of the chief priests, or people, who had enjoyed fuller means of instruction. (John 19: 8, 12. v. 11.) Probably the soldiers immediately concerned, and many of the surrounding multitude also were saved in answer to this prayer; and in some sense it may be applied to every one who is justified by faith in his blood.

(34.) Malefactors, &c. These are by Matthew and Mark termed thieves, as Barabbas is by John. The Greek here denotes malefactors in general, not only highway robbers, or house-breakers, or pilferers, and also brigands, rebels, pirates, or any who carry on unauthorised hostilities. Nay, these were sometimes irregular troops, like the Spanish guerrillas, or the Russian zassacs, who carried on petty devastations, pillagers in regular war. To which of these classes Barabbas and these (See Mark 15: 7.) belonged, it is not possible exactly to determine; it seems probable they were lawless insurgents. They were men, says Malby, who had taken up arms on a principle of resistance to Roman oppression, especially the tribute money; though they made no scruple to rob all the Romans they met with; and when engaged in these unlawful courses, no doubt made afterwards less difference between Jews and Romans, than they at first meant to do.

(1.) The petition; Father, forgive them. One would think He should have prayed, 'Father, consume them; the Lord look on, and requite it.' Their sin might justly have been made unpardonable. No, these are particularly prayed for. Now He made intercession for transgressors, as was foretold, (Isa. 53: 12.) and it is to be added to his prayer, (John 17.) to complete the specimen He gave of his intercession within the veil; that for saints, this for sinners. But these sayings, as well as his sufferings, had a further reach than they seemed to have. This was a mediatorial word, explicatory of the intent and meaning of his death; 'Father, forgive—not only these, but all that shall repent, and believe the Gospel;' and He did not intend these should be forgiven on other terms. 'Father, I am now suffering and dying, that sinners may be pardoned.' Note, [1.] The great thing Christ died to purchase and procure for us, is the forgiveness of sin. [2.] This is what Christ intercedes for, for all that repent, and believe in the virtue of his satisfaction; his blood speaks this, Father, forgive them. [3.] The greatest sinners may, through Christ, on repentance, hope for mercy. Father, forgive them; though his persecutors and murderers.

(2.) The plea; They know not what they do, for, had they known, they would not have crucified Him, 1 Cor. 2: 8. A veil was on his glory and on their understandings; and how could they see through two veils? They wished his blood on them and their children; but had they known what they did, they would have unwished it. Note, [1.] The crucifiers of Christ know not what they do. They that speak ill of religion, speak ill of that which they know not, and it is because they will not know it. [2.] There is a kind of ignorance that in part excuses sin; ignorance through want of the means of knowledge, or of a capacity to receive instruction, or through the infelicities of education. The crucifiers of Christ were kept in ignorance by their rulers, and had prejudices against Him instilled into them, so that, in what they did against Christ and his doctrine, they thought they did God service, John 16: 2. Such are to be pitied and prayed for. Christ's prayer was not long after answered, when many of those that had a hand in his death, were converted by Peter's preaching.

This is written also for example to us. 1st. We must in prayer call God Father, and come to Him with reverence and confidence, as children to a father. 2dly. The great thing we must beg of God, both for ourselves and others, is the forgiveness of sins. 3dly. We must pray for our enemies, and those that hate and persecute us; must extenuate their offences, and not aggravate them, as we must our own; and we must be earnest with God in prayer for the forgiveness of their sins, even against us. This is Christ's example to his own rule, (Matt. 5: 44, 45.) Love your enemies; and it very much strengthens the rule, for if Christ loved and prayed for such enemies, what enemies can we have, which we are not obliged to love and pray for?

2. The conversion of the thief on the cross, an illustrious instance of Christ's triumphing over principalities and powers, and when He seemed to be triumphed over by them. In the two thieves were represented the different effects the cross of Christ would have on the children of men, to whom it would be brought near in the preaching of the Gospel. They are all malefactors, all guilty before God. Now the

(36.) Vinegar, &c. 'Pasca, a mixture of vinegar and water, a common drink for the Roman soldiers; not the medicated drink of wine and myrrh which was given to intoxicate and benumb, and which Jesus refused, because He would die undisturbed and unaided in his mind.'

Judas, and the preservation of Peter, erects this further trophy of his victory over him.

The case is extraordinary; observe,

[1.] The extraordinary operations of God's grace on him, apparent in what he said. More evidences of a blessed change wrought in him could not have been in a compass so little.

1st. See what He said to the other malefactor, v. 40, 41. 1. He reproved him as destitute of the fear of God, and having no sense of religion. This implies that the fear of God restrained him from following the multitude to do this evil, and all whose eyes are opened, see this to be at the bottom of the wickedness of the wicked, that they have not the fear of God before their eyes. 'I thou hast any humanity in thee, thou wouldst not insult over thy Fellow-sufferer; thou too art a dying man.' 2. He owns he deserved what was done to him; We indeed justly. Probably they both suffered for the same crime, and therefore he spake with the more assurance, we receive the due reward of our deeds. This magnifies divine grace, as acting in a distinguishing way. These two had been comrades in sin and suffering, yet one is saved, and the other perishes; yet now one is taken and the other left. He does not say, Thou indeed justly, but, We. Note, True penitents acknowledge the justice of God in all the punishments of their sin. 3. He believes Christ to have suffered wrongfully. Though condemned in two courts, and run upon as if He had been the worst of malefactors, yet this penitent thief is convinced, by his conduct in his sufferings, that He has done nothing amiss. The chief priest would have Him crucified between the malefactors, as one of them; but this thief owns He is none of them,—has done nothing absurd, or unbecoming his character. Whether he had before heard of Christ and his wondrous works does not appear, but the Spirit of grace enlightened him with this knowledge, and enabled him to say, This man has done nothing amiss.

Verses 39-43.

It is in itself improbable that both the malefactors reviled; especially as the penitent one neither confessed his own guilt in this particular, nor assigned any reason for so suddenly altering his opinion, when he rebuked the other. There is no proof that he was at all penitent, even when nailed to the cross. Most of what he had previously heard of Christ, must have been from his enemies; but being a Jew, he probably had some general knowledge of the prophecies concerning the Messiah, and might have heard reports of our Lord's doctrines and miracles. Knowing why Jesus was condemned, and witnessing his present conduct, (v. 34, &c.) he seems to have been led, under the immediate teaching of the Holy Spirit, to believe that He was the promised Messiah, 'the Son of God,' and 'King of Israel,' and perhaps to remember and understand, that He was to be a suffering Redeemer, and be 'led as a lamb to the slaughter.' Fearing God, conscious of deserving eternal condemnation, believing Jesus to be 'the Son of the living God,' and that He certainly would possess the promised kingdom, and have the disposal of eternal life and salvation, he humbly prays, 'remember me when Thou comest into thy kingdom.' Here was evidently the substance, or embryo, of all Christian graces 2dly. See what he said to our Lord, v. 42. A dying sinner to a dying Savior. It was the honor of Christ to be thus prayed to, though on the cross reproached and reviled; it was the happiness of the thief thus to pray; perhaps he never prayed before, and yet now was heard, and saved at the last gasp. While there is life, there is hope; and while there is hope, there is room for prayer.

1. Observe his faith. In his confession of sin, (v. 41,) he discovered repentance toward God; in this petition, faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. He owns Him to be the Lord, and to have a kingdom, and He was going to it that He should have authority in it, and tho those should be happy whom He favors; to believe and confess all which at that time was a great thing. Christ was now in the depth of disgrace, deserted by his own disciples, reviled by his own nation, suffering as a pretender, and not delivered by his Father. It was before those prodigies happened which put honor on his sufferings, and which startled the centurion; verily we have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. He believed another life after this, and desired to be happy in that life, not as the other thief, to be saved from the cross, but when the cross had done its worst.

2. Observe his humility. All his request is, Lord, remember me. He does not pray, Lord, prefer me, (as they did, Matt. 20:21,) though, having the honor so as none of the disciples had, to drink of Christ's cup, and to be baptized with his baptism, either on his right hand or on his left in his sufferings, when his own disciples had deserted him. He might have had some color to ask as they did, to sit on his right hand and on his left in his kingdom; acquaintance in sufferings hath sometimes gained such a point, Jer. 52:31, 32. But he is far from the thought of it; all he begs is, Lord, remember me, referring himself to Christ as to the way; it was like Joseph's request to the chief butler, Think on me, (Gen. 40:14,) and it sped better; the chief butler forgot Joseph, but Christ remembered this thief.

3. His importunity and fervency. He doth, as it were, breathe out his soul in it; 'Lord, remember me, and I have enough; I desire no more; into thy hands I commit my case.' Note, Now He is in his kingdom, we should earnestly desire and pray to be remembered by Christ, and it will be enough to secure our welfare, living and dying. Christ is in his kingdom, interceding; 'Lord, remember me, and intercede for me.' He is there, ruling; 'Lord, remember me, and rule in me by thy Spirit.' He is there, preparing palaces for those that are his; 'Lord, remember me, and prepare a place for me; remember me at death, remember me in the resurrection.' See Job 14:13.

[2.] Christ's extraordinary favor to him; Jesus said, in answer to his prayer, 'Verily I say unto thee, I the Amen, the faithful Witness, I say Amen to this prayer, put thy fiat to it: nay, thou shalt have more than thou didst ask. This day shalt thou be with Me in paradise,' v. 43. Observe,

1st. To whom this was spoken: to the penitent thief, not to his companion. Christ on the cross is like Christ on the throne: for now is the judgment of this world, one departs with a curse, the other with a blessing. Though which would have expanded into all the actions of a holy life, had time been allowed. Perhaps he actually more honored Christ in this short space, than many do who live a number of years to profess faith in Him. Accordingly our Lord assured him, that that day, before the setting of the sun, when the Jewish day ended, he should enter with Him into a state of happiness. Thus He communicated life when in the very agonies of death. This was doubtless intended as the grand display of the Redeemer's power and grace, in the view of numberless invisible spectators; and for the instruction of mankind, in all future ages, about those things which relate to the freedom and sovereignty of His mercy, the efficacy of His atoning blood, and the omnipotence of His saving arm. It is a single instance, an act of grace, well suited to honor the extraordinary occasion which once occurred, but never can again occur; teaching us to despair of none, and that none ought to despair of themselves; but yet checking presumption, and showing, by contrast with the case of the other thief, that in general men die as they live.

3. Christ used these words in a sense peculiar to Himself as Mediator. He was now to make his soul an offering for our sin, (Isa. 53: 10.) to give his life a ransom for many, (Matt. 20: 28.) by the eternal Spirit to offer Himself, Heb. 9: 14. He was Himself both the Priest and Sacrifice; our souls were forfeited, and his must redeem the forfeiture. The price must be paid into the hands of God, the Party offended by sin; to Him He had undertaken to make full satisfaction. Now by these words He offered up the Sacrifice, laid his hand, as it were, on the head of it, and surrendered it; 'I deposit it, I pay it into thy hands. Father, accept my life and soul instead of the lives and souls of the sinners I die for.' The good will of the Offerer was requisite to the accept-

46 And when Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and having said thus, he gave up the ghost.

47 Now when the centurion saw what was done, he glorified God, saying, Certainly this was a righteous man.

43 And all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things which were done, smote their breasts, and returned.

49 And all his acquaintance, and the women that followed him from Galilee, stood afar off, beholding these things.

50 ¶ And, behold, there was a man named Joseph, a counselor; and he was a good man, and a just:

51 (The same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them:) he was of Arimathea, a city of the Jews; who also himself waited for the kingdom of God.

52 This man went unto Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus.

53 And he took it down, and wrapped it in linen, and laid it in a sepulchre that was hewn in stone, where in never man before was laid.

54 And that day was the preparation, and the sabbath drew on.

55 And the women also, which came with him from Galilee, followed after, and beheld the sepulchre, and how his body was laid.

56 And they returned, and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the sabbath-day, according to the commandment.

ance of the Offering. Christ here expresses his cheerful willingness to offer Himself, as when it was first proposed to Him, (Heb. 10: 9, 10.) Lo, I come to do thy will, by the which will we are sanctified.

4. Christ hereby signifies his dependence on his Father for his resurrection, the reunion of soul and body. He commends his spirit into his Father's hand, to be received into paradise, and returned the third day. By this it appears that our Lord, as He had a true body, so He had a reasonable soul, which existed in a state of separation from the body, and thus He was like his brethren; this soul He committed to his Father's custody, resting in hope that it should not be left in hades, in its state of separation from the body, nor, not so long as that the body might see corruption.

5. Christ hath hereby left us an example, fitted those words of David to the purpose of dying saints, and, as it were, sanctified them for their use. In death our great care should be for our souls, and we cannot more effectually provide for their welfare, than by committing them now into the hands of God as a Father, to be sanctified and governed by his Spirit and grace; and at death by committing them into his hands, to be made perfect in holiness and happiness. We must show we are freely willing to die, that we firmly believe another life after this, and are desirous of it, by saying, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit.

III. Christ's dying improved by the impressions made on those that attended Him.

1. The centurion that commanded the guard, was much affected, v. 47. He was a Roman, a Gentile, a stranger to the consolations of Israel, yet glorified God. He never saw such amazing instances of divine power, and therefore took occasion thence to adore God as the Almighty. And he bore a testimony to the patient Sufferer; 'Certainly this was a righteous Man, unjustly put to death. God's manifesting his power so much to do Him honor, was a plain evidence of his innocence. His testimony in Matthew and Mark goes further; Truly, this was the Son of God. But in this case this amounts to the same; for if He was a righteous Man, He said very truly when he said that He was the Son of God; and therefore that testimony of his concerning Himself must be admitted; for if it were false, He was not a righteous man.

2. The disinterested spectators could not but be concerned. This is noticed here only, (v. 48.) All the people that came together to that sight, as usual on such occasions, beholding the things done, could not but go away very serious for the time, whatever they were when they came home; They smote their breasts, and returned. (1.) They laid the thing very much to heart for the present. They looked on it as a wicked thing, to put Him to death, and could not but think that some judgment of God would come on their nation for it. Probably, those very people were of them that cried, Crucify Him, crucify Him, and, when nailed to the cross, reviled and blasphemed Him; but now they were so terrified with the darkness and earthquake, and the uncommon manner of his expiring, that not only were their mouths stopped, but their consciences startled, and, in remorse for what they had done, they smote upon their breasts. Some think this a happy step toward that good work afterward wrought on them, when they were pricked to the heart, Acts 2: 37. (2.) Yet, it should seem, the impression soon wore off; They smote their breasts, and returned. They showed no further token of respect to Christ, nor inquired more concerning Him, but went home, and, we have reason to fear, in a little time quite forgot it. Thus many that see Christ evidently set forth crucified among them, in the Word and sacraments, are a little affected, but it does not continue; they smite their breasts, and return. They see Christ's face in the glass of ordinances, and admire Him; but go away, and straightway forget what manner of Man He is, and what reason they have to love Him.

3. His own friends and followers were forced to keep their distance, and yet came as near as they durst, to see what was done; (v. 49.) All that knew Him, and were known of Him, stood afar off, for fear lest, had they been near Him, they should have been taken up as favorites of Him; this was part of his sufferings, as of Job's, (ch. 19: 13.) He has put my brethren far from me, and mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me. Ps. 88:18. And the women that followed Him together from Galilee were beholding these things, not knowing what to think of them, nor ready, as they should have been, to take them for certain preludes of his resurrection. Now was Christ set for a Sign that should be spoken against, as Simeon foretold, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed, ch. 2: 34, 35.

V. 50-56. Here is an account of Christ's burial. Observe,

1. Who buried Him. His acquaintance stood afar off; but God raised up one, (v. 50.) a man of unsponsored reputation; not only just to all, but good, a person of distinction, a counselor, a senator, a member of the sanhedrim, one of the elders of the Jewish church; and who, though of that body of men who had put Christ to death, yet entered his protest against it, v. 51. Note, That evil counsel and deed we have not consented to, shall not be reckoned our act. Nay, he not only dissented openly from Christ's enemies, but consented secretly with Christ's friends; He himself waited for the kingdom of God; he believed the Old-Testament prophecies of the Messiah and his kingdom, and expected their accomplishment. This man appears on this occasion to have had a true respect for Jesus. Note, Many who do not make any show in their outward profession of it, are yet hearty in Christ's interests, and more ready to do Him real service, on occasion, than others who make a greater figure and noise.

2. What he did toward his burial. (1.) He went to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus, for it was at his disposal; though he might have raised a party sufficient to carry it off by violence, yet he would take the regular course, and do it peaceably. (2.) He took it down, it should seem, with his own hands, and wrapped it in linen. They tell us that it was the manner of the Jews, (and that the word here used signifies so much,) to roll the bodies of the dead as we do little children in swaddling clothes; so that the piece of fine linen which he bought whole, he cut into many pieces for that purpose. It is said of Lazarus, He was bound hand and foot, John 11: 44.

3. Where He was buried; in a sepulchre hewn in stone, that the prison of the grave might

(49.) The women, &c. 'The frequent mention in the evangelists of the generous and courageous zeal of some pious women in serving Christ, especially their faithful and resolute constancy in attending Him in these last scenes of suffering, might be intended to obviate that haughty and senseless contempt, which the pride of men, often irritated by those vexations to which their own irregular passions have exposed them, has in all ages affected to throw on that sex, which probably, in the sight of God, constitute by far the better half of mankind, and to whose care and tenderness the wisest and best of men generally owe and ascribe much of the daily comfort and enjoyment of their lives.'

CHAP. XXIV.

Two angels inform the women at the sepulchre, that Jesus is risen, 1-7. They report it to the others, but are not believed, 8-11. Peter goes to the sepulchre, 12. Jesus appears as a stranger, to two disciples when going to Emmaus; converses with them, explains the Scriptures, and then discovers Himself, but disappears, 13-35. They return, and report it to the eleven, who inform them that Jesus had appeared to Simon, 33-35. He joins the company, shows them his hands and his side, and eats with them, 36-43. He reminds them of his words concerning his suffering and resurrection, 'opens their understandings,' interprets the Scriptures, and commissions them to preach his Gospel to the nations, beginning at Jerusalem, 44-48. He promises the Holy Spirit, leads them forth to Bethany, blesses them, and ascends into heaven, 49-51. They worship Him with joy, and praise God at the temple continually, 52, 53.

NOW upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared, and certain others with them.

2 And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre.

3 And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus.

4 And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men stood by them in shining garments:

5 And as they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them, Why seek ye the living among the dead?

6 He is not here, but is risen: remember he made strong; as the church, when brought into darkness, had her way inclosed with heaven stone, 1am. 3: 2, 9. In a sepulchre in which never man before was laid, for He was buried as was never any one before, only in order to his rising again the third day by his own power; and He was to triumph over the grave as never man did.

4. When He was buried, p. 54: They made such haste with the funeral, because the Sabbath drew on, which required their attendance on other duties, preparatory to it. Note, Weeping must not hinder sowing. Though in tears for the death of Christ, yet they must apply themselves to the sanctifying of the Sabbath. And when the Sabbath draws on, there must be preparation. Worldly affairs must be so ordered, as not to hinder sabbath-work; and our holy affections so excited, as to carry us on in it.

5. Who attended the funeral; only the women that came with Him from Galilee, (p. 55.) who, as they staid by Him while on the cross, so they followed Him, and beheld the sepulchre where it was, the way to it, and how his body was laid in it. They were led to this, not by curiosity, but by their affection to Jesus, strong as death, and which many waters could not quench. Here was a silent funeral, and not a ceremonious one, yet his rest was glorious.

6. The preparation made to embalm the body after burial; (p. 56.) which was more an evidence of their love than of their faith; for had they remembered and believed what He had so often told them, that He should rise again the third day, they would have spared their cost and pains herein, as knowing that in a short time his body would be more honored by the glory of his resurrection, than now with their most precious ointments; but busy as they were in this preparation, they rested on the sabbath-day, and did none of this servile work thereon, not according to the custom of their nation, but according to the commandment of their God, which, though the day be altered, is still in full force; Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy.

CHAP. XXIV. v. 1-12. Our Lord Jesus went gloriously down to death, in spite of the malice of his enemies, who did all they could to make his death ignominious; but He rose again more gloriously; of which we have an account in this chapter; and the proofs and evidences of Christ's resurrection are more fully related by this evangelist, than by Matthew and Mark. The manner of the re-uniting of Christ's soul and body in his resurrection, is a mystery, one of the secret things that belong not to us; but the infallible proofs of his resurrection, that He did indeed rise from the dead, and was thereby proved to be the Son of God, are things revealed, which belong to us, and to our children; some of them we have here:

I. The affection and respect the good women had that followed Christ, showed Him, after He was dead and buried, p. 1. As soon as ever they could, after the Sabbath, they came to embalm his body, not to take it out of the linen, but to anoint the head and face, and perhaps the wounded hands and feet, and to scatter sweet spices on and about the body; as it is usual with us to strew flowers about the dead bodies and graves of our friends, only to show our good will toward taking off the deformity of death; if we could, and to make them somewhat the less loathsome to those that are about them. The zeal of those good women for Christ continued; the spices which they had prepared the evening before the Sabbath, at a great expense, they did not, upon second thoughts, dispose of otherwise, suggesting, To what purpose is this waste? But they brought them to the sepulchre on the morning after the Sabbath, early, very early. It is a rule of charity, Every man according as he purposes in his heart, so let him give, 2 Cor. 9: 7. What is prepared for Christ, let it be used for Him. Notice is taken of the names of these women, Mary Magdalene and Joanna, and Mary, the mother of James; a brave, matronly women. Notice is also taken of certain others with them, (p. 1.) and again, p. 17. These that had not joined in preparing the spices, would yet go along with them to the sepulchre; as if the number of Christ's friends increased when He was dead, John 12: 24-32. The daughters of Jerusalem, when they saw how inquisitive the spouse was after her Beloved, were desirous to seek Him with her; (Cant. 6: 1.) so were these other women. The zeal of some provokes others.

II. Their surprise on finding the stone rolled away, and the grave empty; (p. 2, 3.) they were much perplexed at that, (p. 4.) in which they had much reason to rejoice. Note, Good Christians often perplex themselves about that which should comfort and encourage them.

III. The account they had of Christ's resurrection, from two angels. They first saw one angel without the sepulchre, who presently went in, and sat with another angel in the sepulchre, one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain; so the evangelists may be reconciled.

The women, when they saw the angels, were afraid lest they had some ill news for them; but, instead of inquiring, they looked for the Master in the grave. A dying Jesus has more beauty in the eyes of a believer than angels themselves. These women, like the spouse when found by the watchmen, (and angels are called watchers,) enter not into any other conversation with them, than, Saw ye Him whom my soul loveth? Now here,

1. They upbraid the women with the absurdity of their search, p. 5. Witness is hereby given to Christ, that He is living, of Him it is witnessed, that He liveth, (Heb. 7: 8.) and it is the comfort of all the saints, I know that my Redeemer liveth; for because He lives we shall live also. But a reproof is given to those that look for Him among the dead, as if He were but like one of the dead heroes the Gentiles worshipped; that look for Him in an image, or a crucifix, the work of men's hands, or among unwritten traditions, and the inventions of men. And indeed all they that expect happiness and satisfaction in the creature, or perfection in this imperfect state, may be said to seek the living among the dead.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 44-56. Let us come unto Jesus without delay, approaching the throne of grace, through his atoning blood and prevailing intercession; that when we die, we may by his light pass through that scene, which to unbelievers is encompassed with inexpressible darkness and horror. Let us not content ourselves with superficial views; but seek to glorify God by repentance and conversion; by a sober, righteous, godly life; and by filling up our stations in the community, and employing all our talents, in the service of Him, who died for us and rose again. Finally, in whatever business we engage, or however our hearts may be affected; nay, whatever be the claim of the most revered and beloved relatives and friends, living or deceased; unless it clearly amount to an act of necessity, piety, or mercy, we should never omit to prepare for the day of sacred rest, and keep it holy, according to the commandment of our God and Savior. (Is. 58: 13, 14.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. v. 1-9. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 23: 50-56. Matt. 28: 1-8. Mark 16: 1-8. John 20: 1-17.) (4.) Two, &c.] Mary Magdalene and the other Mary saw only one angel in white, sitting on the stone, which had rolled from the door of the sepulchre; but the women here mentioned saw no angel till they had entered the sepulchre, when two appeared to them, in garments shining as lightning; for so the word signifies. Probably, two distinct events are intended. (Note, John 20: 10.) (5.) Bowed.] As afraid of looking on the angels, or dazzled with the glory of their appearance. Living.] Or, 'in a living flesh.' (Marg. and Ref.—Notes, John 14: 18-20, p. 19. Rom. 14: 7-9. Rev. 1: 12-20, p. 18.) The sepulchre was a place for the dead, though none had before been buried there. (6.) How

He spake.] The familiar manner, in which the angel speaks of what passed between Jesus and them in Galilee, seems to intimate that he had been present, though invisible, and heard what Jesus said. Doddridge.

SCOTT.

(5.) Bowed down, &c.] The words do not intimate their prostrating themselves before the angels, but a respectful and reverential declining their heads, and looking downward, that they might not appear to gaze, which is well known to have been forbidden to the Jews, upon the sight of a celestial vision. Ex. 19: 21. Job. 13: 20. Doddridge.

(6.) Why seek ye the living among the dead? A popular adage as appears from the rabbinical citations in Lighfoot and Westcott. It also occurs in Plautus. Bloomfield.

how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee,

7 Saying, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again.

8 And ^h they remembered his words,

9 And ⁱ returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things unto the eleven, and to all the rest.

10 It was ^k Mary Magdalene, and Joanna, and Mary the mother of James, and other women that were with them, which told these things unto the apostles.

11 And their words seemed to them as ^l idle tales, and they believed them not.

12 Then ^m arose Peter, and ran unto the sepulchre; and, stooping down, he beheld the linen clothes laid by themselves, and departed, wondering in himself at that which was come to pass.

[Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ And, behold, ⁿ two of them went that same day to a village called Emmaus, which was from Jerusalem about threescore furlongs.

14 And ^o they talked together of all these things which had happened.

15 And it came to pass, that while they communed ^p together,

2. They assure them He is risen from the dead, v. 6. These angels were competent witnesses, having been sent express from heaven with orders for his discharge. And we are sure that their record is true.

3. They refer them to his own words, v. 6. Had they duly believed and observed the prediction of it, they would easily have believed the thing itself when it came to pass; and therefore, that the tidings might not be such a surprise as it seemed, he repeats what Christ had often said, in their hearing; (v. 7.) and though He was delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, yet they that did it, were not the less sinful for doing it; He told them that He must be crucified; surely they could not forget that which they had with so much concern seen fulfilled; and would not that bring to mind what always followed, The third day He shall rise again? Observe, These angels bring not any new Gospel, but put them in mind, as the angels of the churches do, of the sayings of Christ, and teach them how to improve and apply them.

IV. Their satisfaction in this account, v. 8. The women seemed to acquiesce; and concluded that if He were risen, it was no more than they had reason to expect; and now, they were ashamed of their preparations to embalm Him on the third day, who had often said that He would on the third day rise again. Note, A reasonable remembrance of the words of Christ will help us to a right understanding of his providence.

V. Their report to the apostles, v. 9. One went to some, and another to others of them, so that in a little time, that morning, they got them all notice of it. But we are told, (v. 11.) how the report was received. They thought it was only the fancy of the women, for they also wanted to be put in mind of Christ's words, not only what He had said in Galilee some time ago, but very lately in the night wherein He was betrayed, Again a little while, and ye shall see Me. I will see you again. One might be amazed at the stupidity of these disciples, who had themselves so often professed that they believed Christ to be the Son of God, and the true Messiah, had been so often told that He must die, and rise again, and then enter into his glory, and had seen Him more than once raise the dead, that they should be so backward to believe his raising Himself; surely it would seem the less strange to them, (when hereafter this complaint would justly be taken up by them,) to remember that there was a time when it might justly have been taken up against them, Who hath believed our report?

VI. Peter's inquiry hereupon, v. 12. Mary Magdalene brought the report to him, as appears in John 20: 1, 2, where this story, of his running to the sepulchre, is more particularly related. 1. Peter hastened to the sepulchre, on the report; ashamed, probably, that she should have been there before him; and yet, perhaps, he had not been so ready to go thither now, if she had not told him, among other things, that the watch was fled. Many that are swift-footed enough when there is no danger, are but faint-hearted when there is. 2. He looked into the sepulchre, and was very particular in making his observations, as if he would rather credit his own eyes, than the testimony of the angels. 3. He went away, as he thought, not much the wiser, v. 12. Had he remembered the words of Christ, even this was enough to satisfy him that He was risen from the dead; but, having forgotten them, he is only amazed with the thing, and knows not what to make of it. Many a thing is puzzling and perplexing, which would be both plain and profitable, did we but rightly understand the words of Christ, and had them ready to us.
